UNELECTED STATESMEN HOLD FORTH. The Chicago Tribune has called attention to the plight of Congress from a deluge of petitions and protests that began with the war and shows no signs of abating, all of the very first importance to the stability of the country in the opinion of the senders. The proposed war tax greatly stimulated the unsolicited correspondence; bankers, horrified at the idea of taxing capital; brewers arguing that newspapers and magazines, not liquor, should pay the tax; country stores suggesting the mail-order houses as the one best source of Federal income; as ice is the least affected of our industries, perhaps, none being imported or exported, an editor conceived the idea of applying the entire tax to that business. It does not appear to be of record that any form of property petitioned to be allowed to bear the tax for the country's good. Much of the advice and pleading has to do with the stopping of the war by our government. "A discontinuance of the present session of Congress" was urged as the most effectual step possible in that direction. North Dakota Christian Endeavorers proposed that the government control the manufacture of munitions of war. A labor council in New York waxed wroth and demanded that Congress just stop the war outright; they, the council, declined to tolerate the thing any longer. Many other interests cast their petitions upon the current, until Congress is said to have received about as many individual letters of advice and petitions since the war started as in all the history of this country prior to the war. And the worst of it is, Congress can't deny the common sense and good grounds that characterize a portion of these communications.

GOD'S CHILDREN

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

I SAW a smiling little child, with glances shy and sweet, as I was walking down along the crowded city street. Her tiny fingers nestled in her father's loving hand, and in her other arm she held a doll. I wished to stand and watch her till she disappeared across the busy way. It is not often that I see a sight so young, so gay, in this great town of grief and toil, where tear and laughter meet—where sorrow touches happiness upon the busy street.

A BELGIAN REFUGEE WHO SAVED ONLY HER DOLL, PRECIOUS DOLL

I thought of her throughout the day and often saw her smile, and in the hurry and the rush I wished that, for a while, I too might be a little child, with mind quite free from care, but as I thought my day dreams burst into the empty air.

The world seemed full of war that day. The papers screamed of strife, and everywhere the headlines told that Death had conquered Life. "Six hundred thousand killed," they said, "in one deciding fight"—a cry to arms, a hail of shot, a fire in the night, and cities were in flames and homes were ruined by the score. Ah! people do not understand the ravages of war! So, from the thought of happy smiles and shining baby eyes my mind swung to the thoughts of blood and snarling battle cries, and from the thoughts of childish play, of dolls and other toys, my aching heart was filled with grief for dying, gasping boys, and men away from home—alone on some sad battlefield, drowned in the rain of bursting shells, without a thing to shield them from the specter dark and grim, that urged along the fight—the phantom gray that chuckled as the flames grew huge and bright.

The world seemed full of war, but oh! the papers only spoke about the bloodshed at the front, about the powder-smoke; about the guns that rumbled in the distance, and the pain that soldiers suffered who would never see the day again. I thought of them—the dying men—and pitied them and prayed, and asked that God might help them for the courage they displayed. I never thought about the ones who waited home in tears—who had no way of feeling that their doubts and awful fears were groundless, who quite far away could hear the cannon speak, who in their minds saw loved ones die—saw life blood slowly leak from some kind heart that never more would sing at honest toil—the pawn of kings—a unit in the war god's mighty spoil.

I thought of them until a picture small was brought to me, the picture of a little girl—a Belgian refugee. Her face was smiling, and her arms were clasping to her heart a broken baby doll, and as I looked a sudden dart of pain shot through my soul, and where I had just seen her face I saw a rainbow (made of tears) that covered up the place. For she is only one of them, of millions that are left without a home, without a bit of anything—bereft of fathers, brothers, uncles, that they loved; they are too young to know that they are mounted on life's ladder, that the rung their tiny feet are standing on is small and prone to shake, that in the stress of war the foothold weak is sure to break and leave them helpless, lying in the waste of wreckage small—the boards that built a cottage home, a tiny garden wall, a little pile of torn-up plants, a heap of ashes gray, a bone or two, a crust of bread. Ah! wreckage, did I say? And though the baby smiles are bright and baby cheeks are round, it will not be for long, for on the cold and friendless ground they will be left alone to die, to cry with childish grief while famine steals beside them like some sulky, prowling thief. And at the father's knee their prayers will never more be said; for, shattered by a shell, the father may be lying dead! And mother's arms will not be soft to hold her baby fast, for she will sit, a huddled heap, with wild eyes, staring past the wasted harvest, lying for a farmer's hand to reap, past all the death and sorrow to that land of endless sleep.

A little girl, a broken doll, eyes yet unfilled with pain; oh, can it be that killing these will be accounted gain? A heart with purity and light and lips o'errun with song, and feet that dance and frolic as they carry her along. It cannot be that such as these can be condemned to die! Not while the Christian folk can hear their plea for help, their cry! It is enough that men should go to still the hungry wail of Death, that they should heroes be. but why should women fail to have the comforts that they need, and why should children small be robbed of warmth, and food, and clothes, and shelter, and their all? And why should kings and emperors have wine and food to eat, while on a tiny crust a day a whole small family cheat the cries of famine and of dread that follow them around for lack of living, breathing men to till the fertile ground?

O friends, we do not understand, for seas are rolled between us and the sufferers, and God has kept our country clean. We do not realize as we sit by tables crowded high with steaming food, that other folk will waste away and die for want of it; we do not know that babies shake with chill—our own are warm and happy and we have no thought of ill. We cannot understand the work of armies, drenched in blood, that struggle through the country lanes, the brooklets deep with mud. We cannot picture in our minds the peasant woman, thin, and begging for a crust to eat, where crops have always been. We cannot seem to understand why they are cursed with fear, while we have food within our hands—our loved ones standing near.

The little smiling girl I saw upon our city street—I wish that every other child could be as calm and sweet as she was while she walked along and held her father's hand. And yet, as I am wishing hard I seem to understand that God the Father up on high will walk beside the ones made orphan by cruel war's alarms, its terrors, and its guns. And I am sure, within my mind, that if we help and pray, the dawn of peace may come to them not many months away.

10% More for Your Money.

Quaker Oats is put up also in a 25-cent size, nearly three times as large as the 10-cent size. By saving in packing it offers you 10 per cent more for your money. See how long it lasts.

Frills

Folks and Foods All Need Them

We do for Quaker Oats just what you do to make a child attractive. Just what you do to make a meal inviting.

We add the frills—by bringing out a delectable taste and aroma.

We select the big grains, because they have the flavor. We apply dry heat, then steam heat. The flakes we bring you are large and luscious and exquisite to the taste.

Thus this energy food—this great vim-producer—is made a delight to the palate.

And thus children are tempted to eat an abundance of the best food known, for brains and nerves and bodies.

Quaker Oats

The Flakes with the Fairy Flavor

In making these flakes, all the puny, starved grains are rejected. We get but ten pounds of Quaker Oats from a bushel.

Then the rich natural flavor is enhanced by dry heat.

The result is an oat food so rare and delicious that from all the world over people send here to get it. Careful mothers of every clime get Quaker Oats for children. A thousand million dishes are consumed each year.

Quaker Cooker

We have made to our order—from pure Aluminum a perfect Double Boiler. It is extra large and heavy. We supply it to users of Quaker Oats for cooking these flakes in the ideal way. It insures the fullness of food value and flavor. See our offer in each package.

If you don't get it, you are missing a delight. Your grocer has it, and it costs no extra price. Try it—compare it—learn what this flavor means.

A food so essential should be made inviting. Serve it once in this welcome form and you will always ask for Quaker.

Sowing and Reaping

By Rev. Edwin Whitney Rankin

THE principle of reaping in kind what you sow is a beneficent law. Our earth is the result of forces acting upon it. Cause and effect are the laws of evolution. If one would reap wheat from sowing tares, thorns and plants would wound and sting.

Some young persons do not think that the laws of nature are similar in theory of morals and religion. They loudly assert, after "sowing their wild oats," to reap a noble manhood, but we cannot harvest purity from seeds of the flesh. We manufacture in time the character we must wear through eternity.

Whatsoever a man soweth! Like seed potatoes the harvest. The red wine blunting the coldness of eye, tone and face. Sow drunkenness and reap debauchery. He that is filthy with rum in this life will "be filthy still" in the life after this. Death has no power to change the harvest. Self-indulgent, home-deserting men are reaping now what they will somehow to reap hereafter. Dives has the true fruits as sample of the harvest every day. Emerson said: "Punishment is a fruit that unexpected, ripens within the flower that concealed it." An old negro woman uttered the same truth when asked, "Where do they get the sulphur for the fires of hell?" She replied, "Never you mind, honey; you carry your own sulphur with you."

The harvest is mightier than the sowing. The appetite grows with what it feeds upon. Habit first a cotton thread, becomes a strong cable. The first glass has within it the poison of the serpent, charming and glistening with beauty at the beginning, but to sting, stinging, deadly, at the end. How terrible is retribution! But we bring it upon ourselves. We dig the pit we fall in. Haman hung on the gallows he built for Mordecai.

Seeds buried three thousand years in a mummy's tomb have, when planted, proved that their power was unimpaired and produced a harvest according to their nature. Seeds have wings to fly over oceans and vast inland lands. So the seeds of human influence are moving everywhere, bringing forth a harvest according to their kind. Sow kindness and virtue, reap benediction; sow evil, harvest devastation; sow pure and reap heavenly blessing and glory. The curse that now salvos by the seeds of drunk, coupled with disease, famine and final ruin.

No [illegible]. Millions of immortal victims of the saloon are in all lands. War is only occasional, but the cry of those pitiless, fiery drink is universal and continuous that the sky is deadened to the piteous cry and the conscience seared by the flaming flavor.

A disorder [illegible] could [illegible] yourself [illegible] in his physician, saying, "What shall I do? The fact [illegible]

[illegible] kill the baby." The boy said to the doctor, "I want to kill somebody all the time." The drinking father was told, "It is in your blood, and your drinking habit is the cause of it." Afterward, when that boy was in prison, the mother cried, as she went to see him, "Would God I had died for thee!"

"No man liveth unto himself." As Christ is pricked with the feeling of our infirmities, we should seek to save those addicted to drink by sympathetic prayer. We should help bear the burden of his weakness and hereditary tendency, remembering the possibility of our own falling. At the great reaping day, every man must bear his own burden. Today, you can help bear your afflicted friend's burden, relieving him of its awful pressure, or remove it altogether.

God is not mocked or fooled or deceived. Many moderate drinkers regard their habit as a fault, not a sin. They have been overtaken by the social glass, and do not realize that the awful doom of a drunkard's life threatens them. They are sowing to the wind, but do not expect to reap the whirlwind. Our example should not be such as to make our brother stumble. We are our brother's keepers, and should, if possible, dissuade him from sowing the seed that will produce the black harvest of death. The reaper Death knows to which garner we belong. "Sow a thought, and reap an act; sow an act and reap a habit; sow a habit and reap a character; sow a character and reap a destiny."

Nature never forgives; society never forgives, but, O blessed Gospel of grace, God forgives! He could not change his law of sowing and reaping, any more than he could make wrong right. He therefore came himself, in the person of his Son, to reap the harvest of sin in its awful penalty, for all who are willing to be lifted up to his higher nature, where sowing and reaping mean life everlasting. "The wages of sin is death"; Jesus paid the wages on Calvary. Standing under the shadow of the cross the soul is free from the awful harvest, though still bearing the scars and natural consequences of his sin. At the Tree of Knowledge sin fell; at Calvary's Tree of Life, man rises into Godlike joy, purity and blessedness.

Bowerville and the Bowery

By Ethan H. Hubbard

ONE of the strongest arguments against the saloon is that when once a community is free from it it is not wanted back. People of a city, county or state, when once they find how pleasant it is to be without the saloon, wish to continue that pleasant condition, which they know the saloon will destroy. That is why the anti-saloon map of the United States is growing steadily whiter. When once a county or State is made dry the people do not want to see it [illegible] again.

Last July, during a horseback trip [illegible] I spent one afternoon in [illegible] a few hours in a city which we shall name, but other similar cities [illegible] Bowerville. I happened to have gotten hold of the wrong address of the friends I was seeking, so walked many blocks, first in one direction, then, finding my error, to another part of the city. But though I was in a hurry and rather weary, the misdirected steps were worth while. For they led through fairyland. Broad streets, broad lawns, big trees, charming houses, bewitching gardens—greenness and bloom and shade and delight everywhere. I found my friends at last—in a fairy-house in the fairyland. The children I wanted to see were out at play at a neighbor's, so their grandfather and I walked through more fairyland to another house, where a group of fairy children, our own among them, were at play.

What does a city like that want of a saloon? There is not one in the whole city, a city of nearly twenty-five thousand inhabitants. Try to picture Bowerville with a hundred or more saloons. Think what it means to these fairy children not to see a saloon, except when they go into a bigger, noisier, dirtier city; think what sort of surroundings would accompany those hundred saloons, how their blight would spread over into the surrounding lawns and gardens and homes, what sort of people would come with the coming of the saloon, how inevitable, how deadly sure it would be that some of the men and boys and children of those fairy homes would be swept into the horrors of the life that the saloon stands for. No, Bowerville does not want a saloon.

Every day as I work at my desk the cars of the Third Avenue elevated line whirr past, near my window, north and south. Those going north have just emerged from an unsavory atmosphere; those going south are just plunging into it. For Third Avenue ends and the Bowery begins a few steps south of the old Bible House. The Bowery! A ten-minute walk takes us to the Mission, where our faithful friends work night and day, winter and summer, to pick up the wrecks of manhood which float, by the thousand, through that strange neighborhood, striving to rebuild them into lives of strength and purity. Years ago the Bowery was not altogether unlike Bowerville. There was less elegance, but there was much greenness and beauty, as the name implies. The Bowery—a beautiful name. A place of bowers and blossoms. Do the ghosts of those sweet old days walk along its sad, grim haunts today? Failure, shame, sin, sorrow, want—this is what the Bowery means now. I am not going to say that the saloon did it all. But we know that the saloon did much of it. And today there are on the Bowery, including its two short termini, Park Row and New Bowery, nearly a hundred saloons, to say nothing of the scores that haunt the side streets.

Mind you, the saloon did not do it all. Other causes than drink have contributed to the wrecking of the more than a hundred thousand derelicts that swarm the Bowery's haunts. But the share the saloon has had in it is a grievous, ugly, colossal share.

Shall we not keep our Bowervilles green? Shall we not redeem our captured Boweries from the damning grip of the saloon?

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

By Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Q. I have enjoyed your Sunday School Round Table ideas as presented in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD very much. I would like to have your ideas on "The Sunday School and the Congregation"—their relation and work jointly.

A. In many places in our country there are now well developed experiments on the Sunday morning combination church and Sunday school plan. The usual plan provides for an opening service in charge of the superintendent, a lesson study in which church members join, then a song. The pastor then takes charge, a church hymn is sung, and the pastor's talk, perhaps relating to the lesson of the day, is adapted to both children and elders.

Where the church service precedes the Sunday school the form of the service is reversed, the superintendent taking charge after the talk by the pastor, and the congregation, young and old, divide for Bible study. In neither case, however, is there any closing song or doxology between the services that permits people to go out. If the Sunday school is the Bible teaching service of the church then adults as well as children should be a part of the church's Bible study service. "All of the church in the Sunday school and all of the Sunday school in the church," is the new slogan. In almost every instance where the Combination Church and Sunday School Service has been attempted the attendance upon each section of the service has been greatly increased. Pastors would do well to secure Dr. Farrar's book, A Junior Congregation, for some rich material for talks to the young people in such services as have been suggested.

Q. Will you suggest some things which a woman's Bible class may do besides the Sunday school work, some way of enlarging and inspiring ourselves and the whole church?—Mrs. W. C.

A. I would suggest that you write to Walter A. Snow, general secretary of your North Dakota School Association, Fargo, N. D., for leaflet on One Hundred Things an Organized Class Can Do, and also for Dr. Clark's leaflet, Fifty-eight Varieties—One Better. These leaflets, together with the book by W. C. Pearce, The Adult Bible Class, and one by Barclay, The Adult Worker And His Work, will give you good working suggestions for your class activities.

Q. Will you kindly suggest some literature or help, and where to get it, for a young Sunday school teacher, having a class of boys aged nine to eleven, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD?—W. S.

A. At that dynamic age (nine to eleven) the main thing is to give them some Sunday and week-day expression for their activities. Bible drills, such as you will find in The Superintendent and His Work (Brown), will be just the thing for boys of this age, who love memory work, and this will familiarize them with the handling and marking of their own Bibles. Choosing sides for answering Bible questions, similar to the old spelling contests, interests boys at that age, and is a splendid way of teaching Bible facts. Several excellent books for the teacher of these junior boys are The Junior Worker and His Work, Robinson (55 cents); Making Men and Women, Robinson (75 cents); Our Boys and Girls, Kennedy (75 cents). These books as well as others referred to in our Round Table can be secured through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

Q. As superintendent I am writing in reference to the grading and graduating of pupils from one department or class to another in the Sunday school. Will you kindly mail me information as to the standard adopted by the International Sunday School Association and some instructions as to how to develop their methods?

A. If you will write to the headquarters of your Ohio State Sunday School Association, Columbus, Ohio, you can secure a copy of the Organization Standard for an organized school and the requirements for State and denominational recognition. The grading standard for the school is a class or department representing: The Cradle Roll (under 3), Beginners (3 to 5), Primary (6 to 8), Junior (9 to 12), Intermediate (13 to 16), Senior (17 to 20), Adult (over 20), Home Department. An annual promotion day from class to class or department to department is now quite usual on Children's Day or in the fall about October 1. Graduating exercises in connection with those promotions include recitation of Scripture portions, hymns learned, Bible drills, essays on Bible characters. These exercises are often held as a part of the church or on a week evening service, parents being invited. Sometimes a class valedictory is given, and the scholars march through a decorated graduation arch, receiving their certificates on the farther side of the arch, these certificates being tied in the school or department colors. The pastor or the superintendent delivers the charge to the class. Plans for such exercises can be found in How to Conduct the Sunday School (Lawrance), or The Superintendent and His Work (Brown).

Q. My class of girls are thinking of organizing the class, and we are thinking of having a missionary class and study on missionary work. So we would like to know if you can give us any ideas of missionary work that could be interesting to the class.

A. Write to the Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, for the plans of the missionary study and work suggested by your denomination. Read Missionary Methods in the Sunday School (Trull), and Missions in the Sunday School (Hixon). Write "Surplus Material Department," World's Sunday School Association, 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York, for name of a Presbyterian Mission Sunday School upon the foreign field to which your class can send some gifts to help that school. The fund promoted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by which the Sunday schools of America may manifest a practical interest in the suffering children of the war is another way of expressing missionary interest.

Hupmobile
Car of the American Family

$1200

The new Hupmobile is simply a delight, even to those Hup owners who were completely satisfied before.

It is more than ever the car of the American family, because comfort—the first consideration—has been immeasurably increased; because the cushions are deeper and softer; because there's more room to relax and stretch, front and rear.

It is a bigger car, a better car—and therefore a more faithful friend, a more loyal servant, to the American family.

of our most progressive American housewives have polled their votes for the "SAVORY" Roaster and are using it in their kitchens daily. They have found that it roasts meat, fowl or fish to a distinctive richness unobtainable in an ordinary roaster and that with meat, for example, they can produce a first-class roast from even a second-choice cut in the

"SAVORY" Roaster

Being self-basting and self-browning, no water need be added and the lid need not be lifted until the roast is done. The steam from the juice of the meat does the basting, and none of the fragrant meaty flavor is allowed to escape. It is easily cleaned, as it has an oval bottom that can be wiped like a china dish.

There's only one make of this celebrated roaster—so be sure to ask your hardware or general store dealer for the "SAVORY" and be sure to get it.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Getting Out of Ruts*

IN THESE days of "good roads," we are apt to forget what it was like to drive over frozen country roads in winter, or, worse still, through the deep spring mud when, as the farmers say, "the bottom has come out." Still, there are enough "dirt roads" left to make the matter of ruts familiar to many of us. Even automobile roads are sometimes worn into ruts which it is the good driver's business to keep out of. The indolent or selfish driver keeps in the ruts. He does not care that he is making them worse for those who will follow. It is easier to keep in than to get out, so he stays in.

In social life, in business life, in mental life, in church and soul life, we are in perpetual danger of getting into ruts and staying in them. During recent years brain and nerve specialists have been emphasizing this matter of ruts and tracks in the brain. If a person gets to thinking about one thing too much he will inflame and strain the part of his brain used to do that thinking, and may, if he does not get out of that "rut," become switched off the main track of sane thinking. If the mind is stuffed too full of material of one kind, if it is forced to do its work in accordance with certain fixed principles and rules, it may become so set that, even if the old principles and rules are wrong, it is practically impossible for the mind to leave the old ideas and to receive the new-found truth.

Some change or shock is needed to jar us out of these ruts and start us on a better way. It is a good thing, even in one's daily work, to do occasionally something decidedly different, something that is not on the day's program at all. Often if you have a hard task to do, a hard problem to work out, it pays to leave it for a while to dip into a book, to take a walk, to talk with a friend, to have a bit of fun—then to go back to the task or the problem with a mind fresher and stronger to take it up.

But often something more serious is needed. European civilization felt quite secure in its smooth and prosperous course, but the terrible shock of the war has demonstrated how unstable that civilization really was. While we need not believe that this dreadful war was unavoidable and necessary, yet we can believe that out of it may come a civilization juster, fairer and better than that which is being so rudely broken up. It is encouraging to note that already among the warring nations people are becoming more worshipful. Churches are crowded and people are learning new secrets of prayer. So sometimes a great grief or trouble will stir up a soul or a church to seek a higher and better way. There is one way in which we may administer such a shock to ourselves at almost any time, and that is by making ourselves realize how much more we ought to be accomplishing than we are. The vision of our worthlessness ought to shock us into a determination to do something different and something better. When we realize that our inefficiency is really sinful, that we are condemned not only for wrong things we do but for good things that we do not do, we should be stirred to repentance and to new resolves.

In one sense what a society needs, however, is not so much a spiritual, but a merely mechanical change. It is a sad thing when one person or a small group of persons controls the affairs of a society for a long time. New blood, new ideas, new plans, will help to get any society out of the rut. The old leaders should not be thrust aside suddenly or rashly. Get them to co-operate in making the change. They will see the value, if the matter is put to them tactfully, of training up new workers to take their place when they are gone.

The greater or smaller conventions, now so prominent a feature of church and welfare work, provide splendid opportunities for spiritual "lifts" into a more vigorous and fruitful life. A sermon, a song, a report, a Bible reading—out of these will flash a new light, will sound a new note, and we become suddenly capable of better things. But—and here is the most hopeful and helpful fact of the whole matter—we do not need to go away; we do not need any great sermon or great song to lift us out of the ruts we may have gotten into. A look at Jesus will do it. Often we are so engrossed, it may be even with our work, that we forget to look at him. We think how work has been done in the past, how others are doing it or telling us how to do it, but do not think of looking at him. Let us make this "anti-rut" meeting a time of getting back to him, a time of saying: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" a time of vowing, as we recall spiritual uplifts of the past, that we will "not be disobedient to the heavenly vision."

The American City*

IN NEW YORK CITY the death rate among infants has been reduced in six years from 144 to 102 for every thousand babies. Forty-two out of every thousand babies saved, who would have died if some people had not done some hard thinking and hard working. When we look at the babies in our own homes and shudder at the thought of the anguish we should suffer if they were taken away, we may get some idea of what it means to have these thousands saved.

Yet this next item, also from the metropolis, is not so satisfactory. It is reported that during the last eighteen months there have been eighty thousand cases of eviction proceedings in New York. But here again there is a gleam of better things, for a number of city officials are now at work on plans for organizing a Tenants' and Landlords' Commission, which shall try to prevent this form of suffering from falling upon the worthy poor.

To meet the sadness of the fact that every winter there are thousands of homeless and hungry men in New York is the fact that thousands of them are fed in the Bowery Mission Bread Line and other institutions.

Along with all these practical steps goes the direct preaching of the Gospel to the poor, in the open air, in shops and tents, in mission and Salvation Army halls. The Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations are taking up and pushing new plans for helping the young people among the workers. But the work remaining to be done in the American cities is staggering to contemplate. We must not only try to relieve their hideous poverty, but also to get at the causes of it and prevent its very existence. This will be a hard winter for the poor in the cities. The unsettled conditions, due to the war, will make unemployment a far more serious problem than even last winter, which was bad enough.

Although immigration has greatly decreased during the war, foreigners are still coming. And our duty to evangelize the foreign element of our population is plain and the call to perform the duty strong. Our cities have need of Christ. Only his Spirit and power can make them what they ought to be.

* "The Home Missionary Opportunity in Our Cities." Matt. 8: 5-10; 16: 2, 3; Luke 10: 1, 2; John 4: 4-19. Epworth League Topic for Sunday, November 8, 1914.

THINK HARD

It Pays To Think About Food.

The unthinking life some people lead often causes trouble and sickness, illustrated in the experience of a lady over in Wis.

"About four years ago I suffered dreadfully from indigestion, always having eaten whatever I liked, not thinking of the digestible qualities. This indigestion caused palpitation of the heart so badly I could scarcely walk up a flight of stairs without stopping to regain breath and strength.

"I became alarmed and tried dieting, wore my clothes very loose, and used other remedies, but found no relief.

"Hearing of the virtues of Grape-Nuts and Postum, I commenced using them in place of my usual breakfast of coffee, cakes or hot biscuit, and in one week's time I was relieved of sour stomach and other ills attending indigestion. In a month's time my heart was performing its functions naturally and I could climb stairs and hills and walk long distances.

"I gained ten pounds in this short time, and my skin became clear and I completely regained my health and strength. I continue to use Grape-Nuts and Postum for I feel that I owe my good health entirely to their use.

"I like the delicious flavor of Grape-Nuts and by making Postum according to directions, it tastes similar to mild high grade coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The most perfect food in the world. Trial of Grape-Nuts and cream 10 days proves. "There's a Reason."

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

DR. C. D. W., PENNSYLVANIA. Continental Gas & Electric Corporation first lien collateral trust [illegible] per cent. gold bonds [illegible] They are sold "tax refund" in your State and in denominations of $100. Your $400 will purchase four bonds.

MRS. D. E. M., MAINE. Five per cent. and even five and one-half per cent. interest may be obtained from sound public utility bonds. Omaha & Council Bluffs Street Railway first 5s may now be bought from bankers at 96, and will return at this price about 5.40 per cent. We regard these bonds with favor.

P. D. S., VERMONT. (1) Twin State Gas & Electric Company paid its regular quarterly dividend of 1¼ on the preferred stock October 1. (2) Yes, by all means!

REV. C. C., IOWA. American Express stock is quoted at 100, the price fixed on the closing day of the Exchange, July 30. It is doubtful if you could get this figure, and we recommend you to abandon your effort to sell until the Exchange reopens. At 100 your stock yields 6 per cent.

B. B. R., VIRGINIA. American Car & Foundry 7 per cent. preferred at 112 is attractive, although the stock may recede in price when the Exchange reopens. There is no present indication that the dividend is in danger. The company has no bonds outstanding.

MRS. N. E. D., FLORIDA. The common stock of the General Motors Company is not an investment issue.

MRS. D. D., NEW YORK. (1) No market exists for Chicago-New York Electric Air Line Stock. (2) Several members of the notorious Barr Brothers firm were convicted of defrauding investors and sent to jail.

J. B., KENTUCKY. The Canadian black fox industry seems to be organized principally as an excuse to sell stock. The scheme seems to lend itself admirably to the preparation of alluring literature. Keep out!

F. P. P., NEW YORK. Recent quotations for the 6 per cent. bonds of the Simpson Securities Company are 65 bid, 85 asked. It is doubtful that you could sell in the present market. The security back of the bonds, the building occupied by the Simpson, Crawford Corporation, is said to be sufficient to protect the bondholders in case of trouble.

C. E. Y., ARKANSAS. Take the matter to a good lawyer. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot advise in legal matters.

F. D. F., MASSACHUSETTS. Apparently the New Haven Railroad is still far from "Easy Street." According to the recent annual statement the income account suffered to the extent of $8,653,574. The stock is liable to have many a jolt before "Easy Street" is reached. At present the stock must be regarded as speculative to a high degree.

MRS. T. T. A., CONNECTICUT. You may obtain the new New Haven 30-year 4½ per cent. park bonds from the same New Haven firm which supplied your New Haven Water Company stock. The firm took the entire $100,000. The bonds are very high class—too much so, perhaps, for your requirements, for the firm is offering them on a very low interest basis. Look into the merits of New Haven Gas Light Company stock. The company paid dividends at the rate of 10 per cent. from 1848 to 1903 inclusive; 8 per cent. paid since.

A. K. W., GEORGIA. The United States Steel Corporation is not believed to be earning the 7 per cent. preferred dividend, let alone the 5 per cent. dividend on the common stock. There is talk of passing the common dividend. Hence the common stock at 50 doesn't look very attractive.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

ANOTHER item of the best possible news! O. McA., of Frost, Texas, writes: "I want to acknowledge answer to prayer for a special spiritual blessing, and for a good revival at our church here." A Happy Wife writes from Arkansas: "Some time ago I asked the League to pray for my husband that he might quit the drink habit and be reclaimed. Our prayers have been answered. He has been made to rejoice in a Saviour's love and has come back to the church." So writes a happy wife from Arkansas. A mother writes from Ohio to say that prayers offered that her son might overcome the drink habit have been answered." M. G. writes from Lowell, Mass.: "I wish to acknowledge God's answer to my prayer for the recovery of my mother when ill with pneumonia." Mrs. A. T. P., of Frederica, Del., writes: "I had a severe trouble with one of my eyes. I asked the Lord to spare my sight if it was his will, and he did so. I praise him for his goodness." Mrs. E. L. W. writes from Mansfield, Ohio: "I prayed earnestly that my daughter, who was very ill, might be cured of her affliction and restored to health. God has heard and answered my prayers."

Miss H. S. writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "I would like to report two remarkable cases of answered prayer. One of a young man taken to the hospital for appendicitis. His condition after the operation was, in the judgment of doctors and nurses, hopeless. His recovery was prompt and complete, after prayer had been made by a special little band of Christian women. The sequel of the matter of fact nurse was: 'That beats all our records.' The other case was of a husband and father often in drink. Since prayers were offered by this circle of women he has been a changed man." Mrs. R. P. R., of Chamblee, Ga., writes: "Some months ago I asked prayer for my brother, who was very sick. God has graciously answered that prayer."

M. E. T. writes from Pomeroy, Pa., to acknowledge answers to prayer for relief from affliction; M. H., of Paterson, N. J., for deliverance from harm; Mrs. B. B. V., for the lifting of a burden. W. T., of Philadelphia, Pa.; H. C. R., New Iberia, La.; Mrs. E. M. T., Jamestown, N. Y.; E. A. K., Cleveland, Ohio; Mrs. R. R. M., Chandler, Minn.; Mrs. S. F. G., Charlottesville, La., and Mrs. M. V., Morenci, Mich., acknowledge answers to prayers for other blessings for themselves or friends.

Mr. J. H. Fowler, who is a member of Mr. Sherwood Eddy's party now conducting evangelistic conferences in China under the auspices of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., sends this message to the Prayer League:

I write this line to thank you for your note of July 11 and your kindness in inserting the prayer request and our itineraries in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, also for sending me marked copies. This paper reaches such a wide constituency that we are profoundly thankful to have all the prayer behind us that these insertions will bring. We have just finished eight summer conferences with the students and missionaries throughout China, and have had great blessing. By the time you receive this we will be in the midst of the great evangelistic campaign among non-Christian students. Please continue to pray for God's blessing upon us during the remainder of our tour.

The following true and thoughtful letter comes from M. R. G., of Leedey, Okla.:

While so much is being said about praying for the war to cease, I should like to add a little word. Let us CHRISTIAN HERALD readers pray that God's love may flow through the hearts of those at the head of our nation as God would have it, that God's love may find

WHAT CAUSES COLDS?

This question and "How to Prevent Colds" is asked a thousand times every day. A cold is really a fever, not always caused by the weather but due to a disordered condition of the blood or lack of important food-elements. In changing seasons fat-foods are essential because they distribute heat by enriching the blood and so render the body better able to withstand the varying elements.

This is the underlying reason why the medicinal fats in Scott's Emulsion quickly overcome colds and build strength to prevent more serious sickness. It contains nature's medicinal fats, so skillfully prepared that the blood profits from every drop, and it is free from harmful drugs or alcohol.

AUTUMN FOLIAGE

THE coming of a new baby eclipses all other items of household interest. Everything connected with his well-being instantly becomes a matter of extreme scrutiny and care.

Two of the most important things are his daily bath and the cleansing of his clothes. And the most important part of each of these is the choice of soap.

The fact that physicians and nurses recommend Ivory Soap for this nursery use and that mothers trust implicitly to it shows that Ivory must be the highest grade soap that can be made.

For only a pure soap of the best quality can be used on a baby's delicate skin without making it smart and burn. And only an equally pure and mild soap can keep his garments so soft and sweet that the tender body will not be chafed.

This Booklet Free to Mothers

This "Baby Book" is a dependable guide to the rearing of healthy, happy children. Its author, Elizabeth Robinson Scovil, is an authority on this subject, and the information which she gives on feeding, clothing, treatment of minor ailments, etc., is very valuable. THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

DURING the past week the fighting on the firing line of the so-called battle of the Aisne has been intermittent, except on its western end, where the strength of the combat has centered.

There have been some rumors or reports of an attack with bombardment by the Germans on Belfort, at the extreme east of the line, of a French invasion of lower Alsace under General Pau, and of a French attack on Metz, at one time stated as on the point of being besieged by a French army coming from Nancy, but one and all of these reports appear to repose on no solid foundation.

From Belfort to Lille quietness on both sides has been the rule and fighting the exception; what little fighting there has been has been hottest around the key position of Verdun. There both sides have from time to time attempted to improve their positions, or to eject the enemy from his, and as far as we are informed without much result one way or the other.

The truth is that both sides along this hundred and fifty miles of front are so strongly established in deep entrenchments, well provided with small artillery, and so protected in the front by mined ground, wire entanglements, "wolves' holes," and all the other devices known to military art, and so supported by heavy artillery in the rear, as to put the possibility of a successful frontal attack almost completely out of the question.

TRENCH FILLED WITH FRENCH DEAD

The form of trench being used is a very elaborate one, over eight feet deep and six wide, roofed over flatly and turfed so as not to be readily noticed by aircraft, and sloping from front to back to a drain in order to keep the trench as dry as possible. On the side towards the enemy, between the roof and the ground forming the front wall, is a space a few inches wide through which the enemy can be watched, and the rifle and artillery fire of the occupants of the trench directed, to which a narrow dirt platform built above the level of the floor of the trench and along its front wall gives access. At intervals, chambers are dug back from the rear wall of the trench in which men sleep, cook, etc. Another form of chamber is sometimes dug under ground from the front wall of the trench, for the same purposes. Both kinds of chambers, or to describe them more vividly and perhaps more accurately, holes in the ground, get their light and air from the main trench.

It is now over a month that the German line has been burrowed in this sort of construction, and nearly a month since the Allies have followed their example, and the results seem to prove conclusively that this sort of fortification resists artillery far better than the massive constructions of steel, stone and concrete which we have hitherto called fortresses. These trenches offer no target, projecting not more than a very few inches comparatively above the ground, and an artillery projectile to do any harm must fall either in a trench or within a very few feet of it.

These trenches are connected with each other and with the general in command, perhaps miles to the rear, by field telephones, so that this general always has the situation thoroughly in hand, and can send men hither and thither as needed. Life in the trenches under the best of circumstances cannot be extremely agreeable, and in a long continued spell of bad weather is not only very trying, but men are apt to become the prey of disease.

I referred last week to the measures taken by the English and Germans for combating the diseases which have broken out among the troops confined in such trenches as I have attempted to describe above, and it seems appropriate here to say that the reports which have come forward during the past week do not indicate that the sanitary conditions are improving, rather the reverse, so that there has been an increase of physical disability. Imagine being very ill with pneumonia, or typhoid, under such conditions, and with an almost total lack of nursing, what little nursing there is being by men.

My own experience possibly biases me, as regards the value of men as nurses, because I have found that if there is one thing that a man cannot do in this world even with the best will in the world, and that often is lacking, it is to nurse a sick person. He is clumsy and awkward and as a rule almost as irritable as his patient. What a woman accomplishes quietly and without fuss or effort in such cases, he makes a mountain of, and worries and frets his patient sometimes almost beyond endurance.

On the extreme end of the line the fighting this last week has been at times really severe. After the fall of Antwerp the Germans occupied in rapid succession Ghent, Bruges and Ostend, the remnants of the Belgian army and the two British naval brigades fleeing before them. After taking Ostend the Germans advanced south along the Belgian coast with the apparent intention of attacking Dunkirk and Calais, the most northerly of the French coast towns.

On arriving at Nieuport, a small place just north of the French border in Belgium, they found a composite army of the Belgians, English naval brigades, and the extreme western end of the main army of the Allies, drawn across their path and prepared to give them battle. This battle has waged with alternate advances and retreats nearly the whole week, and is still undecided. The nearness to the coast permitted the British to make use of their sea forces to shell the German troops. Three vessels of the monitor type, which at the beginning of the war were building in England for Brazil and which England took over, whose light draught permitted them to approach close to the shore, proved of peculiar value and service in this work. The result has been that the Germans were obliged to abandon the shore and retreat inland beyond the range of the guns of the ships. The Germans are said to have lost heavily during this engagement in killed and wounded. General von Trip is reported among the killed, and the German advance into France has been halted, perhaps permanently for this winter at least.

On the other parts of this line, from a little eastward of Nieuport, the fighting also has been very severe during the week. Ypres changes hands so often that it is difficult at any particular moment to tell who is the possessor. The Germans still hold Lille, having succeeded in repulsing several heavy attacks of the Allies. The other small towns along the line seem to be in the case of Ypres; one day the Germans are in control and the next the French. On the whole the fighting has been indecisive, in the sense that neither side has made any real advance.

It need not surprise any one if the final winter position selected by the Germans is along a line drawn from Antwerp to Courtrai and thence to Lille. Their taking up this position will necessitate the abandonment by them of western Belgium with the cities of Ostend, Ghent and Bruges. On the other hand the position indicated consolidates their forces and improves their railroad and other lines of communication. Reports are that entrenchments are now being constructed along this line.

At Antwerp the situation seems to be improving. The damage done to the town itself proves insignificant and easily repaired. Many of its inhabitants who fled to Holland are now returning, reassured, and some business is beginning. Arrangements have been completed with the British and German Governments for permitting the food supplies contributed by America for the relief of Brussels to go forward to that city.

Many of the Belgian refugees in Great Britain announce their intention of not returning to their country as long as the Germans are in control. Estimates of their number vary from one hundred to three hundred thousand, but even the smaller figure constitutes a problem in relief work. Most of them are without funds, or their funds are so placed as to be unavailable, and winter is nearing. Some of them announce their intention of coming to America.

The French Government apparently is making preparations to return to Paris, as it is said that the French Parliament will meet there and not in Bordeaux. This would seem to indicate a growing confidence among the French as to the ultimate course of events during the winter.

All the armies now in the field will shortly be confronted with the very difficult problem of recruiting new officers. The mortality among the officers, particularly the British, has been very high indeed, and how to replace them is rapidly becomin a burning question. Promotions from the ran solves the problem only partly, as comparative few non-commissioned officers are suitable to u dertake the greater responsibilities of a commi sioned officer. As the war progresses this difficul will grow greater.

SHELL-PROOF SHELTER IN ENTRENCHMENT

During the week a ripple of excitement has bee caused by the action of Great Britain in seizir several American vessels laden wi oil and bound for neutral ports. O of these, the *J. D. Complaints are still making the selves heard in relation to the doin of the censors, but while these are doubt in some degree well founde still the interests of the combati countries must be considered a su cient excuse for seemingly arbitra action, and in any event those w feel aggrieved can console themsel with the reflection that no amount censorship can destroy the facts; t only result is to postpone pub knowledge thereof.

The news from the Balkans is the vague character that news fr that quarter has lately assumed. FIRST INSTALMENT FROM RELIEF FUND READY FOR USE AMONG REFUGEES

ON WEDNESDAY, October 28, Mr. Theodore Waters, secretary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sailed for Europe on the ner Adriatic to complete the arrangements for the distribution of the HRISTIAN HERALD Fund for the Relief f the Widows and Orphans of the Var, and to direct the disposition of he first remittance from the fund, 30,000.

It is Mr. Waters' intention, as soon s he arrives, to get in conference with mbassador Page at London and with he English Committee of THE CHRISIAN HERALD fund, and arrange for nmediate relief work among the Belian refugees in England. From there Ir. Waters is to proceed to Holland nd Belgium, where he will confer ith the American ambassadors nd the members of the relief ommittee in those countries, and ake final arrangements for the andling of the fund there. If onditions permit, he will also go o Paris and complete the plans or work in France. The possiilities of travel and other onsiderations will determine hether he shall meet with the embers of the committee for ermany and other countries.

As a result of these important onferences we have every reaon to believe that by the time his issue of THE CHRISTIAN ERALD is in our readers' hands he actual work of relieving sufering in the war zone will have een begun in earnest.

As will be seen by letters from ishop Hartzell in part reproduced on this page, the formaon of the CHRISTIAN HERALD elief Committee abroad has roceeded with enthusiasm, and Ir. Waters' visits will give final hape to all the plans, and set he entire machinery in motion. ust prior to sailing, Mr. Watrs was in conference at Washgton with officials of the State epartment, and at the embasies of the various countries now at ar. The CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund is ssured of active co-operation in all hese quarters for the furtherance of ur work among the distressed. The nterest that is being taken by officials f this and other lands in this fund ust prove an added stimulus to the generosity of our readers. The utmost confidence is expressed in the ability of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family to give a large sum to such a cause. We hope to have a substantial second remittance on its way to the committee before this issue is in your hands.

Mr. Waters expects to gather much first-hand information respecting the conditions and outlook, and will report to our readers the progress of the relief work while he is abroad. There will be a duplication on a vast scale of the wonderful scenes of gratitude that were evoked in former experiences of this kind, and when you realize what your gifts, small and large, are doing for these pitiable people you will surely take deep satisfaction in having had a part in this work.

WITH all our experience in the handling of relief funds in the name of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, we think we have never had quite the same gripping sense of the vital urgency of the need. Great and imperative as were the necessities in the time of the China famine, in Sicily when earthquake and volcano overthrew that island's homes, at Johnstown in our own land in the time of terror from flood; intense and real as were the needs then met, there is an indefinable something in the present catastrophe that touches human sympathies with an irresistible appeal. We rejoice in the quick response which is being made by our readers. The thousands of letters that reach us containing gifts by their expressions of interest convince us that Christian America is about to make one of the greatest gifts of mercy in all the grievous history of the world's calamities.

In the week that has closed the fund has advanced from $20,122.03 to $30,054.93. The daily receipts are steadily increasing. A second remittance will follow close on the heels of the first. Will an offering from you be included? We wish to quote two letters selected from a great many, all of equal significance:

"I WANT to do a little to relieve the sufferings from the awful war, what I am sending, use where it is most needed. I feel there should be no national lines drawn in this charity. I enclose $11.25, contributed as follows:

Myself and wife	$5.00
Nelson Lorenson	2.00
Edith Lorenson	2.00
My little boys, one aged 11	1.00
" " 9	.75
" " 7	.50

"They (the boys) earned this picking up potatoes. I told them they would have to go without some toy or other thing they wanted to buy. They said they had rather do this than have those little children starve.

"O. B. GRIFFIN,
"Caribou, Me."

"ENCLOSED you will find a money order for $13 for the Widows and Orphans Fund as per your advertisement in the Sunday School Times. The money was donated by the employees of the office department, and was cheerfully given in response to your advertisement.

"H. F. MCINTYRE, Cashier."

HOW many thousand grieving women shall we now inspire with courage and hope for the future? How many little children, who have been driven from their homes with scarcely clothing enough for summer-time on their backs, shall we dress in warm, serviceable garments in which to stand the fast-approaching winter? How many daily meals shall we set before these homeless exiles while they adjust themselves to their terrible situation to make a new start in life? How literally and practically and unremittingly shall we carry out that yearning command of our Lord, "Feed my sheep"? By "we," we mean every man, woman and child in the big-hearted CHRISTIAN HERALD Family.

TWO MESSAGES FROM BISHOP HARTZELL

LONDON, October 9, 1914.

To The Christian Herald, New York:

My Dear Brethren—On yesterday I had an interview with our American ambassador, Mr. Page, and also lunch with Rev. Dr. Dickson, whom you have requested to organize a Relief Committee to receive and disburse such funds as you may send to London for the relief of the widows and orphans of those killed in the war. Several names were canvassed and fixed upon as suitable. Two of these I was to see, viz.: Earl Grey and Sir Robert W. Perks. I saw the latter yesterday afternoon, and he will be pleased to serve. He is a member of Parliament, is easily the leading layman of British Methodism and a man of very large financial interests. I had breakfast this morning with Earl Gray, by special appointment, and he will gladly serve. He was the former Governor General of Canada and is at the front of many large financial and philanthropic movements. He is, of course, a member of the House of Lords, and is also a cousin of Sir Edward Grey, the British Foreign Secretary. He is a cosmopolitan in sympathy, and was greatly pleased when I told him that your paper represented perhaps more fully the Christian sympathies in America irrespective of church relations than any other publication.

LONDON, E. C., October 13, 1914.

Mr. Dickson is quite enthusiastic over getting your Committee in fine shape in London. I am leaving for North Africa in a few days and will spend the day in Paris and will see Dr. Hiatt, pastor of the American church there, and will from him, no doubt, learn what has been accomplished in that city. Everything indicates, I fear, a long war, and there will be need of such benevolence as the Christian world has never given before to care for those who are really worthy and in great need.

Sincerely and faithfully yours,
(Signed) J. C. HARTZELL.

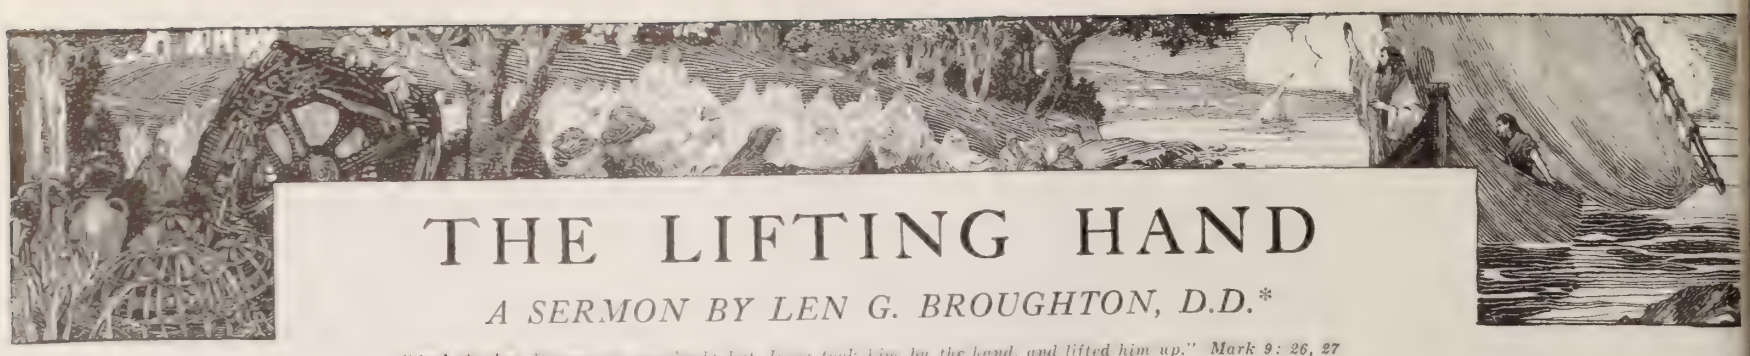
THE SKY THEIR ROOF, STONES THEIR FLOOR



THE LIFTING HAND

A SERMON BY LEN G. BROUGHTON, D.D.*

"And the boy became as one dead; but Jesus took him by the hand, and lifted him up." Mark 9: 26, 27

IN ORDER for us to properly appreciate this case I think it is necessary for us to go back and briefly review the story of the Transfiguration. You will remember that Jesus took with him on the Mount of Transfiguration Peter, James and John. And when he started with them up the mountain to pray and to be transfigured, he left the rest of his disciples down in the valley, at the base of the mountain, to grapple with the multitude and deal with the ordinary commonplace things of life. I have often wondered why it was that Jesus took these three disciples and left the rest. I have heard it suggested that he took them, perhaps, because of their superior spirituality; that inasmuch as he was going to be transfigured he desired to have with him only the most spiritual of his disciples.

I do not know what you think of it, but that does not fit into my way of thinking. And since he does not tell us the reason why, I think we may be excused for using our own judgment concerning it. I do not believe at all that Jesus took these three disciples because they were the most spiritual. They may have been the most spiritual; I do not know about that; but I do not believe that was the reason, for to me it takes a great deal more spirituality to be left than it does to go.

And then, again, I think it takes a great deal more spirituality to grapple with the ordinary commonplace in a crowd than it does to attend a prayer meeting or a convention. I do not know any task greater than that imposed upon those disciples left at the foot of the hill with Jesus away; that great crowd, with those squabbling church officials shouting questions at them every moment.

I think if I had to judge about this matter I should say that Jesus took Peter, James and John because they were not so well prepared as the rest, and especially Peter. For I have no doubt that had he remained there in the valley with that crowd he would have said some things that would have needed patching up a bit. Let us not get into our heads that because we are given the privilege of attending conferences and going to prayer meetings we are essentially better than people who cannot attend because of other duties which they cannot escape.

But they went, and while they were praying Jesus was transfigured before them; that is to say, he was metamorphosed, which is a biological word and means a change without, wrought from within. Jesus was not transfigured by a light from without. He was transfigured by a light from within. He was not transfigured for the purpose of revealing his deity; he was transfigured by the outworking of a perfected humanity.

Christ's Personal Contact

THERE were two occasions in the life of Jesus when he stood out separate and distinct as a man. One on the Mount of Temptation. Jesus was tempted there as man, not as God. He was God, but he was man, too; and he was tempted as man and he conquered as man indwelt and mastered by the Spirit of God. It was so that he might teach us how we also may conquer.

And the other occasion when he divested himself of his deity was that of the Transfiguration. Jesus in the Transfiguration is revealing his perfected humanity. Peter when he beheld this transfigured glory said, "Lord, it is good for us to be here; let us build three tabernacles: one for thee, one for Moses, and one for Elias." And you know what happened. A cloud overshadowed them. A cloud always comes over us when we dare to put any other man on a level with Jesus. Never mind how good he is or how great, whenever we put any other man on a level with Jesus, a cloud comes over our spiritual eyes. Happy is the man who, as he looks at the prophets, can see them give place to Jesus only!

Following this, Jesus, with these three disciples, came down the mountain side. When they got to the base of the mountain they found a great crowd, the crowd which the rest of the disciples were left to attend to, and they were asking questions of the disciples. Jesus walked up and said, "Why question ye with them?" This was as much as to say, "If you want to know anything, ask me; I am here." Just then a man came pressing his way through the crowd; his son was possessed with a demon, and he said, "Master, my son is possessed of a demon, and I brought him to your disciples, and they could not heal him, and I have brought him to you." Then Jesus turns and says to his disciples, "O faithless and perverse generation! . . . bring him to me."

And the father brings the lad to Jesus, and Jesus speaks the word and drives the demon out of him. "And he became as one dead." Mind, he was very much alive before. So long as he had the demon in him he was a very live lad, giving a great deal of disturbance in the community. But the moment Jesus drove the demon out of him "he became as one dead."

I can see him lying there on the ground, after the demon has been driven out of him, perhaps limp, withered, unable to move; all we see him do is to breathe. He is as one dead. Then "Jesus took him by the hand and lifted him up."

The Other Man's Burden

NOW I want us to gather the essential lesson that this story has for us. As I see it, it is in five parts. First, it is the natural aftermath of the Transfiguration glory. In the Transfiguration glory our Lord gave us a glimpse of perfected humanity, as we have already seen; a humanity indwelt and mastered by the Spirit of God. In the present study he is giving us a glimpse of this present demoralized world, indwelt and mastered by the spirit of the devil.

Then in the next place he shows us the essential connection between glory and service. If the prayer meeting with Peter, James and John was essentially the first phase of the transfiguration glory, the work in the valley with this demoniac boy was its essential aftermath. The prayer meeting was the glory in preparation, and the work upon this lad in the valley was the glory in operation.

In the next place, it indicates to us the character of the work that has to be done. In 1911 there was held in the city of New York what was known as "a Child Welfare Exhibition." It was one of the most thrilling exhibitions ever held in any part of the world. At the front gate of the exhibition grounds there was a statue of Louis Potter, and there were four figures in it. And these four figures taken together have done more to stir up that country than a thousand sermons. In that group there was a woman, having on her back a heavy burden, and she was bending forward under the pressure of it. Next to her was a man of about the same age, who had on his shoulders a great pack, much larger than the pack on her shoulders, and he was bent forward under his load. Next to him was an old man with long white hair, and his knees were greatly bent, and he was almost in the act of falling under a pack that rested upon his shoulders.

And then, in the half-circle which they made, and just a bit in front of them, there was a little boy, two-thirds naked, with pinched face, hollow eyes, shrunken shoulders, narrow chest; a sad look, indicating that he was half-starved for food and more than half-starved for pure air and healthy, wholesome exercise. He had no pack on his shoulders. He carried his pack in his body. He was the child of this man and this woman, who had all that they could carry. In that statue there was the world represented, the world of need; the need of the father, the head of the family, with all that he could carry; the need of the mother and the wife of the home, with all that she could carry; the need of the aged, trembling under their load, with all that they could carry; and the need of the child, more than it could carry; and no hand outstretched to help any of them.

When I sat and looked at that statue I said, "I would to God I were an artist that I could make one to put in its place. I would reproduce these figures, and then out in front I would have the Church of Jesus Christ with the outstretched hand to help."

We will keep on talking about lost members until we get to the place where we give ourselves to the method of the Master. What was his method? It was to take such by the hand and lift them up.

Then again we see here an indication of the methods that should be adopted in all our effort to relieve human need of whatever kind. Jesus did two things with the lad. He healed him; no one else could do that; and he helped him to his feet after he was healed. Oh, what a suggestion that is to us! The world needs something more than what we call salvation.

From Death Into Life

I ALWAYS think of the story of a dear old friend now in glory, when I am speaking of these people. Before he was converted he was almost a vagabond. He was a drunkard; he owed everybody in his community. They would then only trust him for cash. But one night in a Methodist church a Methodist minister asked everybody that would accept Jesus out-and-out to get up and come to the front and take his hand as a declaration of the fact. He was sitting away back in the congregation. At home were his half-starved children and his heart-broken wife. It was a cold night. They had not enough covering for their beds, and the little feet of his children had never known what a shoe meant.

And he went forward and took that man by the hand, and looked him in the eyes straight and said: "Yes, I will, sir." Everybody there, I think, had seen him do that half a dozen times before, and they began to say to one another, "He has got religion again." And as he started back to his seat he saw a man sitting just back of him to whom he owed a great deal of money. He was a member and an official of that church. He saw him sitting there, and he said, "I just looked down on the floor. I could hardly walk to my seat. I knew he was going to dun me as soon as I sat down, for that is just how hard-hearted he always had been. I sat down somehow. I do not know how I got into the seat; I put my head on the pew rail in front of me, not so much to pray as to get as far as I could from him. But I could not get far enough. He could reach me, and though he thought I was praying, that did not make any difference to him. I was not praying. I was thinking how I could face that man, for I meant business with him.

"Then I felt something touch me in the back and I paid no attention to it because I knew what it was. The same thing had touched me in other places before, and I knew its touch, although it was in a different spot. And it kept on touching until I could not bear another touch, and I turned round and said, 'What do you want?' And he said, 'Come round here.' I had nothing else to do. I sat down there, and he put his arm around me and said, 'I have always loved you, old fellow; I have always believed that there would come a time when you would turn over a new leaf. It has been a long time coming, but I somehow have a feeling that this time you are going to stick, and whether you are or not, I believe you are. And I want you to come round tomorrow and let me give you a clear receipt for all that you owe me. And let me give winter shoes for your children and dresses for your wife, and enough groceries to carry you on until you can get on your feet; for I believe God has got something for you to do.'"

And he said: "What do you think I did?" I said, "I do not know what you did." He said, "I got right up and went up to that preacher and said, 'Look here, I have got the second blessing.'" And those who knew him are prepared to believe that he did get it. And there would be many another struggling under a load who would say the same thing if we would stop talking about their weakness and begin to express hope. You can burst a bank if you will go on talking about it; and you can make a bank by praising it and encouraging it.

Now just a word of summarizing. Let me say five things in single sentences.

First, the strength of the church is determined in the field of human need.

Secondly, if we have the privileges of the mountain at any time, at any place, anywhere, it is for one purpose and one purpose only: that we may get strength for the valley.

Third, our work for our fellows is never done until we have lifted them on their feet.

Fourth, the medium of divine power is often found in the touch of the outstretched hand.

Fifth, let us follow the example of Jesus.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, November 8. Matthew 18: 10. "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven." After announcing terrible woes against the offenders, our Lord returns once more to the subject of the little ones in his kingdom. He is aware of their being despised by men. Even among his immediate followers a spirit had been manifested that clearly doubted whether children can enter into covenant relation with God, and be admitted to the privileges which Christ extends to the members of his church. God has made his holy angels ministering spirits, and they are ministering also to children as to heirs of the salvation which God has prepared for all. They rejoice also over the faith of the smallest and simplest member of the church. Therefore, let men take heed, lest by their views and treatment of children, they forfeit the companionship of the holy angels and of God.

MONDAY, November 9. Matthew 18: 11. "For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost." Here is the reason for the Saviour's cordial concern about children: they share with the rest of mankind that state of estrangement from God which has ensued upon the entering in of sin among men; and they are embraced in the rescuing mission of the Redeemer. Just as the fall of Adam was, in its effects, a universal calamity and extended to every one that is born of the flesh, so the grace of God that bringeth salvation has appeared to all men in the incarnate Son of God. When we consider the connection in which the words of our text are spoken, we must feel something of the joy which filled the Saviour's heart when he declared the great task of reclaiming lost mankind to which his whole life was consecrated. He had spoken in terrible words of sins and offenses and of the everlasting doom of the wicked. Anon he will speak of the trespassing brother who will not listen to admonition. In the midst of these and deliverances he remembers his function as Saviour of all. His heart yearns for the restoration to divine favor of all who justly forfeited that favor. We, too, must rebuke sin, but in so doing we must bear in mind that it is our duty and our privilege to reclaim the sinner from the error of his way.

TUESDAY, November 10. Matthew 18: 12-14. "How think ye? if a man have a hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountains, and seeketh that which is gone astray? And if so be that he find it, verily I say unto you, he rejoiceth more of that sheep, than of the ninety and nine which went not astray. Even so it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish." We shall meet with this parable again, spoken under different circumstances and for a different purpose. The context in this place shows the zeal of the Saviour in overcoming scandals which have destroyed the faith of his simple followers. The strayed sheep is some Christian, whom wicked men, by their offensive teaching and practices, have drawn away from the fold of the church. The Lord had declared that in the present state of the world such offenses were unavoidable. They cannot disrupt his church entirely. There will always be Christians who are not carried away by the designs of wicked men. But if any child of God is led aside, the Saviour is at once after that one, and his quest is more eager than the efforts of those who had led the believer astray. He is not content with having still quite a number of followers who remain faithful; he wants to recover the one unfaithful disciple. Not one must perish if he can help it. He does not coerce anyone to side with him. He goes and pleads with the strayed, calling after them in terms of heart-winning mercy. And when his effort by conquering grace is crowned with success, his joy is great. Thus even the scandalous acts of wicked men become occasions for the manifestation of greater love and zeal by Christ and his people.

WEDNESDAY, November 11. Matthew 18: 15. "Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." Offenses may occur within the Christian brotherhood, one believer sinning against another, or being observed in a wrongful act by another. Any sinful act of a Christian has the tendency to sever the bond of brotherhood existing between him and his fellow believers, even as it severs his child-relationship with the Father in heaven. In such a case, the Christian who knows of the fault of his brother, or who has been made to suffer through the wrongdoing of another, has a solemn duty to perform. His brother is in danger of losing his soul, and becoming lost to the Christian society. He must go and put the brother's fault plainly before him and show him in what danger he is. He must not wink at wrongdoing, or put off the warning that he must give his brother because it is such an unpleasant task. He owes the trespassing brother the charitable deed of a fraternal remonstrance. If all Christians would, in a spirit of meekness and kindliness, discharge this duty to one another, the church would be spared many a scandal. If the erring brother accepts the reproof of his fellow Christian the result is a distinct gain—a gain of a soul to God and to the Christian brotherhood. Brotherly admonition works no harm but brings blessing to the church.

THURSDAY, November 12. Matthew 18: 16. "But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established." According to Prov. 11: 13, a Christian must not reveal the secret faults of another. If by private remonstrance he has not succeeded in making the trespassing brother see the error of his way, he must commit the whole matter to God, who in the day of retribution will bring to light the things that were done in secret. But if the brother's fault is a public offense, of which the church will ultimately have to take notice, and private admonition has not convinced the erring brother, then the Christian should do what our text commands: seek the co-operation of one of two brethren, who will aid and support him in his charitable effort of leading the trespassing brother to a due knowledge of the sinfulness of his act and to a sense of shame and sorrow for it. Moreover, these co-operating brethren are to serve as witnesses who, on occasion, may testify to the church that the erring brother had been dealt with according to the command of the Lord, but refused to listen to the pleadings of Christian love. Here again the purpose is the same as before: to gain the brother for God and for the Christian brotherhood. Therefore, also, this second stage of fraternal admonition is a true act of Christian charity, from the exercise of which we should allow no secular consideration of any kind to dissuade or deter us.

FRIDAY, November 13. Matthew 18: 17. "And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican." The church in this text must mean the local congregation of believers, for that alone can be convened as a spiritual court of last resort to deal with an offending brother. It is the duty of a Christian congregation to resist decisions and offenses contrary to the doctrine which Christ and his apostles have taught. The church must not connive at wrongdoing among her members; she becomes a truant to her sacred trust of guardian over the faith once delivered unto the saints, and exposes herself to the ridicule of the world, if she permits open sinning on the part of her members. She must, by a powerful effort in which all the members join, seek to do that which the private remonstrance in the first stage of brotherly admonition, and the united pleading of several brethren in the second stage, failed to accomplish: viz., gain the erring brother over from his evil way to the paths of truth and right. Great is the success if the church gain the trespassing brother. God and his angels in heaven and the entire brotherhood on earth rejoice over the sinner that turns to repentance, and is restored to a child's relation with the heavenly Father and to a brother's relation among God's children. But the church has also the power to declare his standing within the Christian congregation forfeited, if the erring brother persists in his sin and obstinately refuses admonition, and even to declare him outside of the fold for his stubbornness.

SATURDAY, November 14. Matthew 18: 18. "Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." This text is a plain proof that the words spoken to Peter after his great confession were not intended to set up a primacy for Peter in the church. For the authority conferred on Peter, the spokesman of all the disciples, in Matthew 16, is here conferred on all the disciples; yea, as we shall see anon, on all believers. What the Lord said to Peter about the keys is merely figurative language. The keys are nothing distinct from the power to bind or loose. Our Lord has given to his church on earth the power to declare a person a heathen man and a publican or to declare him a penitent believer, whose sins God is ready to forgive. Sinners who have been forgiven are to convey to other sinners the comfort of forgiveness or denounce the sin of others who are obstinate.

DENOMINATIONAL NOTES OF INTEREST FROM THE FIELD

—ACCORDING TO INFORMATION just received by the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions, Dr. Robert C. Beebe, head of the Hillander Smith Memorial Hospital at Nanking, China, has been honored by President Yuan Shi Kai with the decoration of the "Golden Harvest." This was conferred for valuable service rendered by Dr. Beebe during the Chinese Revolution.

—THE AMERICAN BOARD was about to send a large group of reinforcements to the foreign missionary fields, but they are detained either in America or abroad. When possible these detained volunteers are taking courses of study looking to their greater efficiency on the field. Those under appointment to Aintab, Turkey, and to Sivas will spend a year at the Kennedy School of Missions at Hartford, studying Mohammedanism and allied subjects. Rev. and Mrs. Harold Cooper have reached England and will engage in study at Oxford. The two new medical missionaries for Beira, East Africa, are detained at Lisbon, Portugal, where they are studying the Portuguese language. A group of missionaries for India, booked to sail from England, September 30, will reach their field on a later date, their vessel having commandeered by the British Government. It is hoped by the board that the missionaries for West Africa will be able to sail at an early date.

—DR. WILLIAM H. MILLAR, secretary of the United Missionary Campaign, has just returned from an extended tour in the interest of the movement in the United States and Canada. The amount of work done is enormous, Mr. Millar said. The Central Committee composed of eighty members has met four times to outline the program of the campaign; the Executive Committee of seventeen members has held eight meetings during the past season, going over the details of the campaign; five hundred and fifty-seven interdenominational conferences were held throughout the United States and Canada to impress upon the small cities the objective of the campaign, and twenty-seven teams of speakers were organized to conduct these conferences. Leaders on missionary boards, pastors and financiers gave their time to the campaign. Over 200 men spoke from the platform, and more than 350,000 people heard the message. Two hundred thousand pieces of special literature were used, and 300,000 copies of missionary books and pamphlets used as exhibits were sold during the season. As many as fifty-one churches in one city participated in the campaign work.

—THE BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS of the Presbyterian Church, 156 Fifth Avenue, is the possessor of the finest Foreign Mission library in the world. Actual photographs and histories of the scenes of conflict of today add a new thrill for the thousands who visit the place. There are over 10,000 books on every phase of the Foreign Missionary question, besides its large collection of photographs, curios and lantern slides. There are volumes printed in the languages of India, and translations of the Bible made by those noble Serampore missionaries in the beginning of the modern missionary enterprise. And there is a Bible of which the board's own first missionary to Japan translated so large a part. An album just received here gives in fine pictures the contrast between the past and present in Japan, a wonderful revelation of the strides Japan has made in material things. There is also the latest edition of the missionary map of the world just out. It measures six feet by ten.

—REV. A. L. BURLESON and Archdeacon Millen, in charge of the English Church in Mexico City, inform the Board of Foreign Missions of the Episcopal Church that there is nothing reassuring in the present condition in Mexico; that the Carranza rule does not create any more peace than the old régime, and the situation cannot be viewed with an optimistic eye. Every one is hoping that Villareal will do better. "One cannot accept the Gospel in one hand while with the other he must brandish a sword to avenge himself upon the bloody rioters who may any minute create cyclonic destruction," are the views expressed by these missionaries. At the office of the Board of the Baptist Home Mission Society it is said that the localities where their mission work suffers the least in Mexico are perhaps Monterey, the City of Mexico and Puebla. At Aguas Calientes work has been interrupted, but is now resumed. The superintendent of the Society of Home Missions has been out of Mexico but has just returned for a brief visit to inspect the fields. A conference was held at San Antonio this week of missionaries and representatives of the Foreign Missionary Board of Southern Baptists, and the superintendent of missions of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, for consideration of several matters relating to affairs in Mexico. The society has fifteen or twenty missionaries in Mexico.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

The Relief Fund at Work

THANKS to the prompt and generous responses of our readers, the CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the European War can now be said to have fairly entered upon the work to accomplish which it was organized. The problem of conducting a campaign of this character in war time is by no means a simple one. It is necessary to safeguard the Fund at all points, and especially to secure such facilities from the various governments for the distribution of relief as will protect the Fund from diversion and give assurance that it will reach the class of beneficiaries for which it was originally created.

With this end in view, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD consulted with the State Department in Washington and with the various foreign legations of the warring nations, receiving in every case cordial assurances of co-operation.

As mail and even cable communication is irregular and of doubtful value for transmitting funds in war time, a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD management, Mr. Theodore Waters, has been commissioned to go to London to release the first remittance of $30,000 made by the Fund. There he will have an opportunity to consult with Ambassador Page and the members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD English Committee, as to the best and most expeditious method of distribution in Belgium, France and Holland, it having been decided that the Belgians, as the most necessitous nation, should be the first beneficiaries. It is estimated that there are at this writing 700,000 in Belgium facing actual famine, a very large proportion of them war widows and orphans, while in France there are 1,000,000 Belgian refugees and in Holland over 500,000 more, thousands of whom are eligible as beneficiaries of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. Germany, England, Austria, Russia and Servia will not be overlooked; but the New York committee, after a thorough canvass of the situation, decided that the Belgian sufferers had the first claim on our sympathies and that this would be heartily approved by the contributors to the Fund.

We rejoice with our friends in this great opportunity for international benevolence. Even as we write, the money you gave is being converted into bread and meat, blankets, shoes, underwear and other necessaries of life for a very great number who but for your timely aid would be homeless, hopeless, starving. You may remember that the "good Samaritan," who bound up the wounds and provided food and shelter for the unfortunate man on the Jericho road, did not stop at a single gift. He arranged for his needs until he should have recovered. Will not each of you, who has begun this Christ-like work of helping these unfortunate ones, be a true "good Samaritan" in real life? Here is your opportunity. They need to be fed and clad and housed until they are repatriated—sent back to their own towns and villages. There it will be better for them than to be among strangers. There, even amid what is left of the wreckage, with the aid of kindly hands they can make homes for themselves again. Later they can plant their little gardens and so get a humble living. Their needs are small and easily supplied. We ask you to think this over and, if you can, to do it for the sake of Him who was the Friend of the poor and of "the widow and the fatherless." Such a deed done now will be like a fragrant memory in the whole of your after life.

Business Skies Brightening

OUR export trade outlook is brightening perceptibly, every week showing a decided improvement. Extensive purchases by the European nations are in negotiation which will go far towards paying our debts to those countries, besides being a material assistance to our own home industries. Europe needs food and clothing and many other necessaries and it looks to America to supply them. Corn, flour, wheat, meat products, live stock, manufactured goods, all kinds of military and civilian clothing, boots and shoes, are all in demand in such quantities as give assurance that the exports this year to those countries whose products have been necessarily limited by the war, will aggregate a total considerably in excess of the figures for last year. Moreover, the best judges of the present situation hold that existing conditions abroad point to a steady increase in American exports for many months to come, since it must take considerable time to restore normal conditions there. Meanwhile, business here is beginning to feel the reviving impulse. In many industries the outlook for the unemployed is improving. The stagnation which threatened business a few months ago is already passing away and the general outlook points to a winter of activity. While we have suffered from the war, the worst is probably over and the clearing skies indicate better days ahead.

Two Presidents Discuss the Law

BOTH President Wilson and ex-President Taft made, at the recent meeting of the American Bar Association in Washington, certain statements which are worthy of serious and productive consideration. President Taft called attention to the strange fact that neither the Constitution nor the laws of the United States provide for any internal force for the carrying out, within our own borders, of our treaty obligations with other nations. Only the Federal Government can make a treaty, but when a State or certain individuals of a State are accused of violating the terms of the treaty no provision is made for the Federal Government to compel the State to alter its action. The difficulties with Italy over the "Mafia lynchings" and the more recent controversy with Japan over the treatment of her subjects on our Pacific Coast indicate to what grave results such a lack in our laws may lead. At this time of unusually delicate and easily disturbed relations with foreign powers those who hold rigorously to the principle of State rights may well allow themselves to favor the suggestion of Mr. Taft to make this addition to our Federal laws. Congress should take up this suggestion of the ex-President and pass as a statute the needed "dozen lines."

President Wilson made a plea for more of real life in our laws, a willingness to break away from tradition and precedent, to consider the living, human, fundamentally just aspects of each fresh situation as it arises. He hinted that the present rules of evidence, as indeed many laymen have often suspected, do not always forward the interests of justice and truth. "Citations," he said, "seem to play so much larger a rôle now than principle." After denying that he wished to impeach the law, he added:

> I do wish to make this intimation, that in this time of world change, in this time when we are going to find out just how, in what particulars, and to what extent the real facts of human life and the real moral judgments of mankind prevail, it is worth while looking inside our municipal law and seeing whether the moral judgments of mankind are made square with every one of the judgments of the law itself. For I believe that we are custodians, not of commands but of the spirit. We are custodians of the spirit of righteousness, of the spirit of equal-handed justice, of the spirit of hope which believes in the perfectability of the law with the perfectability of human life itself.

"An idealist in the White House!" President Wilson's critics will say again. But these earnest words of our President awaken an echo in the breast of every real lover of real justice and progress, and are bound, in good time, to bear their fruit.

"All That a Man Hath"

NOBODY has ever been able to appraise, with any degree of satisfaction, the value of a human life. Courts have ruled on the subject, basing their judgment on the earning capacity of the individual, capitalizing the life of a professional man, an artisan or a laborer on the basis of his money-producing power per annum. But there are qualities too subtle for definition in legal terms and these they could not appraise. They dealt with the crudest and most obvious aspect of the case, and their verdict was recorded in the terms of commerce. Never, so far as known, has an attempt been made to estimate the economic and industrial loss to the world by such a wholesale sacrifice of life as is now taking place in Europe. As we read the estimates of a million dead, wounded and missing we are more than ever impressed with the inadequacy of mere figures to express the value of a human life.

"All that a man hath will he give for his life," is the Scripture estimate. It means that life is a priceless thing, not to be weighed in the scales with gold and silver. King and peasant, prince and laborer, stand on equal ground in this regard. The world values the life of a man according to his abilities, his service to the State and to society at large. The useful citizen is put in sharp contrast with the common toiler. Yet to the little circl of his friends and to his family the humblest laborer with a kind heart and helpful hands, is any man' equal. Statisticians will reckon the economic los to the world at so much per capita and will tell u that the 300,000 killed in battle, capable, let us say of earning an average weekly wage of five dollars represent a total yearly wage-earning capacity o $78,000,000, which is lost to the state. But th loss to their individual families, whose sole sup port they probably were, cannot be told in figures All the money in a nation's treasury could no compensate for that overwhelming deprivation.

"Apple Day"

IT WAS a rather equivocal compliment, thoug doubtless well meant, that was paid to Mothe Eve when the fruit-growers suggested the additio of "Apple Day" to our already large list of nationa holidays. Our apple crop this year is estimate at something like 70,000,000 bushels, which wi leave us with a big over-supply for home consump tion unless we can ship a few cargoes of the to Europe. And, by the way, the boys in th trenches might do worse than fight on apples. Ou American apple is a sound, prime fruit, good fo blood and muscle and with a sufficiency of iron t make it desirable in a military sense. We hav seen some specimens this year that might hav graced the gardens of the Hesperides or whic nimble-footed Atalanta would have chosen rathe than those foolish "apples of gold," which sh dropped in her race with her suitors. And we doub whether anywhere else in the world can be foun apples that are suited to such a variety of dishe for the table. Served as apple pie, apple sauce, a dumplings, or baked, or as apple butter they ar equally toothsome and appetizing. Even with th export trade liberally supplied we would still hav more than enough of the fruit left for ever American to eat a plump, rosy apple in honor o Eve, as recommended by the Apple Shippers' Asso ciation.

One Miser—and Others

A CONNECTICUT miser, with $7,000 in a sav ings bank, died one night of the cold, in cowshed that had been his home for ten year Though ninety-one years old, and without a famil he had denied himself all of the comforts tha money will buy, refused to touch a cent of princip or interest, lived on garden produce he raised an on gifts from neighbors, and was saving his mone for—the Lord only knows what.

But extreme as was his case, it is only a typ of thousands of others whose aim is ever to ge and never to give. Only for his great hardihoo and severe self-denial, which are really qualitie of excellence, he would have been no worse, better, than millions of others who love money a well as he did, but love personal comfort more.

If all men whose chief desire alternates betwee money and the selfish gratification that money a fords were gathered in a great group and pu apart to themselves, there would be few of us lef

A miser here and there represents the extrem degree to which life may be narrowed down by lov of money. But countless millions are narrowin their lives every day from the same cause. Fe of us may have the physical hardihood to live i cowsheds, but lots of us furnish no better enviro ment than that for mind and soul.

The average rich man may pamper his stomac and gratify his vanity in matters of clothes an houses and equipages; he may outshine his neigh bors in the display of his wealth and in conversio of it to his own pleasures; but for all that, h none the less hugs his riches to his own heart.

The miser loves the money itself; he revels i contemplation of the fact that it is his. The mo of us who hold ourselves to be superior to hi love the gratification of the physical senses whi money brings. And the one love is as vain, as pu poseless and as utterly selfish as the other.

The miser himself voluntarily suffers for th sake of money. But the average rich man mak other people—family, friends, employees—do th suffering, that he may be richer.

Whether a man has $7,000 and lives in a cow shed, or $7,000,000 and keeps his heart in a coun ing-room, makes little difference in the long ru The one is making a slave—a mere creature—o himself quite as actually as is the other.

Minister's Family Penniless

THE rector of an important Episcopal church in a large city was killed by a train the other day, and his family was left penniless by his removal. He had been for over twenty years the faithful pastor of the one church, and was so wrapped up in the spiritual demands that he did not make any material plans for accident or old age. Besides, the disparity between his salary and the high cost of living required in the large city left little opportunity for provision for a rainy day. The men's club of the church so suddenly bereft of its pastor immediately took steps to insure the life of the next rector that shall be installed, for $5,000, the policy to remain in force so long as he shall remain pastor of that church. The men's club also advised other churches to take the same course. The life insurance proposition, while a good one, is not the best one. There are two things that ought to be done. First, better salaries should be paid to our ministers. And then in the second place, the various denominations ought to have ample endowment funds to pension their veteran ministers on at least half-pay, and thus have them free to devote their strength to the spiritual concerns of the kingdom. Fortunately, nearly every denomination is undertaking the task of caring for its veteran ministers in a becoming manner. Few people in the world can make a dollar go farther than the old preachers and their wives. A rich church can raise the little amount necessary to keep them in sickness or old age, and will be the richer and better. A just ministerial compensation has Christ's authority.

For the laborer is worthy of his hire. (Luke 10: 7.)

National Road Congress

FORTY-SEVEN national and State automobile associations will take part in the fourth annual American Road Congress at Atlanta during the week beginning November 9. The national government and practically all the State governments will be represented by the official heads of their highway departments. Prominent among the national associations taking part will be the American Highway Association, the American Automobile Association, the American Bar Association, and the National Civil Service Reform League. The government exhibit will be unique and instructive, comprising accurate models of every type of road from the imperial roads of ancient Rome down to the modern boulevard and country market road. Forty thousand square feet of floor space will be filled with the exhibits of road machinery, material and engineering instruments. As man came out of savagery into civilization and life became more complex, roads became necessary for travel and commerce. At first the paths made by the herds of wild and domestic animals on their way to the pastures for grass, or streams for water, were utilized by human feet. Then the road had to be widened for the carts and beasts of burden, and then built smooth for comfortable travel, and then hard and durable for the use of generations. Nations had their great public roads for the inhabitants in their industries, and for the royal horses and chariots and armies of war. Our own great, rich country has made magnificent advancement in road-building and the conservation of force by the farmer, and the era of the automobile will make still greater progress in the immediate future necessary. There is this reference to the public roads of Palestine:

Let use flee, and draw them from the city unto the highways. (Judges 20: 32.)

A Strange Strike

ONE of the most singular strikes recently reported is that of the coffin-makers of New York, who a few days ago joined the strike of the International Woodworkers' Union. The coffin-makers declare that they want only living wages and fair working conditions. They argue that their calling is not a cheerful occupation, even under the best conditions. But the coffin-maker, unlike many others, has a sure clientèle, since death is the common lot of all men. Human nature is so constituted that even the poor desire to give their dear ones who pass away a good coffin and a decent funeral. Yet it matters little whether one be buried in a magnificent casket, with impressive pomp and a mountain of flowers, or in the simplest way, since at the grave all dissimilarity ends, for we are assured by the words of Scripture that all—

Lie down alike in the dust, and the worms shall cover them. (Job 21: 26.)

TRYING TO SELL THE COTTON CROP

MANY people are interesting themselves in helping the cotton growers of the South out of the serious predicament into which the war has thrown them. They have on their hands a record cotton crop which nobody wants, at least the world markets are temporarily closed. To save the growers from a loss that might be ruinous to the South, various methods have been devised to create a large home demand, and Congress is being importuned to authorize the issuance of a $250,000,000 loan to that industry. Cotton fêtes are being held in different parts of the country to stimulate the use of cotton fabrics for women's wear, and recently such an affair was held in Washington under the auspices of prominent ladies of the national capital. The war is apt to give our people many opportunities to help each other through critical times. It is one of the fundamental laws of the kingdom of God that the strong shall help the weak. The bearing of one another's burdens is a Christian exercise that is bound to be beneficial to the whole spiritual life. It will be well for the world when Christian brotherhood actually realizes that condition described by the apostle: "And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it." (I Cor. 12: 26.)

Peace Day at Bowery Mission

PROBABLY at no place of worship was President Wilson's proclamation more earnestly and enthusiastically responded to than at the Bowery Mission.

This was no doubt due to the fact that The CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League took such a prominent part in petitioning the President that a Day of Prayer be observed. On Sunday, October 4, at both morning and evening meetings, large cosmopolitan crowds assembled, containing representatives of all the nationalities directly engaged in the war. Dr. Hallimond presided at the morning meeting. The meeting was chiefly devoted to prayer, in which several of the leaders took part, and impressive addresses were delivered by Dr. G. A. Gayer and Thomas S. Davies, both converts of the Mission, and Former Senator R. L. Gledhill, who is one of the leaders.

Mr. Davies was formerly an actor, and was converted at the Bowery Mission Labor Settlement nearly two years ago. He is employed there at the present time, and is carrying on a wonderful spiritual work amongst the men. His address was a magnificent appeal to the men to abjure the spirit of envy, hatred, and pride; "the spirit that prompted Alexander to murder the inhabitants of Thebes and Gaza, to kill his best friend, Clitus, for telling him the truth; the spirit of Tamerlane, when he cut the throats of ninety thousand people in Bagdad; the spirit of Attila the Hun, who left behind him wherever he went a hideous devastation; the spirit which inspires a man when he is poor to desire selfishly to be rich, when he is rich to wish to be a noble, when he is a noble to desire to be a king, and when he is a king to call himself a god; the spirit which today has set the wild dog free abroad, to wander at will, and flesh his tooth in every innocent; the spirit that even now is drowning the sons and daughters of Europe in rivers of blood, which cries, like Abel's, even from the tongueless caverns of the earth to God for justice and rebuke. What is the answer? For you and for me, and for the great and mighty of the earth as well, this is the message: 'This is my commandment, that ye love one another.'"

Concerning Babies and Pigs

A PROMINENT physician, addressing an audience in an Episcopal church in a large city the other day on the comparative treatment of pigs and babies by the United States Government, said: "The pig is raised wholly for its food-supplying value; the child is a drain upon the food supply. The baby is a material cost; the pig is a material asset. The government that has been generous in the interests of one has been most penurious in the interest of the other. The Department of Agriculture at Washington, which has given much attention to the raising of swine, was organized soon after the war. The child-saving department of the government is just now being established. Thousands upon thousands of babies in this city today are subjected to conditions to which no thrifty, self-respecting farmer would subject his pigs." It is the imperative duty of our government to care for the health, life, education and morals of the children of the nation. But no paternalism of the government can be made a substitute for the care by parents in the home, on which the body, mind, soul and destiny of the child depend, and which will very largely determine the virtue and prosperity of the nation. Mother, father, the church and a good government ought to share Christ's love for children and pronounce his words:

Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God. (Mark 10: 14.)

Rescued from Quicksand

CAUGHT in a treacherous quicksand while boring a well near Ware, Mass., Maurice Allen, a workman, found himself in danger of suffocation. He was gradually sinking and shouted in vain for a long time before his cries attracted attention. At last some other workmen, looking over the sides of the deep excavation, saw Allen's head and shoulders and listened with amazement to his appeals for help. They brought ladders and ropes, but the sides of the excavation crumbled, almost burying Allen completely. Willing hands dug a trench alongside the well and there, standing on firmer ground, the rescuers managed to lower a man on a rope. A diver's helmet was procured and lowered into the hole and with great difficulty was adjusted over Allen's head, after which the work of rescue proceeded. For fifty hours the men struggled in their fight against death and at last had the satisfaction of bringing Allen to the surface alive, but very weak. Quicksand is a familiar illustration in the Bible, where it is compared to the enveloping toils of sin which coil around the unfortunate sinner, threatening his destruction. In such a case there is no hope of rescue, unless he takes firm hold of the only means of salvation offered through the Gospel of Jesus Christ. David the psalmist-king had such an experience and records his escape in these words:

He brought me out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock. (Ps. 40: 2.)

THE JOY OF HELPING

I READ a story yesterday in one of our popular magazines. It was the story of a girl who had been educated in an expensive way, taught to do nothing useful, and to be uselessly extravagant; a girl who did not realize the value of money or of work. In the beginning of the story her father suddenly told her what his income was and that she was costing too much. "After you left school," he explained to her, "I expected you to help!" The girl was thunderstruck. "Help?" she asked him, "help? What can I do?" And her father could not answer the question. There was nothing that the girl could do.

So many girls are like that—not able to do anything. Born into well-to-do families with enough servants to relieve them of any work at all, they are educated to idleness and extravagance. It is not their fault; it is hardly the fault of their families, for there is a world-old, threadbare, inefficient system that is utterly wrong.

There are many girls who are victims of this system, girls that sit around drinking tea, or flutter around making calls, simply because they do not know how to help. But there also are girls who escape past the bars of convention and custom into a world that needs them.

The picture on this page shows Dr. Mary M. Crawford, M.D., a granddaughter of Rev. Stephen Merritt, and niece of the late Dr. Louis Klopsch. Dr. Crawford is one of the young women of this generation who has demonstrated her ability to help. She obtained her medical degree at a very early age, and soon after her graduation from college became the examining physician for Mont-Lawn, in which work she had the distinction (which very few young doctors enjoy) of passing upon three thousand patients a year. A great many of you have read her book (published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) Before the Doctor Comes. That, too, has demonstrated her ability and willingness to be a help.

October 17 she sailed for France, the first American woman doctor to offer her skill in the war zone. Dr. Crawford will be welcomed by the Duchesse de Talleyrand (who was Miss Anna Gould), and will at once take up her work in the American hospital in Paris. She will also be semi-officially connected with the French Committee of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief work under Pastor Wagner. It is a long, hard path from the home of the girl who asks "what shall I do?" to the home of the brave doctor who goes to face the stream of bullets, a sight of blood and tears, and perhaps death in a strange land.

AMERICAN SURGEONS WHO SAILED FOR SERVICE IN THE WAR

It is a very wonderful thing to face the storm of war, to be a good angel among the sorely wounded and the dying, but not everybody is fitted to the work. Many girls who are willing and anxious to help quail at the sight of blood and of gaping slashes made by a saber, and are apt to faint when asked to help in a simple bit of first-aid work. They do not flinch because they are cowards, but because they truly cannot stand that sort of helping.

There is some sort of helping, I think, for every girl who honestly wishes to do her best, some sort of work that she can do to relieve a little of the world's crying need. Perhaps it is some large task like Dr. Crawford's; but maybe it is only a simple little thing hidden away in some humble corner: making the way easier for a tired mother, or smoothing over a quarrel, or quieting down a bit of scandal.

A little boy lived on the same street with us not long ago; a very-nearly-story-book little boy with big blue eyes and golden curls. He had many loving ways that made him the pet of every one in the neighborhood, many baby expressions that seemed doubly sweet coming from his lips.

I was walking home one summer day through the hot rays of the setting sun, and though I am a bit ashamed to admit it, my heart was rather sad and weary I walked along with tired eyes that did not see the beautiful though familiar things that lay all about me. It was only when I saw the sun glinting on a mop of golden curls that a gleam of anything like pleasure came into my eyes. The baby boy was running to meet me, his little feet stumbling in his hurry.

It was just before he reached me that the toe of his barefoot sandal caught on a stone and tripped him. With a squeal of dismay he crashed down on the sidewalk, and I, my own troubles all forgotten, raced to pick him up.

"I hurted me," he wailed when I reached him. "Oh-h, I hurted me!" He held up a chubby arm with a long, red, scraped place on it. "Kiss it and make it well!" he said.

Friends of mine, far away in another country the brave doctor is figuratively kissing many hurts to make them well; drying many tears. We are not blessed with her God-given ability to heal the sick, but don't you think that we, too, in our many walks of life can play at her game? Somewhere, as we walk along life's pathway, there will be something to make us forget our own troubles and doubts somewhere in the world will be bruised for us to "kiss and make well."

THE PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY

AT THE outbreak of the great war in Europe, it was loudly asserted in various quarters that Christianity had collapsed, that the religion of Jesus had proved a failure, and that civilization had gone down with it. These statements, calculated as they were to create a doubt in the minds of God's people, carried their own refutation. Skeptics and agnostics who trumpeted them abroad were met by the counter-statement, made by the united voice of the Christian world, through pulpit and press, that the religion of Jesus, had it been in the hearts of the rulers and cabinets and diplomats of the Old World, would have prevented the strife and there would have been no war—in a word, that the war had come upon the continental Powers because they had proved themselves at best only nominally Christian, and that the spirit of the Master had not controlled their councils, else their quarrels would have been readily adjusted without resort to violence.

It is not the purpose of this journal to decide the grave question as to the responsibility for this devastating war, which has drenched Europe with blood. That must be the problem of the impartial historian. One of the great modern artists has pictured on his canvas Christ appearing on a battlefield at the close of a sanguinary engagement. Everywhere are lying the dead and wounded. The luminous figure, standing on a little ridge, addresses the leaders of the contending hosts who stand before him mute and ashamed. "Why have ye done this?" he asks, and there is in the single question, uttered in a tone of sorrow, a rebuke that is mightier in its condemnation than the judgment of any earthly tribunal.

Those who have been impressed by the recent clamorous attacks on Christianity and the pessimistic views concerning its future should look back over the record of history and trace its amazing progress, in the face of wars and persecutions almost innumerable. Although it has encountered setbacks which might well have appalled the stoutest hearts, yet its path has been steadily onward. The first Christian Church originated in that little "upper room" in Jerusalem where, shortly after the Ascension, the disciples and a little group of believers met. As related in Acts 1: 15 there were gathered in all one hundred and twenty souls, and these formed the nucleus of that great, divinely ordained organization that has gone on increasing ever since, and which will increase until the end of time.

BEGINNING in Asia, Christianity rapidly extended to the neighboring centers, and by the year 100 A.D. there were over one million adherents. The cities of Jerusalem, Antioch, Ephesus, Rome, Alexandria and Constantinople became evangelizing centers from which the true religion spread. The paganism of the mighty Roman Empire went down in 450, and Christianity rose upon its ruins. This was the first great triumph of the Faith. The old gods were shattered; Diana of the Ephesians, whom all the world had worshiped, was left without a single votary.

Then the teachings of Christianity were carried throughout the Western World. It became the religion of Europe, and of nations founded by European races beyond the seas. But in Asia and Africa it received a set-back. Islamism arose, and Mohammed by force alienated hundreds of thousands from Christ; but the tide of Mohammedan invasion at length was turned, and by 1000 A.D., the Christian Church was 50,000,000 strong. Five hundred years later it had doubled.

The Reformation gave a great impetus to European Christendom. The Reformed Church pushed ahead, especially in Teutonic lands, and soon its missionaries were bearing the Gospel and the open Bible to the lands beyond the sea.

In the beginning of the nineteenth century over 200,000,000 professed the faith of Christ. Since then, this number has almost trebled, and the great march of Christianity is still advancing. It is gaining daily from all other religions. Confucianism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Shintoism and even Judaism are contributing to its increase. Today Christianity dominates all other religions.

In 1600, only about seven per cent. of the earth's territory was ruled by Christian Powers. Today Christian governments rule almost 85 per cent. of the whole world. Five of the world empires (Britain, Russia, United States, France and Germany) are Christian, and the two great Powers of the Orient, Japan and China, look to Christendom for light and guidance and knowledge.

In 1800 one in five of the entire population of the globe was Christian; in 1900 one in every three was a follower of the Nazarene. In this year of grace, 1914, as has been said, more than one-third of the people of earth espouse Christianity, and considerably more than one-half are under Christian rule. Asia contains the only independent non-Christian Powers; and, save for insignificant remnants of aborigines still pagan, all the inhabitants of four of the continents are at least nominally Christians. In practically every country save Tibet and Afghanistan, there are now Christian communities.

THE English historian, Sharon Turner, a man of great learning and of admitted accuracy—not a clergyman, but an attorney as well as a historian—gives these overwhelming statistics in regard to Christianity and the number of Christians in the different centuries: "In the first century, 500,000 Christians; in the second century, 2,000,000 Christians; in the third century, 5,000,000 Christians; in the fourth century, 10,000,000 Christians; in the fifth century, 15,000,000 Christians; in the sixth century, 20,000,000 Christians; in the seventh century, 24,000,000 Christians; in the eighth century

FINLAND, HER RISE AND DANGER

BARONESS KOSKINEN, M.P.

FINLAND, with her three million inhabitants, is one of the most progressive little countries in the world. It was conquered from Sweden by Russia in 1809, under Czar Alexander I, but six months before the cession took place, while the people in another part of the country were still fighting, the Czar, finding the people amenable and weary of fighting, called a meeting of the Diet in the little cathedral church at Borga, and gave to Finland autonomy. Geographically, she is still a part of the Russian Empire.

Some fifty years ago Finland's educational awakening started, having its genesis with a few young men who founded the "Finnish Literary Society," the most important member of which was Elias Lonrott, who compiled the Kalevala, the Finnish epic, from which Longfellow borrowed the meter for his Hiawatha. Lonrott was the son of a tailor whom a friend had educated for the medical profession. He would often visit the huts of the peasants, dressed in peasant garb, to listen to their rune songs. In this way he collected the beautiful rune songs that comprise the Kalevala.

Woman suffrage in Finland was a matter of happening. It was the outcome of the threat of Russia in 1899 to destroy the autonomy of the little nation. All over the land the people began to organize in defense of their country, their most powerful ammunition being education. "Education is the only thing that will save us," said a Finnish woman to me. "Knowledge will teach the people to see."

So splendidly have the women of Finland helped in the uplift of their country, educationally, economically and politically, that when the subject of woman suffrage was broached about eight years ago, their services were too valuable to be ignored and they were readily given the vote, which took effect in 1907. At a recent election at Helsingfors twenty-one women were elected to Parliament, the Social-Democratic Party having the largest number, thirteen. One of the principal workers for this party, and a woman who has no superior in Finland, is Miss M. Lillangria, M.P., formerly a servant, founder of the trades union for domestic workers, and a great temperance woman.

While the glory of Russia is her bejeweled buildings—there are no churches in the world so laden with jewels as Russian churches—the glory of Finland is her schools. There are only five illiterates to each 1,000 people in Finland; there are 789 illiterates to each 1,000 in Russia.

For many years, and to a considerable extent now, the Lutheran clergy had charge of the schools for children of Finnish descent. The people of Finnish descent comprise seven-eighths of the population, the people of Swedish descent comprise one-eighth of the population. The Finnish clergy decreed that no one could marry or be confirmed until able to read and write.

The folk-schools of Finland are particularly fine, with their cooking departments, gymnasiums, manual training and needlework. Every school has excellent bathing facilities, and the poorest children are fed at the schools. There are little zoological museums in most of the schools.

There are so many varieties of schools, besides the folk-schools, elementary and higher; there are lyceums, schools of forestry, of agriculture and of navigation, schools for training teachers, commercial schools, technical, music and art schools, etc. There are three large garden schools in Finland, where boys as well as girls are taught cooking. "They must learn to cook what they grow," said one of the teachers. The dairy schools are particularly interesting. Dairying comes second among the industries of Finland. The pupil must have worked for one year at a butter factory before he or she will be admitted to the school.

The state gives stipendiums, and there are private funds also, for enabling students to travel and study in other lands. The Finlandars are large believers in traveling for study. They have many educational associations, too.

MISS M. LILLANGRIA, M.P.

There are about one thousand Lapps living in Finland, within the polar circle. They are Lutheran in religion, and Finnish clergymen preach to them in their own language. Nearly all of them can read and write. They live on birds, reindeer meat, fish and bread. Many own considerable reindeer, by which their wealth is reckoned. One Lapp owned four thousand.

There is a little town which stands directly on the polar circle, Rovaniemi, the fifth important town in the fur trade in the world. Some eight or ten thousand people congregate there in February—Russians, Germans, Swedes, Norwegians, etc.—to bargain in bear, fox, reindeer, ermine and other fur skins. Travel is by reindeer in the winter, which is a beautiful season. As the compass does not work within the Arctic Circle, travelers learn by the trees to find their way, exposure to the north making a difference in their shape.

At Rovaniemi is a little Lutheran church through whose grounds, and within a few yards of the church, the polar circle passes. Some one has had a slab placed on the line with these words engraved thereon: "Moses, 5th Book, 27th chapter, verse 17."

In manufactures Finland is progressing. She makes linen articles of the finest quality, tablecloths, napkins, etc. Her woolen and cotton mills are excellent, and her paper and pulp mills have a considerable reputation. Lumber is her biggest industry. Finland possesses more acres of forest than any other country in Europe.

Agriculturally, Finland is a poor country; but berries grow abundantly, and barley, oats and rye are grown. There are no orchards. In the warm season vegetation advances rapidly.

The Finlanders are hoping against hope that Russia will not absorb them. They have lost their military within the last few years; Finnish stamps may no longer be placed on foreign letters, and that Russia will raise the low Finnish tariff to the high level of her own is expected, when the purchasing power of the Finns will be greatly reduced. HELEN GRAY.

SUNNY, SANITARY RECITATION ROOM IN FINNISH FOLK-SCHOOL

FEED MY SHEEP

BY DUNSTAN CRAIG

In Two Parts, of Which This is Part I]

"IT'S in Cheyenne four years ago September that I first meet up with Jim Sanders," Brinker began, leaning against the cattle-chute at Torrey's Siding, with one eye intent upon the loading of a dozen U. P. stock cars with 6 Bar J cattle bound for Omaha. "I've just finished makin' a proper horse out of a dissatisfied bundle o' steel springs upholstered in yellow horsehide, an' I think sure I've won the belt that all the ropin' talent of Wyoming has come to Cheyenne to git. But the committee thinks different, an' hands the prize to Bud Sykes, of the Double L. That's right enough, an' Bud's earned it, but for some hour or two I'm more or less riled inside, though I'm not lettin' on. It's then that a square built feller with a face like a basalt cliff, who I ain't ever seen before, comes up an' says:

"'Brinker, you're some cowpuncher, if you didn't git that belt.'

"'I know it,' says I, preferrin' my own company.

"'You needn't git ulcer-ated over it,' says he. 'I ain't distributin' belts to cowpunchers.'

"'I don't just recollect askin' you for anything,' I ree-tort.

"'No,' he answers, smilin'. 'Your mem'ry ain't played you. The fact is I'm intrudin' on your privation to offer you a job.'

"'I'm much obliged,' says I. 'But I didn't lose my job when I lost the belt.'

"'I know that,' says he, 'but we're shy one man up on the 6 Bar J, an' I've got an insane idy that you might do.'

"'The 6 Bar J?' I repeat. 'Then you must be Jim Sanders.'

"'The same,' he answers. 'Let's talk.'

"Of course I'd heard a lot about Jim Sanders. There's no doubt that he's been mixed up one way or another with that Hole-in-the-Wall gang of cattle-rustlers, which's been about the worst Wyoming's ever had to deal with, an' which it's took Federal soldiers to clean out in the end. But nothin's ever been proved on him, an' if he's under a cloud that don't hurt nobody but him. The fact that he's clumb up to be foreman of the 6 Bar J counts for somethin' too. The most that c'n be said against Sanders now is't he's got a temper like nitro an' a hair trigger on his gun, both of which is very common faults in the cow-country.

"What pleases me most about Sanders is't there ain't a man between Flathead an' the Brazos that hates sheep as bitter as he does. He hops around like a tarantula'd bit him ev'ry time he smells a mutton stew, an' he's never tired o' layin' down the laws that ought to be made to keep the sheep out o' the finest cattle-country the sun ever set on. You know how sheep eat the grass down to the bed-rock, an' make a good range look like a ten years' drought had swept it clean. An' when you look an' see what sheep's doin' to Wyoming you'll understand that Sanders don't need any spur to send him on the warpath like a young Pi-ute.

"So we talk, an' I join the 6 Bar J. It's a bully outfit, an' the home ranch snuggles in a green cup o' the foothills, with the white peaks of the Wind River Mountains smilin' down on us mornin', noon an' night. There's somethin' mighty superior about a mountain when it's off there in the blue haze, not troublin' itself about water-holes an' barb-wire fences an' sheep. It starts idees, an' when a cowpuncher gets to mixin' idees with cowpunchin' he'd best lay off for a while for his health.

"I've been about six months on the 6 Bar J when things begin to happen like one, two, three. First, Sanders is called away to Lander on business, an' I'm left in charge of the outfit temp'rary. On top o' that comes along an April blizzard that hardly anybody's lookin' for, an' it leaves a trail of dead cattle an' sheep across Wyoming.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

PAYS $[illegible] FOR A PROFESSOR? Harvard University was given to understand (by postal card, it is stated) that unless the resignation of Professor Hugo Münsterberg from the chair of psychology were obtained and accepted, a bequest of ten million dollars would be deflected from that institution. The animus of this threat was derived from Professor Münsterberg's championship of Germany in the wordy battle that rages over the cause of the war. The contributions of this scientist to the press and otherwise upon the subject are believed to have had no little influence in modifying American opinion. The resignation was tendered and refused. How seriously Harvard took the economical correspondent's threat is not disclosed. The public did not take it seriously at all.

PHILANTHROPY AT FIFTY PER CENT. Prison experts in Pennsylvania are gaining the attention of the public by declaring that industrial farms are the most sanitary, body-building, crime-decreasing form of incarceration of law-breakers, and will save the State half a million dollars to boot. The law of that State forbids the employment of more than 35 per cent. of the prisoners at any one time in the manufacture of articles for sale, the consequence being that a million days are spent in idleness in a year by the prison population at a per diem cost of fifty cents. It is claimed that industrial farms will produce the prisoners' keep, at least in part, and make better men of them, the treasury meanwhile saving half of the annual expense, $1,000,000, of the county jails.

A NATION TAKES THE PLEDGE. The press announces the declaration by Emperor Nicholas of Russia in reply to the Russian Union of Abstinence that he long ago decided to interdict for all time in Russia the sale of alcoholic drinks by the government. This ban on the business is hailed with enthusiasm by the Russian press, according to the report. As one result of the decrease which has taken place in that country in the sale of liquor, it is stated that savings banks deposits increased $11,500,000 in September over that month the previous year.

WAR FURNISHES LABOR WITH AN ARGUMENT. Because the British Government has so readily and effectively taken control of the railroads for the movement of troops, the General Federation of Trade Unions sees no reason why the same thing should not be possible for the movement of the peoples, and so declares itself in a manifesto to trade unionists in America and Europe, in which it also explains that while labor deplores the war it believes Great Britain to be not responsible. Co-ordination of all British charities is urged, as the need is bound to exceed all calculations.

RICHES TAKE TO THEMSELVES WHEELS. It used to be wings, and may be again when aircraft become common. But the activity in automobile circles in preparation for the coming annual automobile shows indicate that there has been no falling off in the popularity of this means for making money fly. The prosperity of the West is said to have tremendously increased the use of motor cars there, especially by farmers. Most makers of cars attest a well sustained demand. The two national shows in January, one in New York and one in Chicago, are already signing up space allotments on a large scale.

USEFUL LIFE CLOSES IN DEATH. At the acme of a life of unusual service to others "Mother Prindle," as Mrs. Almira Prindle was popularly known, died at her home in Brooklyn in her seventy-ninth year, October 19. This sterling friend of fallen women and of girls and homeless boys was one of the founders of the Florence Crittenden Mission for Girls in New York and of the Florence Crittenden Missions in other cities. For more than forty years she had been engaged in this kind of betterment work, and her influence for good is silently acknowledged in the hearts of a multitude. Mrs. Prindle belonged to the Orthodox Friends; she was one of a family of fourteen children, and was born in Starksboro, Vt.

NOT ASHAMED TO GO TO SUNDAY SCHOOL. The Sabbath School Association of Pennsylvania at its convention in Scranton the first part of October, attended by 1,000 delegates, reported 230,000 men and women in 8,000 organized Bible classes in the State, most of the classes being actively interested in social as well as moral uplift and taking part in local campaigns for civic betterment.

CALAMITY VISITS GREECE. On Saturday, October 17, an earthquake in twenty shocks overthrew the Grecian villages of Kaparelli and Pyri near Thebes and greatly damaged Thebes itself, hundreds of persons being buried in the ruins of houses. The shocks were severest in the province of Bœotia. Athens suffered slight damage. Piræus and other towns experienced losses. Tents and provisions were sent by the government into the distressed sections.

SEEK TO LEGISLATE THEMSELVES OUT OF BUSINESS. Massachusetts dentists have thrown themselves with such disinterested zest into a campaign for better teeth that the first thing they know there will be no dentists. For it is even proposed that the New England States compel children to submit to the advice of the profession, which should mean that another generation would have no need for advice. Toothbrush drills in schools is advocated, also the abolition of rubber nipples, the greater use of tough meat and hard foodstuffs, and the discouragement of thumb sucking. The dentists claim that if they can rob childhood of such delights as are bound up in the things to be prohibited, 45 per cent. of present failures in the schools will be prevented, as that proportion is now attributed to defective teeth.

ALASKA "TO LET." The Alaskan bill providing for a system of leasing the enormous coal resources of the territory for periods not exceeding fifty years, was taken up by Congress after it had been abandoned for the present session, and passed at the instance of President Wilson and Secretary Lane. This great coal field has been practically inactive for eight years, pending this legislation, the present bill almost completing the administration program for Alaska, which includes the measures already law for the building of government-owned railroads, a better reclamation method, and now the coal-leasing system. Water conservation and the development of oil, phosphate and potash deposits are also comprehended in the administration program. After the settlement of claims of present occupants of coal lands and the completion of government surveys, the mining of Alaskan coal is expected to have a wonderful development; the proceeds from the leases are to be devoted to reimbursing the government for the cost of building railways in Alaska.

WAR TAX BILL BECOMES LAW. President Wilson signed the War Tax Bill designed to produce $105,000,000 Federal income, on the afternoon of October 22, rushing in an automobile from a game of golf to reach the capitol in time to affix his signature before Congress adjourned—then Congress did not adjourn after all. The insistence of Southern senators that cotton planters shall receive some form of governmental aid prevented the adjournment which had been voted by the House earlier in the day. The scattering of senators and representatives to take part in their local election campaigns may force a recess until after election, however, no quorums being on hand for the transaction of business. As finally amended by the Senate and accepted by the House, the war revenue bill puts a tax on beers, spirituous liquor, theater tickets, tobacco in all forms, telegraph and telephone messages, bowling alleys and billiard rooms, bonds, stock sales, promissory notes, express packages, realty deeds, property insurance, steamship tickets, some toilet articles, chewing gum, and other items grouped with one or another of the above classifications, including a tax upon the working capital of banks, brokers and pawnbrokers. It is said that the Treasury Department fears that if the falling off in the consumption of beer and liquors continues, there may be a deficit in the expected income amounting to $15,000,000.

DEATH OF ITALIAN FOREIGN MINISTER. Marquis Antonio di San Giuliano, the minister of foreign affairs for Italy, died October 16, after a month's illness during which much concern was expressed as to the probable course of Italy in respect of the war should the statesman who has been considered responsible for keeping the nation neutral succumb to the disease, an affection of the heart, which was threatening his life. The sick man directed the affairs of state almost to his last moment. When his death was announced the German ambassador to Italy was reported to have declared that the event was perhaps the greatest misfortune for the central empires since the war began. No change in the attitude of Italy seems likely to result, however, from the removal of San Giuliano, those in position to speak for Italy asserting positively that her neutrality will be maintained.

TRAFFIC IN THE PANAMA CANAL. In the month and a half from the opening of the canal, August 15, 81 vessels had passed through; or, up to October 7, approximately 100, exceeding expectations. By the first of October the total tonnage aggregated 297,000, and the total tolls collected amounted to $369,706. American and British ships predominate; the only other nationalities which thus far have used the canal are Danish, Peruvian, Dutch, Norwegian.

MEXICO TRYING TO FIND ITSELF. At the present moment it is impossible to say what the situation in Mexico is, though the character of the news warrants apprehension that things are going badly there. A Military Board has elected itself the provisional government, if the report is true, and has proceeded to the appointment of the various officers of state, excepting that of president, which office Carranza still seems to hold, as it were, under protest. The bandit leader Zapata begins to figure more largely in the plotting and counter-plotting going on. And Villa has, for the moment, assumed the disposition of a sphinx. Meanwhile, American troops continue to occupy Vera Cruz.

A MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPH. Government begins suit in United States Court of Appeals to dissolve United States Steel Corporation, the biggest anti-trust action yet begun and against the largest industrial amalgamation in existence, the corporation being said to control 180 subsidiary companies.—The Clayton Trust bill was signed by President Wilson, October 15.—Educational institutions in England suffer reductions in enrolment of students, as high in some cases as 75 per cent., because of the war.—October 21 observed in many places as Edison Day in recognition of the thirty-fifth anniversary of invention of the incandescent electric lamp.—The principal Canadian crops for 1914 are officially given as follows in bushels: Oats, 311,426,000; wheat, 158,223,000; barley, 34,491,000; rye, 258,000; buckwheat, 9,159,000; flaxseed, 7,533,000; mixed grains, 16,458,000; husking corn, 14,732,000. The average for wheat, barley and oats is much below last year's record. The total wheat yield of the world is estimated at 3,741,018,000 bushels, more than 384,000,000 under last year's, the shortage being chiefly in European fields.—Philadelphia schools undertake to teach schoolgirls of the seventh and eighth grades the care and nursing of babies, including the high art of putting the baby to sleep. Doctors will deliver lectures and wax dolls will be used as object lessons.

30,000,000 Christians; in the ninth century, 40,000,000 Christians; in the tenth century, 50,000,000 Christians; the twelfth century, 80,000,000 Christians; the thirteenth century, 75,000,000 Christians; the fourteenth century, 80,000,000 Christians; fifteenth century, 100,000,000 Christians; sixteenth century, 125,000,000 Christians; the seventeenth century, 155,000,000 Christians; the eighteenth century, 200,000,000 Christians—a decadence, as the reader will observe, in only one century, which was more than made up in the following centuries—while it is the usual computation that there will be, when the record of the nineteenth century is made up, at least 450,000,000 Christians."

The best evidence of the accuracy of Sharon Turner's extraordinary figures of the progressive growth of Christianity is found in the fact that only a few years ago the total Christian population of the world was given by two very distinguished authorities, Gustav Sundbarg and Fournier de Fraix, at 494,250,000, this total representing an increase of 44,000,000 since Turner's figures were written during the last century. The grand total of Christians throughout the globe is now (1914) estimated at 520,000,000.

This amazing growth, in the face of tribulations and persecutions exceeding those that blotted out many of the old religions, can only be explained in the light of that divine purpose which the great Founder of Christianity himself declared, when he said: "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." It is God's will that the whole earth, and its peoples of all nations and races, shall ultimately be won over to the Gospel. His Word is now printed in over 600 languages or dialects. In a single year 18,000,000 Bibles, in whole or in part, have been put in circulation by the various Bible societies. A vast array of missionaries, white and native, is conquering all the ancient strongholds of heathenism for Christ. A little over one hundred years ago there were less than 150 missionaries; now they are counted by brigades and battalions. The light is dispelling the darkness, and Truth is routing Error from its strongholds. The Great Commission is being carried out, and the Gospel of Jesus Christ is being preached to "every living creature."

Christianity has conquered slavery; it has taught the world kindness; it is now teaching men of all nations the lesson of brotherly love and friendship and the recognition of the rights of humanity. It is responsible for the best thoughts and the highest ideals the world knows today. And it will yet conquer war, and will uproot from the hearts of men the lust for power, the love of conquest and the jealousies that set nation in battle array against nation. The coming of that day, when swords shall be turned into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks, is foreshadowed in God's Word, and his people in every land are praying that it may come soon.

"So simple and So delicious!"

"Just take a canful of Campbell's Tomato Soup; add the same amount of milk—according to the easy directions on the label; and you have as fine a bisque or Cream-of-tomato as you ever tasted!"

And there are many other tempting ways to prepare

Campbell's Tomato Soup

With a very elaborate dinner it is delightfully appetizing as a plain tomato-bouillon—made by simply adding hot water, and bringing to a boil. For a ladies' luncheon it is particularly attractive served in bouillon-cups topped with whipped cream. Or try it any time with a little cheese grated over the surface, or with boiled rice in it if you want it specially hearty. And here are two other pleasing recipes you ought to try.

Campbell's Red Rabbit

Pour contents of 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup into chafing dish or double boiler. When hot add 1 pound cheese cut in dice. Cook until cheese is thoroughly melted and mix with soup. Add red pepper to taste and 1 egg slightly beaten. Stir well a few minutes and serve hot on crackers or toast.

Campbell's Tomato Tartare

Chill one can of Campbell's Tomato Soup, add a quarter-cup of capers, and a half-bottle of small sour pickles chopped fine and some finely chopped parsley and part of a green pepper. Mix all ingredients in the cold soup and chill once more. A delightful sauce with fish, hamburg steak, codfish balls or cold meats.

Buy it by the dozen and keep it on hand. That is the practical way.

Your money back if not satisfied.

Crisco Invites to the Kitchen

Many housewives say that their interest in cooking has grown since learning about Crisco.

It is such a delicate shortening and therefore produces such delicate foods that this is only natural.

Many chefs and teachers of cooking use Crisco. Their example has shown thousands of housewives that Crisco is a delightfully wholesome and economical shortening.

CRISCO
For Frying-For Shortening For Cake Making

There can be even less argument about Crisco deep frying. This is how it is accomplished:

Use plenty of Crisco. It is the most economical way, as there will be less absorption and as the same Crisco can be used over and over. Add the raw foods when the fat has reached the right temperature. Test with a bit of the food about to be cooked, as it is not necessary to wait until it is smoking hot.

Your foods will not be grease-soaked, but dainty and wholesome, and your kitchen will be free of smoke and frying odors.

Beautiful cloth-bound book of new recipes and a "Calendar of Dinners" for five 2-cent stamps!

This handsome book by Marion Harris Neil gives 615 excellent tested recipes. Also contains a "Calendar of Dinners"—a dinner menu for every day in the year. The Calendar tells what; the recipes tell how. Book also contains cookery hints and the interesting story of Crisco's development. Bound in blue and gold cloth. 1. (a) Who was the apostle John's father? (b) Who was his brother? (c) In what business were they all engaged before Jesus called the brothers?

2. (a) What appellation given to John and his brother indicates that his nature was at first not gentle? (b) What incident brings out most strikingly this element of his nature? (c) On what much later occasion did he impress those who saw him as being bold?

3. (a) On what occasion did John manifest a self-seeking spirit? (b) What fact in connection with this incident leads to the belief that John's mother had left their home to accompany Jesus and his disciples? (c) On what other occasion did John make a suggestion to Jesus which the latter refused to sanction?

4. (a) With what two other disciples was John associated on terms of special intimacy with Jesus? (b) On how many and what occasions is it recorded that these three accompanied Jesus when the rest were not present? (c) What passage in John's Gospel positively identifies the "disciple whom Jesus loved" with the writer of the Gospel?

5. (a) What important acquaintance had John which made it easy for him to gain admittance to the first, informal trial of Jesus? (b) What incident shows that John stood very near the cross while Jesus was being crucified? (c) How was this wish of Jesus carried out?

6. (a) With whom did John run to the tomb of Christ when Mary Magdalene brought word that it was empty? (b) Who arrived at the tomb first? (c) What act of the other disciple indicates that John was less impetuous than he, and possibly, on this occasion, less courageous?

7. (a) What remark of Jesus led the disciples to think that John would not die before the Lord's return? (b) With what important incident after Pentecost was John associated, which led to the arrest of Peter and himself? (c) How did John and Peter prove their courage when commanded not to speak nor teach in the name of Jesus?

8. (a) What journey did John later make with Peter? (b) What prayer did they make upon reaching the city? (c) What followed? (d) What and where was the last active work of John, to which reference is made in the Acts?

9. (a) How did Paul characterize John, Peter and James, referring in one of his epistles to a visit to Jerusalem? (b) What was their attitude toward Paul? (c) How did they agree to divide the work?

10. (a) What verses in John's first epistle indicate that the author was the same John who was the close friend of Jesus? (b) What single word expresses the dominant idea of this epistle? (c) To whom were the second and the third epistles addressed? (d) What expression referring to John's presence on the Isle of Patmos, where he received the Revelation, indicates that he was a prisoner there?

AMONG THE WORKERS

—The Mutual Aid Gospel Union Mission in El Paso, Texas, which is conducted in both English and Spanish by S. Sorenson, reports continued activity among residents, the sick, prisoners, soldiers and others. Much religious literature is distributed.

—The Fall and Winter program of work of the United Presbyterian Church emphasizes the family altar in every home, concentration on soul winning, a prayer circle in every congregation, evangelistic services Sunday evenings, evangelism in the Sunday school, systematic community surveys, and simultaneous soul-winning campaigns in January. A Soul-Winner's League is being urged upon the membership.

—The story of Christian Endeavor in foreign lands reads, in many of its details, like a new book of the Acts of the Apostles. It has found its way not only to the continental countries, but in the islands of the sea its strength and helpfulness are beautifully manifested. In the Philippines it is attached to the principal missionary churches; in Formosa it is steadily gaining ground, and in Madagascar government permission has been given, and the society is rapidly progressing. In the Ellice Islands the society has a following of more than 500 members. On the island of Funafuti there are 250 people, and of these 150 are Endeavorers, loyally living up to the principles of the pledge. These Endeavorers are erecting a church to take the place of one that has served its day.

—Dr. C. I. Scofield has transferred the ownership and management of the Bible Correspondence Course which bears his name to the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago. Its broadening responsibilities, together with his widespread oral ministry, were too great a tax on his advancing years, and he felt that the facilities and energy of the institute would still further extend its usefulness in the world. The Course will be conducted on practically the same plan as hitherto by the Moody Bible Institute.

—The first paid Bible class ever attempted in New York will be held this fall and winter at West Side Young Men's Christian Association, Eighth Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street. Rev. Abraham Muste, pastor of the Fort Washington Reformed Church, will be in charge, and there will be sessions every Tuesday night for ten weeks. Commencing at 7.15 a supper will be served, and after that Mr. Muste will make an address on some modern problems of religious life, followed by a general discussion.

Desserts Everybody Likes

Minute Tapioca — Minute Gelatine

Both are quick and easy to prepare

Fifteen minutes is all the time required to make any one of many tempting desserts with Minute Tapioca. Unlike pearl tapioca (which has to be soaked several hours before using), Minute Tapioca requires no soaking. Put it right from the box into your cooking dish. Its small, clean grains soften immediately. It cooks quickly without lumps or sogginess.

Use it with fresh fruits, canned fruits, nuts, syrups or other delicacies. The short cooking required will not stew away already partially cooked fruits. It will only enrich their flavors.

If you have never used Minute Tapioca, or used it only for making Apple Tapioca and Cream Tapioca, surprise the family with Maple Walnut Tapioca, Orange Tapioca Jelly, Tapioca Fruit Mold, Chocolate Blanc-Mange Tapioca, or one of the other new and delicious dishes which we tell you how to make in our Minute Cook Book, FREE.

Minute Tapioca

Requires No Soaking

Minute Gelatine is measured for you. Using a few grains too much or too little makes a vast difference in the consistency and flavor of jelly. As the density of gelatine varies it is practically impossible to measure it by quantity. So we measure it for you by weight, in convenient amounts. This insures success always, if you follow the directions on the package.

Each envelope (there are 4 in every package) contains just the right amount of gelatine for making one pint of jelly. No soaking needed. It dissolves immediately in boiling water or hot milk. It jellies quickly and retains its shape an unusually long time. Because of the unusual refinement of Minute Gelatine it makes very clear, pure jellies.

Grocers Notice!

Minute Tapioca and Minute Gelatine are Standard Goods. This means that they are approved by both the public and the trade—are well known, and your customers want them. Approved by Westfield—Prof. Allyn. Also by Good Housekeeping Institute—Dr. Wiley. They pass every test for purity and deliciousness. You can't afford to be without them.

Meaning and Measure of Life

(B. Y. P. U. Topic for Nov. 15: II Cor. 5: 11-18.)

MRS. ELIZABETH CHENEY wrote some years ago a beautiful book called King's Gold. The story begins by describing a group of girls at the breaking up of their school life. They had gathered together in the room of one of the favorites of the group as she was about to dismantle it and pack her possessions for the journey home. While the others were chatting together, this girl noticed that a shaft of golden light, coming in from the western window, was lighting up a Scripture motto which had hung on her wall. She had glanced at the motto often, but now for the first time really caught its message: "He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again."

This verse is the 15th in the chapter from which our lesson study is taken. Here is at once the meaning and measure of life. In Mrs. Cheney's story the flash of golden sunlight on the words of this text marked the beginning of a new life for the girl graduate heroine. She began to live, not for self, as she had unconsciously been doing, but for others; and to do so with the memory in her heart of Christ's love and sacrifice.

There are a half dozen key phrases in the Scripture passage we are to study. The first is stated twice: "He died for all," or "one died for all" (verses 14 and 15). That is the great basic fact of the Christian faith: that Jesus gave his life to lift us into a new and better, a happier and safer and more fruitful life. "The love of Christ constraineth us" (verse 14). This is the only truly worthy motive for life—to find that Christ is such a winsome and wonderful friend that, remembering his sacrifice for us, we shall love to please him and shall test every act by the thought of him. To be not a servant, but a friend of his. To let his love not only make us glad but vigorous, vigorous in hearty service. "They shall not live unto themselves" (verse 15). That is the trouble with the world—people insist on living for themselves. This makes all the strife and confusion and turmoil. So we miss the meaning of life, and so we miss filling its measure. That is the life from which Jesus died to save us, for the self-life means the sin-life, the life of alienation from God, the life that hinders instead of helps him. "Therefore, if any man be in Christ he is a new creature. Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new" (verse 17). This is another way of stating the fact of the 15th verse. The new life means that we stop living for self and begin to live for Christ; that we love him and love others more than we love self, so are glad to serve. "We persuade men" (verse 11). When we have found this rich treasure, the motive and the power of living for Jesus, we wish others to find it, too. So we tell them, we must tell them, about Christ and his plans and his power.

The Call to Heroic Service

(Epworth League Topic for Nov. 15: Isa. 6: 1-11.)

THE Prophet Isaiah's vision meant primarily the cleansing of his soul from sin and an induement of supernatural power to perform the work to which he had been called. The whole narrative implies heroism. It took heroism to stand up before the angel who flew toward him with the burning coal. He must not flinch while the coal is applied to his lips. It took heroism to say after the vision and the cleansing and the call: "Here am I, send me."

Professor James, not long before his death, wrote a striking essay o "The Modern Substitute for War." I was in answer to the question: "Wha can men do to give them the courag which they used to find upon the bat tlefield?"

Alas that the bright hopes for wide spread peace have been so rudely shat tered during these recent ghastl weeks in Europe! Yet we know tha war is not necessary to make me brave. And we know that the youn people of America have just as grea an opportunity before them to b courageous in an atmosphere of peac as the young people of Europe hav to be courageous in the dreadful at mosphere of war.

Professor James's idea was tha work is the modern substitute for war that to do one's work vigorously, en thusiastically and promptly, throwing the whole of one's self into it, not con tent with compromises and second rate achievements, will put the quality of courage into life.

The call to follow Christ is cer tainly the call to be brave. For some reason or other the artists of the early and middle ages were led to over emphasize the gentleness and meek ness of Christ's nature. One cannot help feeling in reading the Gospel narratives in the strenuous atmos phere of the twentieth century that there was much of sternness and hardy, intense activity in that brief life of Jesus. He was not afraid to attack, single-handed, the world's forces of evil. He calls upon his fol lowers to attack them in the same whole-hearted and strenuous fashion.

The life of purity and service to which he calls us is a life which ap peals to our highest ambitions and our fondest dreams. To follow him in at tacking injustice and cruelty and wrong, to recruit others who shall also follow his standard, to be found in the thick of the fight, standing for all that is noble and true and divine, this is the call of the Christ, the call worth heeding.

Christian Endeavor Pledge

(C. E. Topic for November 15, led by Lookout Committee. Eccles. 5: 1-7)

TRUSTING in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise him that I will strive to do whatever he would like to have me do; that I will make it the rule of my life to pray and to read the Bible every day, and to support my own church in every way, especially by attending all her regular Sunday and mid-week services, unless prevented by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Saviour; and that just so far as I know how, throughout my whole life, I will endeavor to lead a Christian life.

As an active member, I promise to be true to all my duties, to be present at and to take some part, aside from singing, in every Christian Endeavor prayer meeting, unless hindered by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Lord and Master. If obliged to be absent from the monthly consecration meeting of the society, I will, if possible, send at least a verse of Scripture to be read in response to my name at the roll-call.

There is one thing that should always be remembered in considering the matter of religious pledges: that is, that what saves us is not what we promise God but what he promises us. Only one promise, that a very sweeping one, needs to be made to Christ: that just as fast as he makes his will clear to us we will obey. This puts us into the way of faith, so that we can trust him to fulfil his promises to us. The Christian Endeavor pledge states this all-inclusive promise of faithful obedience. And faithfulness to him will include (1) faithfulness in prayer; (2) faithfulness to the Bible; (3) faithfulness to the church; (4) faithfulness to the duty of testifying for Christ.

The Widow's Mite today means that sum which some one with difficulty can spare from a scanty income to help the widows and orphans of Europe's war. Send it at once to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund.

Oranges and Grapefruit—

as Juicy, Sweet and Spicy as in the Golden Groves of Balmy, Sunny Florida

The climate and soil of Florida combine to produce oranges and grapefruit of surpassing quality — juicy, sweet, and altogether delicious.

Broad-minded Florida growers have organized for the culture of citrus fruits by methods that insure this quality, and for picking, packing and shipping fruit to reach users in prime condition.

This co-operative, non-profit-making association works on the theory that whatever is for the good of the consumer of oranges and grapefruit is equally desirable for the grower of these fruits. Its name and trademark—to be found in red on boxes and wrappers—is this:

FLORIDA CITRUS EXCHANGE

In the great groves and packing houses of the growers who compose the Florida Citrus Exchange every person must wear gloves at all times.

This rule is one of many enforced by the Exchange to assure the consumer juicy, sweet, spicy, tree-ripened oranges and grapefruit. No child labor is employed in the packing houses. Every precaution is taken to prevent damage to the fruit.

The growers who form the Florida Citrus Exchange believe their interests and those of the consumers of their fruits to be identical, and endeavor to put into the markets oranges and grapefruit so good that the buyers will want more of them. It is their aim and intention that this "red mark" shall be a guarantee of your money's worth.

FLORIDA CITRUS EXCHANGE

This mark means good fruit at fair prices for the consumer, a living profit for the dealer and a proper return on his money for the grower. The Exchange assures to the consumer full value for the money, no matter what grade of fruit is bought, and gives dealers, wholesale and retail, a minimum of loss in distribution.

Up-to-date grocery and fruit stores generally carry Florida Citrus Exchange oranges and grapefruit. Tell your dealer now that you want this fruit during the season, and doubtless he will arrange to get it for you.

Booklet telling how to serve oranges and grapefruit in many ways and containing scores of recipes for their use in cookery and confections mailed for four cents in stamps.

interests become seriously involved. An agreement is reported to have been reached with Austria concerning the damages resulting to Italian ships and lives by the Austrian mines in the Adriatic, by a reference of the questions at issue to the Hague tribunal. The only thing in which Italy is at the moment apparently seriously concerned is the state of anarchy prevailing in Albania. The upshot in this case will probably be that Italy will occupy the whole or part of that country, with the consent of the other Powers. Certainly something has got to be done there, and this seems the most feasible.

The Japanese are reported to have had heavy losses in their attack on Kiauchau. They did lose one old cruiser, the Takachiho, and some three hundred lives in the bay, through a mine. The Germans also lost a torpedo boat, which succeeded in making its escape from the harbor, but was later sunk by the Japanese. A Japanese fleet is officially reported to be off Hawaii on the lookout for German cruisers. The small German cruiser Geier is in Honolulu harbor and will probably be interned there.

The little rebellion of some dissatisfied Boers in South Africa has come to the expected end. Unsupported by the great body of the Boers it has practically collapsed. The anti-German riots in England are rather astonishing. They hardly seem in harmony with the character of the English people as manifested heretofore.

Recruiting in Great Britain is not progressing any too well; for a time there was quite a rush, but lately it has dropped off again. If the war continues as long as is the present prospect, it would not be at all surprising if conscription was resorted to. The Englishman hates the very sound of this word, but in all great wars, in our Civil War, for example, conscription has been resorted to. Reports in the English papers state that many of the Irish young men have suddenly begun to leave for America and cite two or three dozen specified villages from which they have departed.

The news from the ocean this week has been quite abundant, and, even aside from the sinking of the Japanese cruiser hereinbefore referred to, quite exciting. The German cruiser Emden made another brief appearance off the Indian coast, 150 miles from Cochin. This time she was reported as having captured and sunk four vessels of the enemy and also an ocean-going dredger. She sent in two other steamers which she had captured with the crews of those which she had sunk. This cruiser has now sunk seventeen British ships and captured twenty-two in about a month. This record surpasses that of the Alabama for the same period of time during her career.

Another aspirant for the record as commerce destroyer, according to the London Daily Mail, under date of October 23, as cabled here, is the Karlsruhe, a new cruiser and one of the fastest vessels afloat. She has captured fourteen and sunk thirteen British ships in the Atlantic. One of the captured vessels put into Teneriffe ith the crews of the other thirteen, and reported the captures. The vessels were mostly engaged in the South American trade, and had a total tonnage of some 65,000.

Rumor states that the Portuguese have sent a contingent of 25,000 troops to the aid of the Allies and that these are now on the firing line. In view of the disturbances in Portugal itself, it would seem that this report is more than improbable; also, it is very doubtful whether Portugal has that number of troops in condition to take the field.

Of the campaign between the Servians and the Austrians, it is very difficult to say anything with any certainty of being right. I have spent many hours in trying to get a satisfactory idea of the real situation on Austria's southern border, and must confess my failure. Taking the Servian despatches as true, which I greatly doubt, one day the fighting is a hundred miles across the Austrian border, and the next day it is on the Servian border, manifestly an impossibility. Troops cannot move a hundred miles in a day. This example of the news is founded on laborious work in picking out on the map the places mentioned in the cables. All that I can say, with even comparative certainty, is that the Servians have not penetrated any distance into Austria, and on the other hand the Austrians have not advanced at all into Servia.

The British and French fleets, acting in conjunction with the Montenegrin land forces, have, during the week, been bombarding Cattaro, but the results are not yet known.

The campaign in Galicia is also, to a large degree, shrouded in obscurity. The official reports conflict greatly, but one thing comes out with clearness, that the Russians have been driven out of Hungary and that their campaign in Galicia generally is not progressing satisfactorily. The fortress of Przemysl still holds out, or has been completely relieved. This much is certain, taking as authority the Russian bulletins for the first, the Austrian for the second statement.

Fighting is severe and continuous around Lemberg, but here the result is very uncertain. Farther to the west the Russians appear to have been driven out, and the Austrians are advancing along the San River northward into Poland, toward Ivangorod, though how far they have gotten is uncertain.

In central Poland itself the whole of the country up to the gates of Warsaw seems to be securely held by the Germans. The line of the Vistula River, from where it crosses the East Prussian border to where it penetrates into Galicia, after crossing Poland, about marks the easterly boundary of the territory of which the Germans have made themselves the masters.

This comprises all the iron, coal and textile industries of Poland, which, as regards these industries, practically means the whole of Russia. It also gives control of most of the lines of railroad by which Russia can move troops from the interior into Germany or to the German border, and its possession by the enemy must greatly hamper the Russians in their troop movements.

Warsaw itself has not yet fallen, but from the accounts reaching us from impartial sources that event seems likely to take place in a comparatively short time. The amount of time its reduction will require will in large measure depend on whether or not the Germans have any of their famous siege guns, which have so strikingly proved their value at Antwerp and elsewhere, in this Eastern campaign.

I have heretofore called attention to the really serious fighting that is taking place in Africa, and which we are completely losing sight of in our interest in the battlefields in Europe. During this week this fighting increased in intensity, and in the skirmishing on the borders of German West African and the British South African provinces over a hundred men were killed and many wounded, which is a far higher casualty list in proportion to the numbers engaged than the European battlefields can show.

In the East Prussian campaign, while fighting continues, it is more to hold positions already won than offensive in character. There are reasons why it would not be surprising if peace negotiations which are going on in Europe, not on the initiative of the United States, should succeed; and while the situation cannot reasonably be described as more than hopeful, still there is a chance that the clash of arms and the thunder of artillery will be ended by Christmas Day.

JESUS AND PETER

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

If Peter had been allowed to fight, to rush headlong into the fray, meeting violence with violence, the result of the scene in Gethsemane might have been different, so far as he was concerned. Indeed, he might have emerged covered with what men call heroism or glory! But the test before which he succumbed was to be still, to yield, to allow the wrong to be [illegible] He was prepared on one side of his nature, but left the [illegible] and unwatched. The lesson for us all is urgent. We may brace ourselves to realize human standards, but fail absolutely when we are summoned to face and realize the divine ideal, for which Jesus stands. The soldier finds it much harder to lie down under fire than to charge the foe. It is easier to burn once at the stake than endure the slow fire of years of contrariety. The great preacher may fail amid the fret of his home. We can [illegible] ourselves, because we know not the next level on which we are called to stand with Jesus; but the humble and lowly heart that leans on him finds that his grace is always sufficient.

Peter's Sin and Christ's Grief

By Arthur H. Howland, B.D.

WHAT was the difference between the sin of Judas and the sin of Peter? The difference was this: Judas probably hated Jesus; Peter surely did not. What Judas was after was to do his Master harm. At least he was willing to harm him for the sake of the silver. It is not likely that at any minute of his transgression Peter had the slightest idea that his denial would do Jesus any real harm. And probably it did not. But one thing Peter had forgotten: that was, that his sin would make Jesus sad.

That is the part of sin which we are always likeliest to forget. We sometimes think of the harm sin may do ourselves, of the harm it may bring to others, but the grief it will bring to Christ—that we forget. It is hard to find in literature a more perfect picture of repentance than that of the guilty queen Guinivere, lying at the king's feet and realizing for the first time that her sin had broken his heart. He forgave her and went forth to die in battle. It was too late that she cried after him:

Gone—my lord!
Gone, through my sin, to slay and to be slain!
And he forgave me, and I could not speak.
Farewell! I should have answered his farewell.
His mercy choked me. Gone, my lord the king.
My own true lord!

That is the very point and essence of sin—that it grieves God. In reality that is what the crucifixion means. It shows the world how much sin hurts God. Those wounds of Christ are the wounds of God, caused by the world's vast sin, in which your sins and mine have a part. And every time we sin we "crucify him afresh." We grieve him and wound him as he was grieved and wounded on Calvary.

It has been hard to understand the sudden cowardice of Peter. In the garden instead of standing close by his Master he merely followed on the outskirts of the crowd. The episode of the sword must have added greatly to his fear. He had violently attacked and wounded a servant of the high priest. That made him a criminal, liable also to arrest, and, doubtless, to execution. And when he found that he could be of no service with his sword he may have felt convinced that he could be of no service in any way. All was confusion, and mystery, and danger. So he followed "afar off," keeping watch, and perhaps in his heart determined to come to his Master's assistance if he saw any opportunity of being of service.

When the crowd reached the high priest's house, where that first informal trial was held which we studied two weeks ago, Peter repeated his blunder. Instead of pressing his way through the crowd to a place near Jesus' side, he went downstairs and sat by the fire. Certainly he should have been standing by Jesus then. They were searching for witnesses against him. Peter ought to have insisted upon being a witness for the defense. Who better than he could have told of the kindness and purity and real piety of that life now at stake, the life of his best friend? Yet instead of doing that, he was sitting in the comfortable warmth of the fire among his Master's enemies, denying him. It was a sudden and grievous fall. And he had boasted so confidently: "Lord, I am ready to go with thee, both into prison, and to death. Although all shall be offended, yet will not I. If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee in any wise. I will lay down my life for thy sake." (Luke 22: 33; Mark 14: 29-31; John 13: 37.) He was too confident. His confidence was in himself, not in Jesus. So he went down.

The practical question for each of us is: "How are we going to avoid falling as Peter did?" (1) Remember that to fall means to grieve Christ, our best Friend. (2) Get in close among his friends, among those who are standing by him, not on the outskirts among his enemies. The way to keep from denying him is to keep busy witnessing for him. (3) Put your confidence for safety not in self, but in him. (4) Receive the blessing Peter found at Pentecost, the blessing which cleansed his soul and filled him with divine strength and courage, courage that could face the angry mob at Jerusalem, accusing them of having been the murderers of the Son of God, and power to lead three thousand of them to repentance.

That was to be the safety of Peter during the years to come: an earnest desire to help people. So long as we are thinking of our own safety, of our own comfort, we are, just as when confident of our own strength, in real danger. But when, filled with a burning love for the Master and the determination to save and help others in his name, we go ahead in his strength to arduous service, we are safe. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." But God "is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy." (Jude 24.)

THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, November 15, 1914. Jesus and Peter. Mark 14: 27-31, 53, 54, 66-72. GOLDEN TEXT. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." 1 Cor. 10: 12.

Following Afar

By Amos R. Wells, Litt.D.

IMPETUOUS, headstrong, obstinate, confident, bold, cowardly, weak, sinning, sorry—oh, so sorry!—forgiven, uplifted from the pit—why, Peter is just you and I over again.

Hear him assert that though all men leave Jesus, he will not; that though all others deny him, he will be true. See him flourishing that foolish, mischievous sword of his! How high was the old fisherman's head! And then see that head hanging down as Peter leaves the high priest's house, weeping bitterly.

Christ is ever firm, ever constant; how can we account for our inconstancy to him, we who, like Peter, are wave-men called to be rock-men? Is it not because we are not yet bound to Jesus by the firm gravitation of love?

That sentence about Peter, as Christ was led away, a prisoner, from the Garden of Gethsemane, explains the whole sad story: "Peter followed him afar off"—"followed," happily, but "afar off." "There is an Eastern

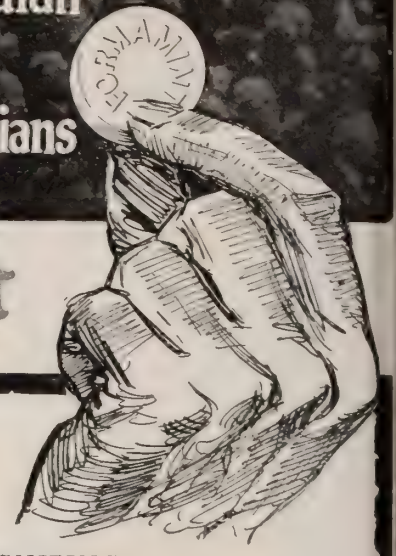
Formamint



From an article in "The Medical Review of Reviews,"
New York, Dec., 1911.

"I have found Formamint to be an excellent antiseptic and bactericide, harmless in its action, exceedingly pleasant to take, capable of relieving painful local symptoms quickly and permanently, and of shortening the duration of inflamed conditions of the throat."

From an article in "The Lancet,"
March 28th, 1908.

"The sole object of a medical lozenge is to keep part of the mouth or throat one desires to treat bathed for a time in a drug dissolved in the saliva. I know of only one medicated lozenge—FORMAMINT—which meets this requirement."

Professor O. Chiari, M. D.,
Director of the Clinic for Throat and Nose diseases, Vienna, writes:

"FORMAMINT" has been used in a large number of patients with the greatest success as a means of prophylactic mouth disinfection, and without the least harmful reaction."

So that you may see how effective these pleasant Formamint Tablets are in mouth and throat troubles, we will gladly mail you a generous sample tube on receipt of a 2c stamp to pay postage. Write for it today.

RECOGNIZING the importance of surgical cleanliness of the throat—of keeping the delicate membranes of the mouth and of the throat as free from harmful germ-life as may be—more than 10,000 physicians have strongly endorsed the regular use of Formamint.

For Formamint, disinfecting the mouth and the throat, checks germs that settle on the throat linings with every breath, and thus protects the system against infectious diseases of which sore throat is but one.

And it is so easy and pleasant to take Formamint. The little tablet sets free in the saliva a germicide that kills harmful germ life and helps the system restore the tissues to health.

For throats already sore, Formamint is excellent—far more effective than any gargle. But this preventive use—this protective use—is even more important because it safeguards the system. Let it be the guardian of your throat. At all druggists.

end," says Henry Van Dyke, "of a e so sweet that the earth which lies und its roots becomes permeated h fragrance, and little bits of it are l as amulets and worn by princes. u and I are but common clay, but we will keep close to Jesus Christ, sweetness will flow through our y lives and make them fragrant and cious forever." This is true of Per's life, because on the whole he d keep close to Christ, and ceased to ow him "afar off."

There is a story of a man who asked Eastern king how he might avoid ptation. The king bade the man e a vessel brimful of oil and carry hrough the streets of the city with- spilling a drop. "And if you spill rop," said the king fiercely, "your d shall be cut off." Two execu- ers with drawn swords marched be- d him to carry out the king's or- s. There was a fair in the town, l the streets were crowded with ple, but you may be sure the man s very careful, and he returned to palace with every drop of oil. en the king asked, "Did you see any while you walked through the ?" "Not a person," the man an- ered. "I was thinking only of the " "Then," said the king, "you have rned how to avoid temptation. Fix r mind as firmly on God as you d it on that vessel of oil, and you l not be tempted to sin."

That is why Peter fell under his ptation, denying his Lord when stioned by a servant girl. He was nking of Peter, of Peter's danger, l not of Jesus, and Jesus' love, and us' power to save. And that is why also fall so often when we are pted. But following Jesus does not uire us to take our eyes from peo- . We look at them, look at them nestly, but seeing Jesus in them we ire to help them for his sake, and are saved from temptation to wrong m.

God believes in what you may be," s John Kelman wisely. That is y with every temptation he makes way to escape. That is why he cast on Peter that wonderful look, so re- achful, so sad, yet so loving, so pa- nt, so hopeful. It was the fisher- n's way to escape, and he took Jesus had bent upon Judas just h looks, but Judas had shut his s and his heart.

"Repentance," says Russell H. Con- ll, "is the greatest deed that can be e on earth." Thank God that Peter that great deed. To be sure, the meful denial could not be undone. rever that act of denial will be pled with our thought of Peter, and with Peter's thought of himself. But also forever our thought of Peter will be coupled with the joy of God's for- giving grace.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

"COURTS." All the older Oriental cities are built with one or two main streets and a labyrinth of small alleys ending in blank walls. Not one house in a hundred has a window open- ing outwards; they all open into the house itself, whose rooms are ranged about a larger space called the "court." The smallest dwelling has at least one such space, which is either open to the sky or covered in some way. The dwell- ings of the wealthy often have a num- ber of such courts, one of which be- longs to the women, another to the servants, and in all there is an outer court where the men alone assemble and guests are received. The high priest being a public functionary no doubt had a large place for visitors and strangers.

"Warming himself." There was not a single chimney in or about Jerusa- lem, nor a house that was warmed by anything better than an open fire. Most likely Peter warmed himself at a brazier of live coals in the center of some room about which many crowded to enjoy the warmth. To this present day Oriental houses lack chimneys, garrets and cellars as we know them.

"Thou art a Galilean." "Thy speech bewrayeth thee." Palestine has been through all history a little world in itself, where villages and districts differ from each other as nations and peoples elsewhere. Bethlehem is only four miles away from Jerusalem, and yet a Bethlehemite is easily recognized anywhere. Certain peculiarities of face, clothing, headdress, jewelry, and, above all, speech easily mark out man or woman anywhere.

From Judea to Galilee is three days away, and to this present hour people from the two districts are easily rec- ognizable by dress and speech.

The characteristics of the trans- Jordan country are even still more no- ticeable, so that the dwellers from be- yond the Jordan are known anywhere in Syria. The episode of the Gileadites at the fords of the Jordan could be re- produced today at any of the main fords of the river and by the use of exactly the same word "shibboleth."

The same clue to a man's origin and character holds in the United States. We easily recognize a Northerner or a Southerner by his speech.

As to courses of Bible study you cannot do ch better than the Senior Graded Lessons of International Sunday School Association. ey cover four years under the following es. First year, Preparations for Christian- ; second year, Landmarks in Christian His- tory; third year, The Conquering Christ; fourth year, The Modern Church. These books you can obtain from your denominational pub- lishing house or through THE CHRISTIAN HER- ALD. Social Plans for Young People (Reisner), recently mentioned in these columns, will help you solve the entertainment question you raise.

Q. We have a school of about 200 members. It is not organized on the graded plan, and we are using the International Uniform Lessons. In your opinion would it be well for us to make a change? Does the International Association publish a complete set of graded lessons? If so, where could we obtain samples of the same? Where can we obtain your book The Superin- tendent and His Work?—O. S. T.

A. In a school of 200 you can introduce the graded lessons. Samples of these can be ob- tained of Methodist Book Concern, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York. These are the lessons au- thorized by the International Sunday School Association. It would not be wise, of course, for you to divide a school of 200 into classes of 9-, 10-, 11- and 12-year children, and to apply each year the lesson graded for that year. But you could have a department class of those from 9 to 12, and another from 13 to 16. Then teach to each class the grade lesson for one of the years, and the next year the lesson for the fol- lowing year. The lessons for each department are graded nearly equally as to strength after you pass the Beginners' Department. A good method is to try the graded lessons in the Be- ginners' and Primary grade first, and later apply them to the Junior, and then to the other departments.

The Superintendent and His Work, as well as all the books referred to in this department, may be secured through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

DR. GLADDEN'S DEFENSE OF THE PAPACY

When Dr. Washington Gladden published his first article in Harper's Weekly in defense of Rome against the free criticisms of the secular and religious press of America, dealing with the political pretensions of the Papacy, his attitude was so remarkable and unprecedented for a pastor claiming to be the exponent of Protestant principles that it was widely discussed. On this subject an article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 2 describes the situation in these words:

"It is a sign of the times that to-day a Protestant could write it, and that Harper's, which has been generally recognized as a Protestant periodical, if it had any religious leanings at all, could publish it. In a well-written editorial in the Presbyterian for July 22, we are reminded that lately five different magazines, commonly regarded as Protestant, have published pro-Catholic articles. We agree entirely with the editor: Protestantism must become all the more positive and determined to resist and resent any effort looking toward the betrayal of Protestantism, or substituting it by Catholicism."

A second article from Dr. Gladden's pen has since appeared, further disgusting what he called the "Anti-Papal Panic." A notable reply to both of the former contributions to the Papal defense is printed in the issue of Harper's Weekly for October 3, the writer being Mr. W. W. Prescott, editor of the Sentinel Magazine, Washington, D. C. Mr. Prescott recalls the fact that in June, 1908, at a conference in the Apostolic Mission House, connected with a Catholic university in Washington, "the keynote was sounded in these words: 'Our purpose is to make America dominantly Catholic.' The reason for this declaration of war upon American Protestantism," Mr. Prescott explains in his article in Harper's Weekly, "was set forth in the same conference by Rev. P. C. Kelley, president of the Church Extension Society, in these words: 'Without a doubt, if American Protestantism were blotted off the religious map of the world, the work of the so-called Reformers of the fifteenth century within fifty years might well be called dead.' 'Evidently,' observes Mr. Prescott, 'the plan to make America dominantly Catholic was intended to involve the blotting out of American Protestantism.'"

Mr. Prescott's article is instructive and enlightening in another very important respect. We give below a quotation from his article in Harper's Weekly which will be new to a majority of readers:

"UNDER the title 'Manual of Christian Doctrine,' prepared by 'a Seminary Professor,' and published with due authorization by John Joseph McVey of Philadelphia (eighteenth edition, 1914), a Roman Catholic textbook has been published which, according to the preface, 'is intended as a manual of religious instruction not only in the Novitiates and Scholastic-ates of teaching congregations, but also in the classes of high schools, academies, and colleges.' In the section on 'Relations of Church and State' occur the following questions and answers:

Why is the church superior to the state?

Because the end to which the church tends is the greatest of all ends.

What right has the Pope to abrogate at this concordat?

The right to annul those laws or acts of government that would injure the salvation of souls or disturb the universal unity of religion.

"In the same section, under the subtitle 'Union of Church and State,' are found these questions and answers:

What must should the state do that respect the rights and the liberty of the church?

The state should aid, protect, and defend the church.

On what is this duty founded?

On the obligation of civil society to profess religion. For, since nations owe from the Creator, they owe him as nations, adoration, love, and obedience just as do individuals.

What then is the principal obligation of heads of states?

Their principal obligation is to practise the Catholic religion themselves and as they are in power to protect the Catholic Church.

Has the state the right and the duty to prevent attacks on [illegible]?

Yes. It has the right and the duty to do so both for the good of the nation, and for that of the Catholic community, for religious unity is the strongest guarantee of social unity.

May the state separate itself from the church?

No, because it may not withdraw from the acquired right of others.

In connection to giving to the question that the state has neither the right nor the duty to be neutral as was proposed to protect it?

Two questions to which [illegible]. It is founded principally on the fact that numerous evil[illegible] and liberty of conscience and of worship, on liberty of speech and of the press.

Why is liberation to be condemned?

1. Because it destroys all subordination of the state to the church; 2. Because it overthrows the whole order with right; 3. Because it destroys the social foundation of Christ, and reduces the benefits to mere theories. (Pages 181-183)

"This," writes Mr. Prescott, "is the instruction which is being given in Roman Catholic institutions of learning to future American citizens of the Roman faith. It correctly represents the Roman Catholic attitude on the relation of church and state."

WAR'S EFFECT ON RELIGION

Interview with Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., by a correspondent in London

One of the gleams of light in this very dark time is the awakening interest in religious matters which is undoubtedly taking place in England. Ministers of all denominations gladly admit that while the financial side of their work is handicapped by the war the spiritual side is helped; people seem to have found their souls again. Thus, while at first sight it might have been expected that the Chapman-Alexander campaign in the British Isles would be a failure, there was no surprise at its great success.

Dr. Chapman's passion for evangelism dates from the early years of his ministry, when he came under the spell of D. L. Moody and worked so [illegible] supported by the great evangelist. But only six years have passed since he relinquished the pastoral work which he carried on in addition to his evangelistic activities. As pastor he was in charge of a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, with the largest church membership in the world, some 5,000, and the minister of a very important New York church.

And now he has been conducting services at the Central Y. M. C. A. headquarters, London, and mid-week services at the Guildhall (a unique event) with as keen enthusiasm as ever he showed.

The meetings under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. were of course for men only, and Dr. Chapman says that, contrary to the usual opinion, he considered men were more easily influenced by religion than women. Many ministers and evangelists hold the contrary view, but the doctor's is probably the right one, for no one knows men and their problems as he does.

"My experience has certainly been that men are more easily influenced," said the famous evangelist, "and more religiously disposed at bottom. Women are certainly more easily persuaded to attend meetings, but if you can once get the men there they are more readily reached. I know of no audience so easy to reach as an audience of men.

found that men are quite distinctly religious. I admit that many men are not in sympathy with the church and often dislike the clergy, but when it comes to a straight-out test the average man has a great deal more religion than we think. I've found that to be the case everywhere. Comparing men's meetings with women's meetings, the results in the former are better by far to me than in the latter. That was true of the meetings we held in Scotland last year, and it is always so in America.

"I have a high opinion of Scotch audiences," he said heartily. "Scotchmen come to meetings very willingly, though they are not the easiest to win at the start, but when you have once got them they are splendid. They never leave you then. That was our experience in Glasgow last year, where, once we got well started, the audiences never flagged. I think I enjoyed my work in Scotland more than anywhere else," the doctor added.

"Australian gatherings," Dr. Chapman went on, "are perhaps easiest to get hold of, and a peculiarity of theirs is their eagerness to ask questions; they just delight in it; why, I don't know. It is not at all an uncommon event for a question to be asked in the middle of the sermon. It was in Melbourne that I had the biggest audience I ever addressed—twelve thousand people."

It is quite impossible to keep the war out of any conversation, and Dr. Chapman was asked if he considered the present a favorable time to conduct a campaign.

"I think it is," said he, "though of course one realizes that it is a time of great excitement and that men are enlisting in large numbers. But I remember during our war with Spain, and that was a very little war compared with this, we had the very best time we ever had for teaching men. Indeed, during this present war there has been an increase in church attendance in America. There, as in all parts of the world, there had been a drifting away from the church, due in part to commercial prosperity and the general tendency to give pleasure too large a place, but I think that this war, coming on so suddenly, has in a way stunned people and made them think.

"It seems to me people had stopped thinking on religious matters, and this great struggle has called them to their senses again. In America the war seems to have had a sobering effect, as I have said; the churches are filling up and people generally are giving more thought to spiritual things than they have done for some time."

LIFE AND THE WEAVER

LIFE is a woven fabric;
The pattern and web are wrought
By the dark threads and the golden
That into the loom are shot.

You cannot judge God's purpose
By the thrust of a single thread,
What to you may be dark, mysterious,
May be gloriously bright instead.

For he holds in mind a pattern
As fair as his love is strong,
Which grows each day in the weaving;
Not a single thread goes wrong.

No warp in his hands shall tangle,
No slumber his eyelids close,
We only can thwart his purpose
When our stubborn wills impose.

Our tangled and broken efforts
To walk in his kind commands
Will give life an added luster
Restored by his loving hands.

So trust in the Weaver's wisdom,
In his love and unfailing care,
And the fabric of life completed
Some day will be wondrous fair.

The New Howard Ionic

The latest achievement of the HOWARD Watchmakers and one of the most beautiful Time-pieces ever designed.

The HOWARD Ionic—12-size, 17-jewel, extra-thin, open-face, the movement adjusted to three positions, temperature and isochronism, cased in a single-joint gold-filled case of special design, exceedingly flat and compact—price $40.

Owing to the extreme care given to the finish and adjustment of every HOWARD movement, only a small number of these new watches will be available this year.

The more enterprising jewelers will make a point of having a few to show, and we would strongly advise anyone who is interested to see the Ionic and make reservation at an early date.

A Howard Watch is always worth what you pay for it. The price of each Watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD WATCH. The jeweler who can is a good man to know.

Sanders is sure a great cattle man. He's kept the stock close in near the home ranch, an' he's still got a lot of good Nebrasky hay left over from the winter feedin'. Baled hay's one sign of the ruination of the cattle business, an' it comes near to bein' a sign o' the last o' me.

"Well, all's snug as c'n be, an' I'm loafin' before a fire in the ranch house, an' the blizzard's shriekin' like a million demons let loose, when in comes Shorty Blevens yellin', 'Sheep!'

"'Sheep?' says I suspicious. 'Come here, man, let's feel your pulse.'

"'Pulse nothin',' answers Shorty. 'There's five thousand of 'em if there's one.'

"'What're you talkin' about?' I ask him.

"'On the hill yander,' says Shorty. 'The fence ain't goin' to hold 'em.'

"'Why didn't you say so?' I roar at him, gittin' into my boots an' other things in a hurry.

BLEVENS has already told Bill an' Randy, an' the four of us hit it across the meadows, an' up the hill as fast as the ponies c'n carry us against that wind. Mind you, the blizzard's been ragin' for three days, an' it ain't got the same edge it started with. But it's bad enough yet, what with the lead-gray sky low down on the hills, an' the wind screamin' out of the northwest, an' the hard, dry snow slashin' your face like knives, an' the cold eatin' into your bones. But we take the hill at the lope.

"An' there's a sight! The four-wire fence's bent with holdin' back a river of sheep, lookin' foamy an' dirty-white, like the Platte when it's tumblin' over its banks after a spring freshet. There's acres of sheep, stretchin' out to right an' left an' back till you can't see the last of 'em in the gray blur where the sheep an' the hill an' the sky an' the blizzard's all jumbled together. In places they're leapin' up over each other like made waves over a log-jam, but other places they're packed so tight they can't move, or sinkin' down in sickenin' little pools where the weakest can't stand up no longer from hunger an' cold an' exhaustshun.

"But the horriblest thing is right along the fence, where the foremost has been drove onto the barbs. They're hangin' there dead an' dyin' or strugglin' in their poor, silly way. There ain't no herder or no dog in sight—nothin' but sheep that's run helpless before the blizzard till they've brought up against the most onhospitable wire fence they could 'a' found in the whole o' Wyoming. An' if that fence holds, an' the blizzard lasts like that a few hours longer, there'll be two thousand dead woollies laid out there, an' a good job too, seein' how they're takin' the cowpuncher's livin' away from him by spellin' the grandest cattle country the sun ever set on. An' Sanders insists' this retributhion!

"Them's my first thoughts, which don't save me from the sight of them sheep a-dyin', or from the sounds that come from the sickenin' muck. The wind's bleatin' 'em beatin'-est, but I hardly notice it no more, because that terrible bleatin' an' whimperin' is different from anything I've ever heard before, not havin' been familiar with the ways of sheep. I've never heard any livin' creature take on like that, an' I don't very much enjoy the feelin' it's givin' me.

"It's too deep for me, an' I ain't goin' to try no fancy explainin' what comes over me, but this is just as it happened: I'm sittin' there purty cold an' stiff an' sick in my saddle, when I'm gradual aware of another sound besides the howl of the wind an' the cryin' of the sheep an' the mutterin' of the men behind me. It creeps in like a whisper at first, low an' uncertain, an' I reckon it's some new note that I ain't recognized before in the blizzard. Then it's gone, an' I turn to say somethin' to Shorty; but I'm stopped. There's that sound again, plainer an' louder than before. This time I listen for it, an' when it comes nex' time it seems to me like a voice, only very far away an' what you might call strange. It brings me up standin' in my stirrups, an' I look out across them acres of sheep toward the dull, gray skyline, thinkin' maybe it's a herder callin' through the storm. But there ain't no human soul in sight in that direction, an' anyhow the nex' minute I know it's no herder callin' out with a voice like that. For the voice is soft an' gentle, an' the strangest you ever heard, an' doesn't belong at all to a place like that. I listen, an' can't make out at first what it's sayin', an' it worries me. There's somethin' familiar about it, an' I'm guessin' to beat all creation, when all sudden my head plays me a funny trick, an' I ain't there at all on the 6 Bar J. I'm away back East in a little house, by an open window that lets in all kinds of drowsy smells an' the twitter of birds an' the cacklin' of hens. I'm a little boy sittin' on a stool at my mother's knee. She's readin' to me out of the big brown Bible, an' it's her voice I hear. She's readin' somethin' I don't understand at all, an' don't care much about anyhow, except that her voice is very sweet an' nice to hear. But I know now what she's sayin':

"'An' Jesus said unto him, Feed my sheep.'

"That's it, over an' over again: 'Feed my sheep. Feed my sheep. Feed my sheep.' The little boy's head's a-noddin' sleepy-like in the drowsy afternoon, an' that's all he remembers of his Bible lesson: 'An' Jesus said unto him, Feed my sheep.' For he's wakened sudden by a harsh voice in his ear:

"'Well, Boss, what're we goin' to do?'

"I turn an' look at him, but I'm dumb. There's a thunderin' in my ears for a minute, an' when it's gone there's the voice again, ridin' on the wind. It ain't her voice no more, but somethin' louder an' sterner'n hers could ever be. But what it says is the same: 'Feed my sheep!' It's an order now, ringin' across the hills like the bugles at Fort Washakie:

"'Feed my sheep!'

"'The fence's goin',' yells Bill, jumpin' down from his horse.

"'Cut the wire,' I yell at him, before I know what I'm sayin'.

"'What?' says he.

"'Cut the wire!' I tell him again, though my voice don't sound like mine no more, an' I'm sure I never meant to say anything the least like that.

"The three of 'em stare at me.

"'Didn't you hear me?' says I.

"'Yes, but—' stammers Bill.

"'Then do it, you idiot!' An' this time I know it's myself that's speakin' an' so do them cowpunchers.

"'An' let 'em into the hay?' asks Shorty, his eyes poppin' most out.

"'Of course,' says I. 'Can't you see they're dyin'?'

"Perhaps they think I've gone queer from the cold or somethin'. Anyhow they don't move until I dig the spurs into my horse an' ride straight at Shorty, grabbin' him by the collar, an' half jerkin' him out of his seat.

"'Git down!' says I, very quiet. "Or have I got to make you?'

"Shorty mumbles somethin', but tumbles off his horse in a hurry. An' just then, out of the tail of my eye, I see Randy turn his pony's head down hill, an' give him the spur.

"'No you don't!' I yell, at the same time whippin' out my gun.

"'Now come back here, you coyote, unless you want some o' this,' says I.

"Randy comes grouchin' back, flashin' fire at me out of his eyes, but keepin' his mouth proper shut. An' then I'm struck by the idee that it ain't just right to make them do somethin' that's against their principles, an' dangerous business too, remember'n Sanders. So I line 'em up by the fence, an' keep one eye on 'em while I go at the job myself. It's only a minute's work with my knife an' the butt of my gun, though the dead an' dyin' sheep hangin' onto the barbs make a nasty job of it. The wires are cut, an' I jump back an' watch the sheep tumble, like the waters of a dam that's broken, down the hill toward the sheds—all except them that'll never eat no more. When all's gone that c'n go, I turn to them ragin' but very proper cowpunchers.

"'You'll understand,' says I, 'that I'll do all the talkin' to Sanders when he comes back an' when I'm ready. This's stric'ly my affair, an' all the assistance I want from you is takin' care o' them sheep till they're come for.'

"Well, it ain't till I've rode down the hill to where them dandy cowpunchers are herdin' sheep like missionaries that I understand the complete an' perfect misery of the trick that me an' fate has played on the 6 Bar J.

"'Whose sheep, do you s'pose?' says I, very careless.

"An' then I tumble. I've been so busy makin' a new kind of a fool of myself that I ain't had time to think much about the dee-tails of the performance.

"'Johnson's?' says I.

"'Of course!' answers Shorty, with an ugly grin.

"Then I explode. I ain't had such a laugh since Bart Rasmussen went to sleep under the molasses barrel at Fisher's store, an' somebody turned the spigot. Here's Sanders, the worst sheep-hater in Wyoming, an' here's the 6 Bar J, that ain't seen so much as a mutton stew in ten years, now feedin' two thousand stray sheep like it was a reg'lar orphans' home. But that ain't all of it. Them ain't just ordinary sheep. They're Johnson's sheep, an' if they's any sheep that Sanders hates worse than the rest it's Johnson's. There's been red war between him and Sanders for more'n five years, an' twice there's been shootin', an' it's certain that some day one of 'em's goin' to be carried home. Now it's when I think of all that, an' how all Wyoming's goin' to hold its sides for laughin'—it's then I give up an' hang onto my saddle-horn to keep from fallin' off in a fit. But when I ketch sight of them cowpunchers through my flowin' tears I ain't got no doubt that I've added three mortal enemies to my already plenty collection.

"The blizzard whips out across the country that night, an' the nex' day comes up bright an' sweet an' innocent, except for the snow on the ground, as if it hadn't heard of anything onusual. Cold still, but only a whiff of a breeze blowin', an' sure signs of spring in the air. I'm wonderin' what I'm goin' to do with them sheep, when along toward evenin' comes two of Johnson's men, scared half out of their rags when they see what's happened, an' turnin' their white eyes toward the ranch-house. They look mighty relieved when they hear that Sanders's away, but they don't linger no time for conversation, bein' in a hurry to take the lost sheep into a more healthy climate.

"Well, I've got plenty to think about the nex' three days' waitin' for Sanders to come back. I see there's no mortal use tryin' to tell him why I fed them sheep, specially as I don't know that myself. Sanders'd let 'em die, down to the last lamb in Wyoming, before he'd give 'em a whisp of hay. He's a most violent man. He's never been able to stand any crossin' of his will, an' I've seen him turn to fire an' brimstone over little things't any other man wouldn't pay no attention to. It's his nature. I've watched him fightin' to down that part of him till his lips bled an' he stood white an' tremblin' an' pantin' like a horse that's rode to the blind staggers. He's been a bad man mostly on account of his temper, an' now he's tryin' to reform himself because somethin' decent inside of him tells him to. But when he's mad the only argument he knows is a gun."

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A LADY from New York State writes to acknowledge answer to prayer in improved health for herself, increased spiritual interest in Sunday school and Christian Endeavor, and that her husband has stopped drinking and been going to church. A. G. writes from Chicago: "I acknowledge many direct answers to prayer. I was in financial trouble, and when there was no way out at all I got the help I needed most wonderfully." Mrs. J. W. writes from Connecticut: "I sent a request for prayers for a young man who had a wife to support and was out of work. He has found work." Mrs. F. D. L., of South Norwalk, Conn., writes: "I requested prayer for my health some months ago. I am enjoying the best of health now." A lady from Ohio writes: "I want to acknowledge answered prayers for my husband and son, who have returned to Christ; also for improvement of my health." Mrs. S. writes from Philadelphia: "As an old reader of your comforting paper, and a member of the Prayer League, I wish to praise the Lord for the complete recovery of a son." L. C. Y., of Manchester, Iowa, writes: "I want to acknowledge in the prayer column my thanks to the dear Lord for restoring me to health after two years of suffering." M. S. B. writes from Carstairs, Alberta: "We gratefully acknowledge that prayers for the recovery of the little child so seriously afflicted have been answered. Her restoration to perfect health is an assured fact. Also the aged sufferer for whom prayers were requested is much improved in health and strength."

A. C. D. writes from New London, Wis.: "On the 25th of May I wrote, asking for prayers for the Lord's quickening Spirit upon our church. We are glad to state that God has answered those petitions, for now a great work is being done.

Mrs. G. W. C., Mich., and E. I. A., N. Y., acknowledge answer to prayer for healing; M. W., Woodruff, S. C., and Mrs. H. W., Great Junction, Col., for healing of friends; M. I. K., for a home; Mrs. C. S. S., Plainville, Conn.; E. M. H., Monmouth, Ore.; B. S., Sioux, Neb.; A Reader, Orange, N. J.; E. L. H., Eugene, Ore.; Miss A. B., Tyrrell, Ohio; and A Reader, Plattsmouth, Neb., for other blessings.

Mrs. C. J. W. is again urged to communicate with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. There is a strong likelihood that a broken home can be reunited if she will do this. Special prayers are asked that B. A. will return home, or will at least communicate with his mother. A letter is forwarded from Mrs. Zillah Foster, of the International Sunday School Association, from Miss M. L. R., of Kelley, Iowa, who asks prayers for healing from a serious illness and also that a neighbor may be healed.

A lady eighty-three years of age, a sufferer from paralysis, asks prayer that a home may be provided for her. A Reader from Buffalo, N. Y., asks special prayer for restoration to health and that a burden may be lifted.

Mrs. E. A. B. asks prayers for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on a church at Baltimore, Md.; C. J. S. for a stirring revival at Howe Cave, N. Y., which will result in a rich harvest of souls; a Reader from Rogersville, Ohio; Mrs. L. D. and E. I. P.; Mrs. A. H. for State-wide prohibition victory in the Ohio elections on November 3; Y. E. Y. and a California Reader for State-wide prohibition in California; Mrs. L. D. for blessing upon the young people of a church at Croton, Ohio; Mrs. M. R. D. for a blessing upon the church members of Newark, N. Y., and for a temperance victory in that city; H. C. H. that funds may be found for completing the Y. M. C. A. building, begun over a year ago in Vancouver, B. C.; Miss L. B., for a revival at Denmark, Tenn.; V. S., for God's blessing upon evangelistic meetings at Emporium, Pa.; A. C. D., for God's blessing upon the work of an evangelist at New London, Wis.

A Mother asks prayer that her daughter's mind may be restored; Mrs. S. W. P., her son's; E. L. R., her mother's; Mrs. E. N. S. and A. G., their sisters'; Mrs. S. A. McC., son-in-law's; Mrs. A. H., a nephew's; L. R. C., an aunt's; L. C. C. and L. E. E., for mental restoration; Mrs. C. E. B., that mind may be strengthened; L. J. G., Mrs. S. R. G., Miss E. A. A., Mrs. S. M. W., Mrs. R. H. C., and A Friend ask prayer that sight may be restored; X. Y. Z. and Mrs. S. M. W., that their daughters' sight may be restored; Miss E. A. A., her mother's; Mrs. C. H. G., her sister's; Mrs. J. H., her brother's; Mr. and Mrs. O. E. E., a little girl's; Mrs. H. H. C., a doctor's; L. W. and Mrs. E. A. B., that sight may be strengthened; J. S., that sight of one eye may be restored; L. C. C., that sight of eye may be strengthened; Miss M. S. and C. J. S., healing from eye trouble; E. M. H., that failing eyesight may be restored; M. D. M., for healing of granddaughter's eyes. Mrs. M. Coffee's Weight on Old Age

When people realize the injurious effec of coffee and the change in health tha Postum can bring, they are usually glad t lend their testimony for the benefit o others.

"My mother, since her early childhoo was an inveterate coffee drinker, ha been troubled with her heart for a numbe of years and complained of that 'wea all over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago I was making a vis to a distant part of the country and too dinner with one of the merchants of th place. I noticed a somewhat unusua flavor of the 'coffee' and asked him con cerning it. He replied that it was Postum

"I was so pleased with it that, aft the meal was over, I bought a packag to carry home with me, and had wife pre pare some for the next meal. The who family were so well pleased with it tha we discontinued coffee and used Postu entirely.

"I had really been at times ver anxious concerning my mother's condition but we noticed that after using Postu for a short time, she felt so much bett than she did prior to its use, and ha little trouble with her heart, and no sic stomach; that the headaches were not s frequent, and her general condition muc improved. This continued until she wa well and hearty.

"I know Postum has benefited myse and the other members of the family but not in so marked a degree as in th case of my mother, as she was a victi of long standing." Name given b Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boile 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powde A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cu of hot water and, with cream and suga makes a delicious beverage instantly 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is abou the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

AFTER THE WAR

Andrew Carnegie in the Independent, October 19

AFTER the present belligerents agree upon peaceful settlement, Germany and Austria should be the first invited by the Allies to join in forming a League of Peace. Should they accept, then some of the other nations might be invited. At the first meeting of the league some general principles might be formulated: First, one general World Peace Commission shall be established, to which each member shall contribute toward expenditure in proportion to its population and wealth. Their respective fleets shall be merged, controlled and operated under such management as the league may direct from time to time. No war policy or attack upon any nation or fleet shall be made except by a majority vote of two-thirds of all the members of the World Peace League, and then only after timely notice to the nations threatened. The commission shall exercise undisputed authority, always provided it is sustained and its action approved from time to time by two-thirds of the total membership.

An executive committee shall be elected by two-thirds majority of the commission, a separate vote being taken upon each candidate. This committee shall elect a president and vice-president by a majority vote, who shall each serve four years, but the vice-president shall serve six years for the first term, and his successor be elected for four years, thus preventing the simultaneous change of both the former high officials.

The difference between the proposed commission and the present situation in regard to peace and war is fundamental. For twenty-five hundred years tribes and nations have warred with each other, inflicting such barbarities as make the flesh creep as one reads, and all these years it has been held by many that "preparation for war" prevents war, yet today we have the greatest outburst of war that this long history recounts. We submit that the day is past when we shall longer tolerate this inhuman sacrifice of human beings. The civilized world has tried "preparation for war" long enough. We now propose to render war impossible, at least between the best of those nations classed as civilized. When these lead, others can be compelled to follow, or ostracized, if this ever becomes necessary. The league would act upon the high moral standard of world peace, determined to maintain it when necessary in the judgment of the two-thirds majority of its members. Even if success be delayed, sooner or later its triumph would be certain.

For those who want a better toilet soap there is

Resinol Soap

Any soap will clean your skin—a bar of laundry soap will do if you do not care what becomes of your complexion. But you know that laundry soap contains harsh, drying alkali that would ruin your skin and hair. so you never think of using it for your toilet,

Many toilet soaps contain this same injurious alkali. Resinol Soap contains absolutely no free alkali, and to it are added the Resinol balsams. These give it soothing, healing properties which clear the complexion, comfort tender skins, remove dandruff, and keep the hair rich and lustrous.

Resinol Soap costs twenty-five cents—it is too good to be cheap. Sold by all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For trial size cake, write to Dept. 9-C, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Questions and Answers

S. E. L., Chicago. Do you think it possible for a Christian to be deeply interested in some earthly work and ambition and to be equally interested in personal work for souls? I am a Christian and am interested in music. I am a student, devoted to my work and ambition, not, however, in the worldly sense, but just for love of it. Have always thanked God for the gift and for the means to carry out my plans. Have felt that he is the giver of these things and that their pursuit is therefore right and legitimate. Now some one has told me that a Christian's greatest work is to win souls, speaking to others of their soul's salvation, straining every point and making it our greatest interest to bring others to accept Christ.

We wish there were space to publish all of your thoughtful letter. It is not at all likely that the Master wishes you to give up your music. The history of Christianity and the history of music are closely intertwined. In fact, it is hard to conceive what Christianity would have been without music. Many a soul has been won to Christ by the singing of a hymn. And even instrumental music at the hands of Spirit-filled performers may bring positive spiritual blessing. Read the notes on the Baptist Young People's Union topic for July 12 in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 1, "God in Music," and send to the Epworth Herald, Chicago, Ill., for copies containing a two-part story, "Bishop or Organist," by Arthur H. Howland. God has special need of consecrated masters of music now for two specific tasks—to oppose the tendency to make music contribute to the baser instincts, and to raise the standard of the music used in Christian work. This does not mean that a Christian musician should be interested only in what is called sacred music. The best secular compositions, vocal and instrumental, may be studied and rendered. But for the Christian there will always be the thought of God in his work and the desire that souls shall be spiritually blest. Be sure to think of Christ as a great Friend, rather than a great task-master. Get on the closest possible terms with him, asking him to cleanse your heart and fill you with his Spirit, and make you feel his anxiety that people shall be saved and blest. Then he will show you how to use his gift to help forward his work. Study the life and work of Mrs. C. H. Morris, whom the Holy Spirit is using to elevate the tone of Gospel music and through whose hymns countless souls have been blest.

A Reader, Chippewa, Wis. Can a person unknowingly be a hypocrite?

There is in the essential meaning of the word "hypocrite" the idea of deceit, of making an effort to mislead others about one's character. This can only be done consciously. So in this sense there can be no such thing as an unconscious hypocrite. But there is a practical danger which your question suggests, namely the danger of unconscious inconsistencies between one's character and one's profession. The true Christian should always strive eagerly to make his conduct tally with his profession. He must make no compromises with his conscience. He must not only insist upon conquering, by divine grace, the inconsistencies he is aware of, but he must try to discover these "unconscious inconsistencies," these things in his life which appear wrong to others or may have a hurtful influence, and earn their eradication also.

H. B. S., New Haven, Conn. The guide who appeared in Ezekiel's vision, and who conversed with him concerning the dimensions of the temple (see Ezek. 40 to close of the book), is assumed by commentators to have been a heavenly being—the Angel of the Lord—and the prince (chapter 44: 3) is assumed to be not the Messiah himself, but the civil ruler under the Messiah. The powers and privileges of the prince are further referred to in Ezek. 45: 16, 18 and 48: 21, 22, which corroborate this interpretation.

H. S. K., South Braintree, Mass. It is practically impossible to fix beyond dispute the date of the famine in Egypt in Joseph's time. However, we may get at it approximately. Joseph is believed to have been born about B.C. 1913, and was sold by his brethren B.C. 1895. He interpreted Pharaoh's dream of the coming famine about B.C. 1885. He received his promotion about B.C. 1885, being at that time thirty years of age (see Gen. 41: 46). This brings us very near to the time of the great famine. There were, first, seven years of plenty, affording opportunity for storing abundant supplies, and then came the seven years of famine. This would fix the date of the beginning of the famine about 1874-76 B.C., which agrees with the chronological estimate of McClintock and Strong. The accuracy of this estimate, however, depends wholly on the correctness of the date of the starting-point. We believe that inscriptions have been found containing a reference to the famine, but not setting the date.

W. F. C., Rutland, Mass. William Cowper the poet, had encountered a deep disappointment early in life, the influence of which shadowed his entire career, and, toward the last threatened insanity. It is related by some of his biographers that Cowper became impressed with the idea that he was divinely instructed to drown himself in the River Ouse. He ordered his carriage and was being driven toward the river when, in some unexplained way, the driver—a new one—missed his way, and Cowper, finding his purpose defeated, took it as a sign that the plan was of the devil. Greatly relieved, he drove back home, and wrote the well-known hymn:

> God moves in a mysterious way
> His wonders to perform;
> He plants his footsteps in the sea,
> And rides upon the storm.

Cowper lived to be over sixty, and never again, as far as known, had a recurrence of the attack. Such is the story which we give without guarantee of its accuracy.

J., Newell, S. D. There is some doubt whether the passage in I John 5: 16 refers to what is known as the "unpardonable sin," although such is the prevailing opinion among the commentators. To request pardon in our prayers for one who had committed this sin was regarded as savoring of presumption, although the human intercessor were more merciful than God himself. Alford held that the sin unto death was the denial of Jesus as Messiah. Others have held it to be complete apostasy, while the more generally accepted view of modern theologians is that it was the attributing of the miracles of Christ to Satanic agency.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. C. S., Cornell, N. Y. He is a member of the Lutheran Church.

Ella G. R., Cantril, Iowa. 1. The passage for which you ask can be found in Daniel 12: 3. 2. For the wives of Moses, see Ex. 2: 21; 3: 1, and Num. 12: 1.

Geise, N. D. The Federal government has not assumed control of the coal mines in Colorado, but has stationed troops in the disturbed regions to preserve law and order.

T. W., Weatherford, Okla. Astronomy has never attempted to approximate the time when this world will be destroyed. Science works by conservative methods, and does not deal in sensation.

M. L. R., Tionesta, Pa. "Reverend" is a title of courtesy, pure and simple, and not an official designation, although it has come into common use in addressing the clergy. Its origin is not definitely known.

Mrs. W. A. B., Kenney, Ill. 1. England is Protestant, although religious toleration prevails, and there are many Roman Catholics in the country. 2. We must refer you to some medical authority for an answer to your second question.

Mrs. M. C., Cimarron, Colo. Mary, Martha and Lazarus were not related to the household of Joseph and Mary. They were, however, honored with the friendship of Jesus, by whom Lazarus was raised from the dead. (See John 11: 1-17.)

I. J. M., Kittery Point, Me. The passage to which you refer is in Rev. 17, although not precisely in the language quoted. See verse 16 for the fate of the "scarlet woman," on whom judgment is to be passed by the world powers—the beast and his allies. Her "flesh" points to her temporal resources or territory.

R. A. M., Freeport, N. Y. If he presented the letter in good faith, the session should deal with him in the usual manner. There are many ministers who have retained membership in their own denomination from their youth up. Not knowing all the circumstances of the case, we cannot speak more definitely.

W. C. H., West Roxbury, Mass. Your first three questions are outside the proper domain of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and should be submitted to a scientific magazine. There is serious doubt concerning the soundness of the doctrines taught by the organization you mention in your fourth question. It is regarded by many as simply Universalism. We would suggest that you leave it alone.

Mrs. D. C. G., North Pownal, Vt. Habakkuk 2: 4 is part of the prophet's description of the divine manifestations which begins in the preceding verse. "Horns," the translators interpret as "rays" (the Hebrew word which means to "emit rays" is from the same root, meaning "horns"). A passage which illustrates this is Ex. 34: 29-35, which tells how the face of Moses, on leaving the mount, emitted visible rays of light.

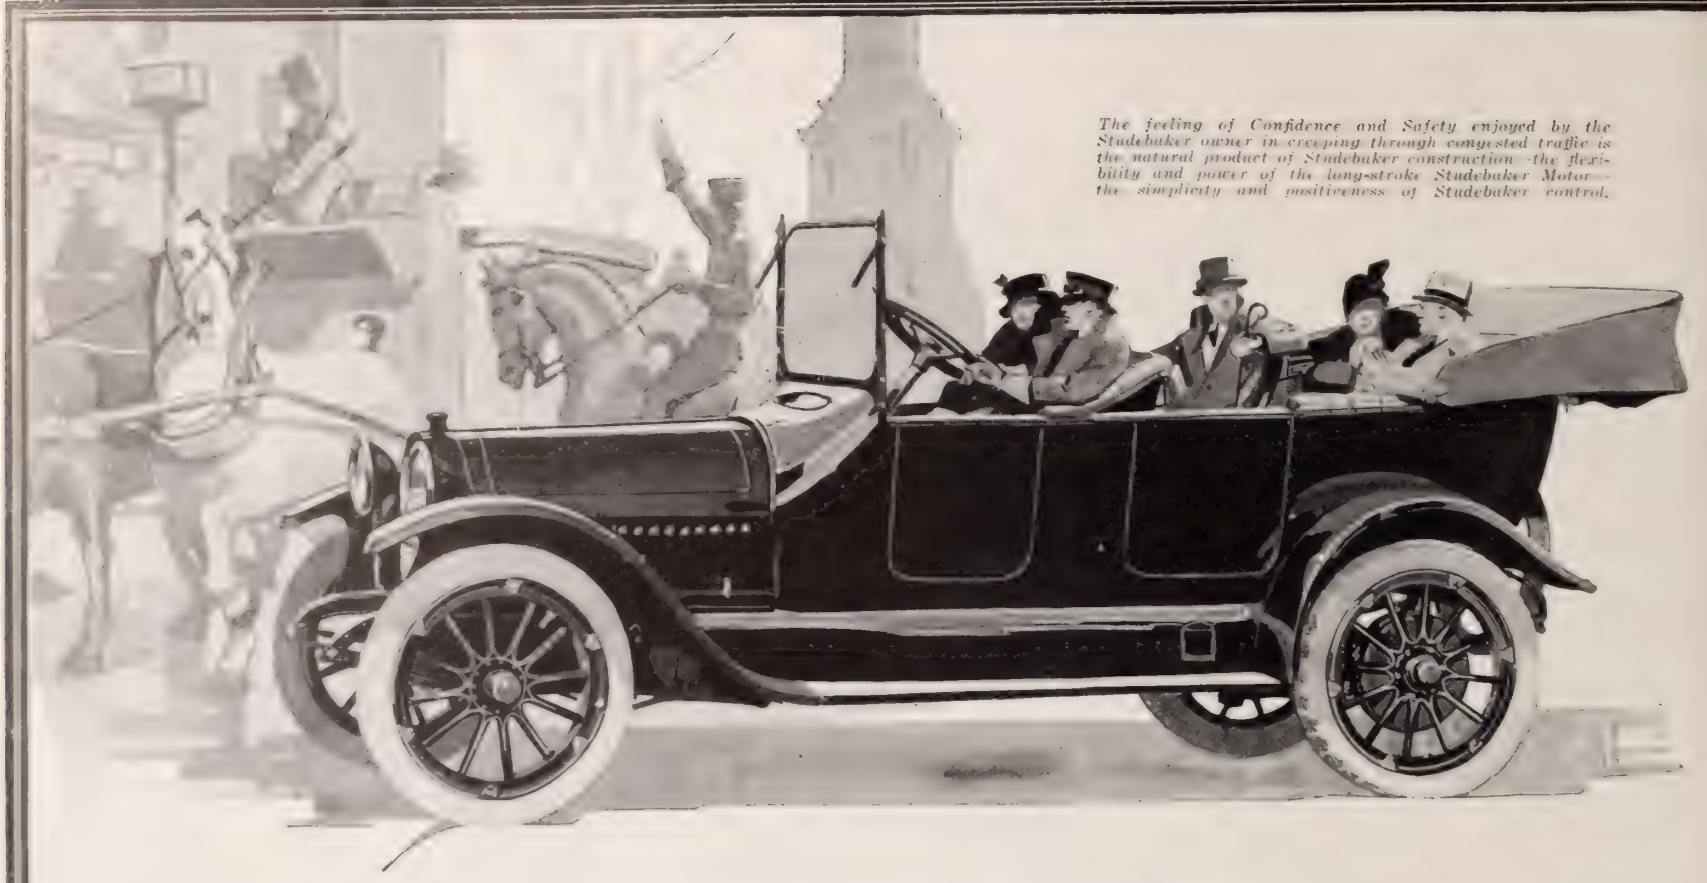
SUNSET ON THE SUMMIT OF THE EIGER, SWITZERLAND (13,040 FEET ALTITUDE)



The feeling of Confidence and Safety enjoyed by the Studebaker owner in creeping through congested traffic is the natural product of Studebaker construction—the flexibility and power of the long-stroke Studebaker Motor—the simplicity and positiveness of Studebaker control.

Reputation and Character

It is a very true saying that reputation is what people think you are—character what you really are.

You can buy reputation.

Character is the product of years.

Studebaker character has been two full generations in the building.

Sixty-two years of strict adherence to an ideal—sixty-two years of good manufacturing and square dealing have been woven into it.

And Studebaker character is recognized and believed in wherever motor cars are found.

Studebaker motor cars are the embodiment of Studebaker character.

Every ounce of material that goes into them, every process of manufacture, every detail of workmanship is the expression of Studebaker ideals.

The steel that is made to special Studebaker formulas, tested and analyzed by Studebaker experts, heat treated in Studebaker furnaces is the best steel that can be produced.

Not simply "good enough" but the best that skill and money can produce.

As a result Studebaker cars are light and strong.

You never hear of a broken front axle, a stripped gear or a twisted driving shaft on a Studebaker car.

The Studebaker factor of safety is a constant tangible protection to every Studebaker owner.

Studebaker cars are built complete in Studebaker factories.

The engine, the transmission, the front and rear axles, the body, the top—every essential part is built in Studebaker plants under the direct supervision of the men who design Studebaker cars.

Every part of a Studebaker car is made to harmonize with and supplement every other part—hence there is a simplicity and smoothness in the operation of Studebaker cars that would not be possible if Studebaker simply bought parts from other makers and put them together. Also there is the important saving of parts makers' profits.

Studebaker cars are not built to sell at a low price.

They are the embodiment of the Studebaker Standard of quality.

They sell at a low price because complete manufacturing and quantity production result in economies that make low prices possible in spite of the quality and care and integrity that are built into Studebaker cars.

Studebaker cars appeal particularly to women drivers—because of the beauty of design and finish, the simplicity and ease of control, the safety and strength of materials.

"What A Woman Ought To Know About A Motor Car" is a new book just ready. It will be sent free upon request.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

AMERICAN COMMERCE 300 YEARS OLD

OBVERSE OF THE MEDAL

THE year 1914 is the tercentenary of the beginning of the regularly chartered commerce of the United States. In that year the States General of the Netherlands granted two charters for the exploration and trading development of New Amsterdam. A general charter, based on certain conditions, was granted March 27, 1614, and on the following October 11 exclusive privilege of trade was granted to the le settlement at the mouth of the Hudson River.

To arrange for the suitable observance of the completion of three centuries of American commerce, the late Mayor Gaynor in 1912 appointed citizens' committee—subsequently enlarged and incorporated by a special act of Legislature the New York Commercial Tercentenary Commission.

The celebration began March 27, 1914, with exercises at Fort Wadsworth, Staten Island, including the enactment of a scene representing the beginning of trade with the Indians, in which the parts were taken by New York State Indians and descendants of old Dutch families.

An official medal commemorating the tercentenary was struck and examples in silver were presented to President Wilson and Mayor Mitchel of New York.

During the summer local festivals were held in athletic fields and city playgrounds, with historical tableaux, folk dances and songs of the nations, rendered by school children, concluding with an elaborate pageant in Central Park on August 29.

Then the depression caused by the European war temporarily halted events. The question was raised as to the propriety of conducting anything in the way of a jubilant affair, when humanity across seas was so plunged in sorrow. After full consideration, however, the opinion prevailed that, even disregarding the historical value of the original plan, the present situation afforded a splendid opportunity to raise the tone of things as regarding mercantile and civic interests. Robert Grier Cooke, president of the Fifth Avenue Association, voiced the general opinion when he said: "It seems especially desirable, under present conditions, that party support should be given to this movement in order to encourage a more optimistic sentiment throughout the city and other localities."

Plans were resumed, resulting in a program to last continuously from October 25 to November 7. Although the celebration was initiated by representatives of leading merchants, manufacturers and commercial exchanges, with the distinct idea of emphasizing the commercial and industrial aspects of American life, the committee recognized the broader view to be taken, and planned not to deal exclusively with the material side of commerce. Recognizing the fact that a strong and active national commerce and a vigorous national industry stimulate art, science and literature, and that these in turn react upon the commercial and industrial life, intellectual and historical sides of the anniversary have been duly regarded and featured.

The program has been most comprehensive in character, including music festivals in high schools and colleges, exhibits in libraries and museums, a night automobile pageant and a commercial pageant also at night, with a parade of symbolic floats, illustrating history, education, commerce, industry and patriotism, including the floats that appeared in the Star-Spangled Banner celebration in Baltimore. Buildings along the route were decorated in the colors adopted for the tercentenary, orange, blue and white.

The concluding event is a commercial exhibit on an extended scale in the Grand Central Palace, from November 7 to 21, representing old and modern New York, with displays by merchants and manufacturers, showing the development of commerce and industry, not only in the city and State, but throughout the country at large.

MELTING POT TRANSFORMING ALIENS INTO AMERICANS

"It has been the intention of the committee," says the secretary, Dr. Edward Hagaman Hall, "to demonstrate the connection between commerce and all phases of human activities. Commerce is not a thing apart from intellectual and spiritual advancement. We cannot have progress without divine guidance."

As a matter of fact, however, as the date of the tercentenary in October drew near, it was discovered that no arrangements had been made for any religious observance. Decided enthusiasm was manifested when the propriety was emphasized of starting the celebration with an acknowledgment to God for the progress of our country, especially as the nation was founded on principles of religious liberty and as the early Dutch settlers of New York had immediately recognized God in the movement which brought them to this land. A sum of $1,250 was raised at once, various committees relinquishing portions of their appropriations for the new Committee on Religious Exercises. This committee was composed of thirty-one members, representing at least nine denominations. Every minister in the city was invited to preach on Sunday, October 25, on some topic concerning the religious history of New York City and the plan was followed almost unanimously by Protestants, Catholics and Jews. At the Collegiate Church of St. Nicholas the Dutch flag was displayed with the coat of arms of the Reformed Church in America. The old Hollanders did nothing without religion, and the first religious organization in New Amsterdam was the Collegiate Church. For forty years it was the only church. The first services were held in an upper room over a mill, where the colonists' grain was ground. The old church bell cast in Amsterdam now hangs in the bell tower of St. Nicholas' Church and still calls the worshipers to service every Sunday.

REVERSE OF THE MEDAL

On the afternoon of Sunday, October 25, an audience of 7,000 assembled in the Hippodrome, while nearly as many more were turned away. "For the first time in the history of New York," says Rev. Dr. Christian F. Reisner, secretary of the committee, "members of the Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish faiths met on a Sunday to unite in a common religious service. This I consider as the best sign of promise in the history of the city."

John D. Crimmins, a distinguished member of the Roman Catholic Church, called the meeting to order and introduced as chairman Rev. Dr. David J. Burrell, pastor of the church which succeeded the first one organized in 1626. After the singing of "America" by the vast audience, led by the Police Band and a chorus of 1,200 singers, Rev. H. Pereira Mendes, D.D., rabbi of Sheareth Israel Synagogue, the oldest synagogue in the city, in musical vibrant tones gave a remarkable reading of selected texts from the Old Testament. It required but little imagination to fancy the venerable rabbi one of the ancient prophets, as he cried out, "The Lord shall judge among the many peoples and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Isa. 2: 4; Micah. 4: 3.) "Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?" (Mal. 2: 10.)

Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman made an address on "God's Hand in New York's History," in which he

...ed the early religious history of Manhattan particularly connecting it up with the present, and gave his interpretation of what particular good each creed had contributed. "The perfection of unity is based on variety," he said; "there's no credit in being united with some one who thinks just as you do. We waive nothing individual or dear, as we find ourselves today with one heart in one place, giving glory to God. The greatest moment in the life of a city is when it becomes ... that all we have and are must be in the ... of a good Cod."

Mayor Mitchel in his speech said: "It is particularly fitting at this time, when the medieval spirit of barbarism is abroad among the nations of Europe and when the greatest demands are made upon our ethical resources, that we should get together on this three hundredth anniversary of the beginning of our commercial greatness and emphasize the fact that progress and civilization both rest upon an ethical foundation. It is proper that the churches should come together as a part of this tercentenary celebration and remind us that, however great our commerce, however extensive our trade, however splendid our prosperity, howev mighty our physical resources, the civilizati which we boast, to endure and to achieve its e —the happiness and well-being of all—must re upon ethical foundations and a moral purpo This meeting of the representatives of virtually the religious forces of the community means th the churches are coming to feel more deeply th ever that they have a great part to play in t upbuilding of those things which in the deepe sense constitute the city's life."

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE center of interest has suddenly shifted this week. The entrance of Turkey into the European conflict marks a new phase of the war. The Turkish army on a war footing will number not far from 800,000 men, of whom probably ...,000 are now on the Russian frontier in Asia Minor, and the balance toward the Red Sea and Egypt and the Suez Canal. The Turkish navy has in commission two dreadnoughts, the Reshadich and the ..., three old battleships, and three cruisers of importance, besides various small craft such as gunboats, destroyers and torpedo boats.

The question whether or not Turkey will proclaim the Jehad or holy war is a very interesting one. If she does, this action may have consequences of more or less importance in Egypt, Tunis, Algeria, Persia, India, etc., in fact, everywhere where there are orthodox Mussulmans.

This action of Turkey will also set the Balkans on fire. Bulgaria, Rumania and Greece are almost certain to become active combatants in a very few days, and it seems almost impossible now for Italy to keep out of the fray. The action of Greece in invading southern Albania has been very largely influential in precipitating the crisis.

The Russian Black Sea fleet which will have to meet the Turkish fleet consists of ... old and slow battleships and two sixty-five-hundred-ton cruisers with a few destroyers and torpedo boats. Probably by the time these lines reach my readers, the question of naval supremacy in the Black Sea will have been decided, as Turkey has already attacked with apparent determination, and it is said that the Russian fleet has been ordered to go out and meet the Turkish, and not to take refuge behind the fortifications of Sebastopol.

The Japanese attack on Kiauchau has been progressing slowly but surely, and it is doubtful whether the town will be able to hold out very much longer. The Japanese losses are said to have been heavy, and this fact is creating a desire in the Japanese people to retain the town after its capture, instead of turning it over to China, which was originally stated to be the intention.

Japan has also taken possession of more islands in the Pacific, and has also declared her intention of greatly augmenting her army and navy. I must confess as an American, the developments in the East cause me considerable uneasiness and distrust.

The German cruiser at large, the Emden, has not been idle during the week and has transferred her scene of action farther to the east. She sank one Japanese merchant steamer near Penang, and afterward boldly entered that harbor, cut out and sank under the guns of the fort itself the Russian 3,200-ton cruiser Zhemtchug, armed with four seven-inch guns, and having a speed of 23 knots; also sank a French torpedo boat. It is difficult to understand how, chased as she is by many warships, the Emden has evaded capture. Probably her crew and officers, knowing that their chance of ever seeing home again is very small, have made up their minds to sell their lives as dearly as possible. The Emden's deeds will live long in naval annals.

In South Africa the situation has grown much more serious during the week. Generals DeWet and Beyers, who will be remembered as prominent Boer commanders, particularly the former, in the late war, have revolted and taken the field. General Botha is conducting the campaign against them in person, and the one encounter so far had with their forces has resulted to his advantage. The reports from London indicate that the situation is viewed with considerable apprehension. Considerable fighting has been going on in other parts of South Africa, particularly in the Cameroons and German East Africa, but details are lacking.

The situation in Belgium is growing desperate, owing to the lack of food supplies. It is reasonably stated that more than 3,000,000 Belgians are today being fed by charity, and that the stock of food is so low that in twenty-four hours it will probably be exhausted, so that starvation really threatens. This is not exaggeration. I quote from the representative of the American Commission for Relief in Belgium: "It is feared that in their desperation the hungry people will attack the authorities. This would cause serious loss of life."

In modern times, since the fall of Rome, the world has probably never faced the coming of winter with so many people in absolute want and destitution as it does in this month of November, 1914. It is universal today, and there is apparently no hope that conditions will improve; more probably they will grow worse, as the area devastated by war increases. As one single illustration of the destitution, thousands of people, 14,500 in one day, 12,550 in the next, have poured back to Antwerp, and there is no food for them there, and but very little in Holland, whence they came.

In the Western campaign there is but little to chronicle in the way of positive advances or retreats. Nevertheless the fighting on the western end of the line of battle, between Lille and Nieuport, has been t fiercest of the war.

The Germans ha made a desperate effo without success, to bre through the Allies' lir between these points, and with this ject have waged violent battle, day a night. The losses are appalling; the B gians alone are said to have lost ten th sand men of an effective of about thi thousand, while the loss of the Germa and Allies is in proportion.

At this part of the line, in view of t reports received, it is conservative to the aggregate of the losses of all the co batants at not less than ten thousand day, of whom over one thousand ha been killed outright.

The British report for one day, of l of officers only, reaches the horrifyi figure of 88, or over one per cent. of the officers in the British army.

On the rest of the line from Lille Noyon, to Rheims, to Verdun, to Nan to Belfort, the fighting has not been severe, except in and around Verdun. this critical point, the decisive point the entire western campaign, the R Cross states the losses on each side, si the war began, have not been less th forty thousand.

There is a rumor that a heavy att on Belfort on the extreme east of t French frontier is being prepared by t Germans, and that the Allies are hur ing forward troops to that threatened point. In t event that this report should be true, it is proba the beginning of an attempt to break through French line of defenses there, and to make a raid the French metallurgic center of Le Creusot order to destroy it, and thus cripple France in production of the necessary cannon, arms, and oth munitions wherewith the wastage of the war repaired.

There also have been some reports of a Fre aggressive movement towards Metz, but these ports have not received any sure corroboration, a therefore are only mentioned.

Little Montenegro and Belgium seem to be doi in proportion to the number of their troops, bravest and most heroic fighting of all the co batants. The Belgians in particular are grea distinguishing themselves under the most adve circumstances.

The campaign in the east has resulted in a c siderable German reverse. On the East Pruss border they have held their own, and even have b able to advance slightly, but in central Poland German reverse has really been serious.

The German army had succeeded in getting to gates of Warsaw, and had in fact begun the b bardment of that town, and had also occupied left bank of the Vistula River from Warsaw t point somewhat to the south of Ivangorod, wh latter fortress they were also bombarding, a eemed on the point of being uniformly ıccessful.

Exactly what then happened is uncer- ain. Whether the Russians threw fresh rces into the field, whether the German mmissary broke down, or whether their pply of ammunition failed, we do not now. But we do know that they have en driven back for some fifty miles om the Vistula, and have lost heavily in en and supplies of all kinds.

The retreat seems to have been effected an orderly manner, but this does not viate the fact that the Germans have ceived a severe defeat, which probably ill finish any idea of a successful offen- ve in Poland this winter.

The cold weather has begun in these gions and snow is expected soon, winter aving set in earlier than usual, from all counts, and this in itself is an adverse ctor. In addition, the roads are said to e in a very bad condition, making the oving of artillery a matter of very great difficulty.

This reverse in Poland has had a necessarily de- ressing influence on the campaign in Galicia. Here ıe situation remains very much the same as it was st week. The Russians have been driven out of Hun- ary, and well up to the border of Galicia. But the ustrians have not been able to continue their ad- ance to the northward as at one time looked prob- ble, owing largely to the break-down of the offen- ve advance in Central Poland. Nevertheless, they ill hold the positions attained last week.

In the Hungarian crown land of Bukovina the ustrians have been defeated, and the Russians ave reoccupied the capital, Czernowitz.

Nothing very much can be said of the fighting etween the Servians and the Aus- ians. Neither side has obtained ny very great advantages during ıe past week; in fact, it looks as hough both sides were awaiting the esult of the more important events aking place elsewhere.

Floating mines in the North Sea ill continue to find many innocent ictims in merchant steamers and shing vessels; six in all of these ere sunk during the winter with nsiderable loss of life.

The trial of the assassin Gavrio rinzip and his accomplices, which as begun on October 13 in Sarajevo, ıe capital of Bosnia, where the ime was committed, terminated in ıe conviction of all the accused on ıe charge of treason. Prinzip, the ctual assassin, because of his youth, as sentenced to twenty years in rison only. Four conspirators re- eived death sentences, one life im- risonment, nine imprisonment from ree to twenty years according to ıe part they played, and the rest ere acquitted. Exact news from ıe scene of this trial has been hard obtain. Servian troops appar- ntly threatened to attack the town nd liberate the prisoners. In con- equence, Bosnian troops and the local police pre- ared for the defense. The population was said to e in a state of terror. On October 19 a news des- atch stated that Servian and Montenegrin troops ad taken all the outlying posts and forts which ere held by the Austrians, and that the complete all of Sarajevo was a matter of days. Since then othing of a decisive character has been reported.

ENCAMPMENT OF BRITISH INDIAN TROOPS IN FRANCE

An important change in the British admiralty ook place at the end of October, Prince Louis of attenberg having resigned as first sea lord, Lord isher, one of the most notable figures in modern ritish naval history, being appointed to that ighly important post. The English press looks pon this appointment as assuring an aggressive nd remorseless policy in the prosecution of the war by sea. The new first sea lord is seventy-three years old, and has rendered England distinguished service in the past.

It is stated, apparently on good authority, that Germany has notified Great Britain that all British subjects in Germany will be arrested, unless British authorities liberate German civilians who have been arrested in England without grounds of suspicion, by November 5.

The American consul at Odessa, Russia, advised the State Department, October 31, that that city was under bombardment by Turkish warships, and American property was being destroyed. Steps were at once taken to determine if the usual twenty-four hours' notice was given the town. Turkey appears to have begun active hostilities against Russia without a formal declaration of war.

It is stated that Vienna, the capital of Austria, is a city of misery. The terrible losses of Austrian troops were totally unexpected, and the numbers of wounded overwhelm the facilities of the capital and small towns. All available buildings in Vienna, it is said, have been converted into hospitals. The population is represented as living in a state of continual depression. Soldiers are seen begging in the streets, and epidemics of disease have broken out. It was necessary to build wooden barracks outside the city to accommodate 10,000 beds for patients with infectious diseases.

FRENCH RECEIVE CAPTURED GERMAN FLAGS

Jerusalem in War Time

IN a letter just received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Jerusalem, the writer (a lady) tells of the distressed condition of all classes in the Holy Land on account of the European War. She says:

"How little we thought when you were here in the spring that before the summer was over we should be involved in this cruel war! We have all, I am afraid, put too much confidence in an iron peace. It could not last. What a commentary on civilization, science and, we must say, Christianity! The world has made progress in many directions; but in the case of settling a quarrel, it takes the same means that Cain and Abel did. The fault is not with Christianity, but with the Christians. If we would live our religion and not make our professions suffice to let people know what we are, there would be a great difference in this poor world. We have only to look at our Bibles and see what God calls hate. If we considered ourselves murderers when we have enmity one against another, and went to work to eliminate it, this war would never have been possible. For they are so-called Christian nations that are fighting.

"You no doubt are aware that Turkey is mobilizing in a way she did not do during the Italian or Balkan wars. Since the new constitution, Jews and Christians, as well as Mohammedans, have to serve in the army. Before the change of government the Jewish and Christian subjects paid a nominal military tax. It was the pressure the Armenians brought to bear at that time that changed it. Now they are in trouble. The poverty and destitution in this country are really fearful.

"Europe being in a state of war, business here is at a standstill. Checks are of no use. Banks refuse payment; the whole country is in a state of perplexity and apprehension. Hospitals, schools and institutions of all kinds have to close for lack of funds, and it is their busiest season, these summer months, when fever and ophthalmia, the scourge of the land, are actively at work. The English missionaries and their families are all leaving the country.

"At the present moment it is food the people need. The breadwinners have gone and old women and women with children are not in a position to earn anything just now, especially as those who could give them work and buy their handiwork are in an embarrassed condition themselves."

THE CHRISTIAN AND POLITICS

*A SERMON BY REV. C. A. MUTCH

"Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's, and unto God the things which be God's." Luke 20: 25

IN OUR study of this subject, we may get a clearer idea of the meaning of some words in common use if they are briefly defined. The word "nation" is from the Latin natus, and means to be born. It thus relates to the beginning or origin of both civil and political being. It "gives us the idea of a social or collective civil or political being, grounded in man's nature, and found wherever the generations of mankind are born into the world." The word itself is used in two distinct senses: First, society organized or united by common political institutions recognized by the people as supreme in authority; and secondly, the aggregate of those who are connected by blood or lineage, and often by language. The word "state" is also from the Latin status, and is said to more particularly express the permanence of political being. The word "government" is from the Greek, and literally means the guiding or steering of a boat, while figuratively it is the controlling of the ship of state.

The State

WRITERS on political science differ widely as to the origin of the state, but for practical purposes their theories may be reduced to four. 1. The theory of social compact. It was assumed that a community or any number of communities could unite under a common form of government and when one or more of these communities should tire of this union it could withdraw from it without hindrance. 2. That the State is a necessary evil. The preamble of our national constitution says that governments are formed "to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." To an American that would be a sufficient refutation of this theory. 3. That it is the product of history. According to one form of this theory the origin of the nation is found in the family. The Jewish nation is cited as an illustrious example. 4. That it is of divine origin; that the State is God's creature; that its government is his ordinance, and that he is the Author of national life.

God in History

PAUL in his letter to the Romans, chapter 13, verse 1, says: "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God." Here as in all fundamental matters revelation and science are in agrement. On November 13, 1913, Dr. Alfred Wallace, a noted scientist, died. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in commenting on his work and life and character, among other things said that the outstanding fact in his life was his recognition of plan and purpose in the universe, and of a final destiny of the soul. If there is a plan and purpose in the universe it is but a step to the acknowledgment of One who planned and purposed, and revelation calls him God. If there is a plan and purpose in the universe we are forced to this conclusion also: that the highest form of social life best expresses itself through organization so as to be conducive to the welfare of society as a whole, and this organization we call government.

In a matter of such grave importance we should expect that God would not leave his children groping in the darkness. God is as truly the Creator of the nations as he is the Creator of the worlds. To each he has assigned its rightful territory and its own period in history. Each has its mission to fulfil. Each has its contribution to make in the development of human destiny. Hence it follows that if the nation sins, he has the right to take away national life, as well as to maintain and prolong national life upon sincere repentance. "If that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them." Jer. 18: 8. The state, like the individual, is a moral person. Punishment for the transgression of law follows in the one case as in the other. Repentance secures pardon in the one case as in the other. National existence depends upon the nation's obedience to the divine will, as eternal life to the individual depends upon the acceptance of God's offer of grace and obedience to the will of God.

Men in History

IT SEEMS clear, from the records of the past, that God governs in the affairs of men. If government is ordained of God, then the Christian has the right to be active in politics. In a representative form or in a democratic form of government, participation becomes an imperative duty. Politics is defined as the science of government; as that branch of civics that treats of the principles of civil government and the conduct of state affairs; the administration of public affairs in the interest of peace, prosperity and the safety of the state. Many good people hold that a politician cannot be a Christian; that the moment he becomes active in this branch of civics he deteriorates in character. That is tantamount to saying that Christianity cannot cope with and overcome the evils which flourish here as nowhere else.

I know that politics has a bad odor; it smells to heaven. It leaves a bad taste in the mouth when the thing is mentioned. Wickedness is rampant in high places; graft is regarded as a prerequisite of office; the most sacred trusts are betrayed for a money consideration; honor and integrity kick the beam when gold is in the balance; ballot-box stuffing, thuggery, intimidation are the weapons with which many political victories are won. The debauchery in politics is fearful. One grows sick at heart at the revelations of political wickedness. It has been said that it is almost impossible to hold an honest election in any of our large cities. In many places party lines have been obliterated. There seems to be but one dominant party, though, for political purposes, it masquerades under different names, according to locality and the interests it shall serve, yet it is the party of the boss, for the boss, and by the boss. These and kindred evils cause one to ask with bated breath, Can the republic live? Shall this government "of the people, for the people and by the people" perish from the earth? Yet, though the outlook may seem dark, it is not so gloomy as it at first appears. Across the skies rays of light are thrown which are the sure promise of the coming of a better day. The leavening power of the teachings of the lowly Nazarene will yet leaven the whole nation, until she becomes Christian in fact as she is Christian in name.

If government is ordained of God, then the administration of governmental affairs becomes a holy duty. It is not a secular affair; it is not to be divorced from good morals and religion; the administration of affairs is not to be left to wicked men and crafty politicians; here righteousness is to rule as everywhere else. I fully indorse what Hitchcock says in Religious Truth, viz.: "I regard politics, or the principles by which nations should be governed and regulated, as only a branch of ethics; or rather as a special application of the principles of morality and religion." "Ye are the salt of the earth," said the Master. If that does not apply to business, and social activities, and politics, then it has no meaning at all.

The Christian as Politician

IN THE sanctuary we pray, "Let thy kingdom come," and on election day we fall in line with the thug and plug-ugly and ward heeler, the ballot-box stuffer and the white slave dealer—these leeches upon pure society—and vote a ballot that reads just like theirs. Peter is justly censured for denying his Lord, but it is impossible to know how many of Christ's disciples are guilty of the same crime on election day. W. T. Ellis said recently that "the experiment of making a nation or country successful without religion has never succeeded." Ben Jonson said that "the strength of empire is in religion." These statements are fundamentally and eternally true. The real secret of a nation's prosperity, the underlying cause of national longevity, the ability to influence the future permanently, is found in religion. Christians are to minister to the nation's welfare; they are to grapple with the great problems which are confronting us and which are at their roots moral and religious; they should be in constant training for good citizenship if the kingdom of God is to be realized here on earth. The Christian is to create a sentiment so strong that morality shall be regarded as the first element in patriotism; that will brand the corrupt legislator and the judge who shields the law-breaker as the worst of criminals; that will no more tolerate crime in high places than public sentiment will permit the murderer to escape justice. If this is done, "our nation might defy all enemies and live forever."

Caesar's

BECAUSE politics is corrupt is a good reason why the Christian should be active in civic affairs. It is as much the function of religion to purify the corrupt politics of the nation as it is to purify the corrupt morals of the individual. It is as necessary that the principles of the Gospel be applied in a practical way to municipal, State and national affairs as to individual affairs. What is wrong for an individual, politically, is also wrong for the nation, and what is good for the one is good for the other. If it is wrong for an individual to defraud it is also wrong for a political party, a corporation, a municipality, a State. Dishonesty, if it ever comes, will come through corruption within the body politic. Here is the danger and here the remedy must be applied. The United States of America can endure only as the principles of Christianity dominate our public and private life.

If government is ordained of God and if the Christian has the right to be active in politics, it follows that the affairs of the government should be justly administered. Justice and mercy must be the foundation of human government if it is to endure, as they are the bases of divine government. In other words, human government should be the image of the divine. In art Justice is represented by the figure of a woman, blindfolded, and holding evenly-balanced scales. The idea conveyed is that justice and equity should be equally accorded to all, high or low, rich or poor. It is a matter of common opinion that it is not evenly distributed. It is the opinion of the masses that if a man has money enough he can sin against society with impunity. And this has been the opinion of the masses for several thousand years. But when I speak of the administration of justice I have reference not only to the interpretation and execution of the law, but to all matters comprehended in the term government. As a people, we have been wasteful with our natural resources. Untold wealth has been gathered into the coffers of soulless corporations. We have allowed trusts to multiply, and it seems the laws have favored their growth, so that today they flourish like green bay trees. Prices upon the necessaries of life are forced up almost to the vanishing point. The proper regulation of the trusts is a gigantic problem.

Christ's

TO GRAPPLE successfully with this evil calls for patriotism and statesmanship of the highest order. There is no quarrel with big business as such, but the monopolizing of business, driving the smaller concerns to the wall, is condemned. The survival of the fittest was a theory of science once widely accepted. This theory has been transferred to the business world in justification of the trusts, but here it is less true than in the world of science. In its application to industrial affairs and in justification of certain business methods, it is cruel. A crying evil is that of putting a higher value upon property, upon bonded interests, than upon the health and morals of the people, higher than upon human life. Then there is much industrial injustice. Theoretically, it is held that the employer and employee should be just in their treatment of each other, but we have not gotten much beyond theory. Capital should not stand over labor with club upraised and force labor to terms that are unjust; nor should labor assume to dictate to capital the line upon which its business is to be conducted. Rather, they should clasp hands; their interests are mutual; the one is the complement of the other.

The evils which afflict humanity today can be reduced to the minimum. Christians must exert themselves and take this country for God. Christianity must leaven the whole nation. Religion must dominate our individual, State, and national life. This is God's world. Too long the devil has held sway and the call comes to us to aid in redeeming the nation from its sins and presenting it to God without spot or blemish.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

UNDAY, November 15. Matthew 18: 19, 20. "Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall ree on earth as touching anything that they shall k, it shall be done for them of my Father which is heaven. For where two or three are gathered gether in my name, there am I in the midst of em." Taken by itself, this text conveys to us a rong assurance that the joint prayers of Chris- ans avail much with God. For Christ our Advo- te with the Father is the great seconder of our titions, and intercedes for us. The smallest gath- ing of men who have met in Jesus' name, that is, confessing Christians and for engaging in works hich Christ has commanded, is blessed with the visible presence of the Lord. In the days of his esh, Christ was our visible Immanuel, God with us. y grace and through the means of grace, he is still ir Immanuel. They that hear his messengers hear m. And he still comes to bear witness by the ater and the blood. Great, therefore, is the dig- ty and great the power even of the smallest mis- on congregation that really meets in Jesus' name.

MONDAY, November 16. Matthew 18: 22. "I say not unto thee, Until seven times; but, Until venty times seven." What a truthful and im- artial account does our Bible give us of the lives nd doings of God's saints! Here we find another ulty reasoning of Peter recorded. He had balked the thought of the atoning sacrifice which the ord would make of himself for the sins of the orld. Now he wants to have limits fixed for the xercise of that charity which forgives an erring rother who repents of his error and which the Lord ad just inculcated. Peter, no doubt, believed him- lf very generous in pushing the limit to a disciple's rgiveness out to the seventh offense, and it is pos- ble that Peter knew himself to have exceeded, with is proposal, the generosity of those past-masters mechanical piety and holy casuistry, the Phari- ees. Some Talmudists have limited forgiveness to vo offenses of the same party. Peter, then, was ree and a half times better than some Pharisees. e can imagine his astonishment at the Lord's an- wer. Christ mentions a very large number, not ecause he wants us to actually number a brother's ffenses and our own acts of forgiveness, but to ach us that we must never be weary of forgiving here we may forgive, that is, where we find a rother truly repenting of his sin and in need of the mfort of the Gospel.

TUESDAY, November 17. Matthew 18: 23-27. "Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto certain king, which would take account of his ser- ants. And when he had begun to reckon, one was rought unto him, which owed him ten thousand lents. But forasmuch as he had not to pay, his rd commanded him to be sold, and his wife and hildren, and all that he had, and payment to be ade. The servant therefore fell down, and wor- hiped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, nd I will pay thee all. Then the lord of that ser- ant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, nd forgave him the debt." The parable which our ord now begins to tell Peter serves to illustrate he operations of that fundamental principle of the hristian religion, mercy. First, we hear of mercy eceived, divine mercy; next, of mercy bestowed, uman mercy. The former is the cause and pattern f the latter. The lord in our text, who remits with- ut grudging the immense defalcations of his ser- ant, represents God, who revealed himself to loses as "merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and bundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and trangression and sin." The proclamation of this quality in God is the very heart of the Gospel, and he who in our text illustrates this quality of mercy not only has pro- claimed mercy to sinners, but has himself executed the divine counsel of mercy. The exercise of this quality in God creates the only basis on which the sinner, who has broken all the commandments of God and is a grievous defaulter in every point of righteousness, can deal with God. Standing by faith on the ground of divine mercy, the sinner has access to God. Otherwise, God is to him a consum- ing fire. On this mercy of God our believing soul feasts every day of our lives. Every time we pray the fifth petition of the Lord's Prayer, we put our- selves in the position of the unfaithful servant in our text.

WEDNESDAY, November 18. Matthew 18: 28-30. "But the same servant went out, and found one of his fellow servants, which owed him an hundred pence: and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest. And his fellow servant fell down at his feet, and be- sought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. And he would not: but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the debt." This part of the parable places human mercy at a far remove from divine mercy. The mercy which the unfaithful servant had just received from his lord should have left an indelible impress on the servant's memory and prompted him to deal kindly with the paltry debt which his companion owed him. God's mercy to us should elicit mercy to others from us. The prayer for forgiveness in this text is the same as in the preceding one. Only while in the former instance the promise, "I will pay thee all," can have no meaning, since fallen man can do noth- ing to rehabilitate himself with God, and since his good works after conversion are fruits of faith which he is in duty bound to bring forth, yet the promise is possible of accomplishment in the latter instance. However, the mercy which we extend to a brother for wrongs done us should not be thus conditioned, but free like the mercy which we have received. This part of the parable is extremely humiliating to us. For as this unjust servant is dealing with a brother in distress, we are all in- clined to deal, and have dealt, with the brethren, to the shame of the Gospel of mercy and the God of grace whom we profess.

THURSDAY, November 19. Matthew 18: 31-33. "So when his fellow-servants saw what was done, they were very sorry, and came and told unto their lord all that was done. Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him, O thou wicked ser- vant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou de- siredst me: shouldest not thou also have had com- passion on thy fellow servant, even as I had pity on thee?" The cause of the wronged servant is taken up by his fellows. They must have felt the need of mercy for their own defaults, and could appreciate the intolerable situation in which one of their brothers had been placed by a brother's lack of mercy. Their action in reporting the matter to their lord is an act of Christian justice. They were convinced that if the action of the unjust servant should go unrebuked and become the prevailing practice within the brotherhood, all Christian fel- lowship and co-operation would have to cease. And their lord at this second encounter calls the unjust servant a wicked man. What a crushing verdict! When we hear of wickedness we think of murder, theft, adultery, and the like. Here, lack of mercy in our dealings with our fellows is denounced as wickedness. God will hold no communion with an unmerciful man. The mercy which he bestows on utterly undeserving men, who have recklessly squandered the splendid estate in which he placed them, is to renew the sinful heart, making it tender, loving, forgiving. Streams of mercy are to flow from the heart that has tasted the goodness of the Lord. The mercy of God can have no abiding-place in an unmerciful heart, and its praise from un- merciful lips is a sham and a delusion.

FRIDAY, November 20. Matthew 18: 34, 35. "And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses." Such is the dismal ending of this beautiful parable. It started, as it were, in heaven; it ends in hell. It lifted the defaulting debtor into unspeakable joy and brought abounding comfort into his distressed heart. Now it hurls him into the endless torment of everlasting despair. For the idea of Roman Catholic commen- tators that in this text purgatory is taught, where sinners continue paying their debts, is not only for- eign to all the Scriptures, but also misconceives the teaching of this text. How can a sinner pay to God what he owes him after judgment has been passed on him? Really, this idea, if consistently carried out, makes of the castaways from God's grace the most obedient servants of God, since they all are paying their debts to him, which they did not do before. May God keep every one of us conscious of the debt that has been remitted to us, and fill our hearts with great and enduring compassion toward the brethren who have wronged us. We can afford to forgive them; we cannot afford not to forgive.

SATURDAY, November 21. John 7: 6, 8. "My time is not yet come. . . . My time is not yet full come." Though he still tarries a while in Galilee, the public part of the great Galilean ministry of our Lord may now be said to be closed. He must now begin to face in the final conflict his most relentless enemies at the seat of their power, Jerusalem. His relatives ask him to attend the festival of taber- nacles. He declines for the moment. Every move- ment in the public career of our Lord is exactly timed. He is very desirous to finish his work, but he will not hasten it unduly, nor force the great issue of his life. The simple among his hearers must have more time to reflect on his messages and to digest them. The stubborn may yield, if a little more patience is shown them. The apostate char- acter of the Jewish hierarchy must be fully revealed, and that takes time. But who may fully know all the reasons that guide the Father and the Son at each step of the great work of redemption? One reason why the Lord tarries will be revealed anon. We are glad to know that the Lord did not im- petuously press forward to the crisis in his life, as some martyrs have done who became victims mostly to their own passion. Jesus calmly surveys every situation and does what is necessary for him to do, and good for us, at the proper season. He does not chafe under the restraint of delays that occur in his great mission, but pauses for counsel and direction from on high and for meditation. There is consum- mate obedience in all his acts, also in his forbearing to act. Let this mind be in us, that was in Jesus Christ.

These Daily Meditations by Professor Dau will appear in each issue during 1914.

DENOMINATIONAL NOTES OF INTEREST FROM THE FIELD

—THE LUTHERAN CHURCH is taking an active part in benevo- nt work connected with the European War. Every mother ouse in Germany has placed at the disposal of the government eaconesses specially trained for nursing. Many hundreds are t the front and in the hospitals. It is estimated by pastors of he church that more than one thousand are nursing wounded oldiers today.

—THE NORWEGIAN CHURCH is planning for a more extended ork among Norwegians in the Eastern States. Missionary eetings are being held in Boston and other large cities, includ- g LaCrosse, Wis., attended by delegates from every quarter. astors who have grown old in the service of the church, and issionaries who have traversed the globe in the interest of umanity, will discuss long-studied ways and means. Compre- ensive results are expected.

—THE WOMAN'S BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS of the Dutch eformed Church has been presented with a new place in the erkshires to be used as a retreat for missionaries and a rest or impoverished working women. It is purely philanthropic, nd was presented to the board by Mrs. William Scudder and named in her honor. A number of distinguished missionaries of the Dutch Reformed Church attended the opening, and were entertained there during the past month. They included repre- sentatives from Japan, China, India, Turkey, Brazil, the Philip- pines and Mexico.

—AMONG THE MANY WAR refugees who have just arrived home is Mr. J. J. Arakelyan, a representative of the Baptist Mission- ary Society who started a world tour in mid-summer, and had just reached Russia when the war broke out. He describes the scene as one akin to pandemonium, music, flags flying, waving of hats and handkerchiefs, shrieking children, weeping wives and frantic mothers. Men away from home sent merely a note saying they had gone to the war. Just so loved ones were torn apart, never to meet again. Yet the terror of it all was as- suaged by the loyal love of country. Even Socialists turned from hatred to friendship and joined the ranks. But the most wonderful of all, says Mr. Arakelyan, is the great work which the Baptists are doing. Many received baptism and professed religion in all the turmoil. The missionary was entertained in St. Petersburg by the world renowned evangelist, Dr. Fetler, through whose influence the Czar gave the Baptists permission to hold their meetings. Mr. Arakelyan had an exciting time getting home.

—BISHOP LLOYD OF THE EPISCOPAL BOARD of Foreign Missions relates the following as illustrating the power of the Gospel in heathen lands: "Some forty years ago, when a British admiral was cruising in northern waters off the Indian town of Masset on Graham Island, British Columbia, a chief drove his war canoe alongside of the man-of-war. An object in one end of the canoe closely covered aroused the admiral's curiosity, and he questioned the man. With pride the chief lifted the covering, revealing a heap of the gory heads of his enemies! Recently the bishop visited the home of this man's son, and found a Chris- tian family, who entertained him in their home with every evi- dence of comfort and refinement. The change had been wrought by a mission of the Church of England. Every native in the place is an enthusiastic Christian. Their place of worship, which holds three hundred, is well filled at every service, and at least three of their number are able to take charge of the ser- vice and preach."

Our Gratitude for Peace

THAT President Wilson did well in making the principal message in his Thanksgiving proclamation expressive of the sincere gratitude of the nation in being permitted to enjoy the blessings of peace, while the rest of the world is at war, will be universally admitted. "Our people," he says, "have looked upon their own life as a nation with deeper comprehension, a fuller realization of their responsibilities as well as of their blessings, and a keener sense of the moral and practical significance of what their part among the nations of the world may come to be." We have felt in our business life the depressing influence of the war, and have been led to a higher valuation of peace and a deeper sympathy for those in distress. Our nation has been receiving the quickening of a great moral stimulation. While there are many other causes for thankfulness, these he wisely recognizes as the foremost.

But we owe to God more than a mere formal official acknowledgment of our gratitude, which is liable to be forgotten almost as soon as it is expressed. At this time, when nearly the whole world is plunged in war, Christian nation fighting Christian nation, brother against brother, would it not be well for us to examine our own hearts and to confess before God our national and individual shortcomings? Are his statutes written on our hearts? Do we reverence his Sabbaths? With all the abundant blessings we receive from his hand, have we been ever mindful to magnify and exalt the generous Giver? Do we acknowledge him in all our ways? Have we labored as earnestly for the expansion of his kingdom on earth as we ought to labor?

These questions are not asked in a spirit of recrimination. We are mindful of the fact that there is at this moment in every American heart a feeling of the warmest gratitude for the divine protection and the blessings we now enjoy. But at this special time we need a still deeper spiritual quickening. We need to consecrate ourselves anew before we can expect an assurance of the continuance of the divine favor. If we have set up Mammon as our idol; if we have been unduly devoted to the pursuit of power, profit and pleasure; if we have in any way strayed from the "old paths," we need a reconsecration, in order that we may stand before the whole world firm and secure, as a people whose God is the Lord, to whom we have the right to look for guidance in all our affairs.

It may be, as many believe, that the greatest hour for this nation is at hand—the most momentous opportunity for exalted service it has ever known. The democracy which the old world despised may become the chief cornerstone of a new civilization. Let us prepare for this opportunity by humbling ourselves before God, who loves to exalt those who do him honor. Let us plead for an increase of faith and a broader vision of world-service. With his all-wise leading we can rise equal to the greatest of tasks and succeed.

Never can human nature be transformed except by divine power. The whole course of the present war has proven this. We see nations flinging away the civilization of many centuries' growth. Though we cannot now foresee the outcome, yet we have unshakable faith that the Supreme Ruler, in his own time and way, will command order to rise from the chaos of empires. And when that time comes, we must be ready, in obedience to his call, to render loyal and acceptable service in the great work of rehabilitating the world to his glory and for the benefit of our fellow men.

The Preacher and His Pay

IT IS very easy to work up sympathy for a minister and his family if they are in need. If a minister is sick, or if he is an old man who has given his life to the Gospel, the discovery of his need seems still sadder. The office mail brings not infrequent appeals from ministers or their wives, telling of dire want. It is hard to think of a sadder spectacle than a faithful old minister and his wife, who have lent their backs beneath the burdens of the church, who have toiled in Christ's joys and sorrows, their hair whitened by age and work and care, their limbs unsteady, brains and bodies and souls weary, being forced to acknowledge that those whom they once served have forgotten to aid them. It often happens that the old parishioners are far away. They are among new friends to whom they dread to confide the fact of their want.

Christian charity can help these worthy soldier-saints. The churches are constantly becoming more interested and active in providing for the toil-worn pastors. But is there not a better way? Why not give them a fairer compensation during their days of strength? Why not make it possible for them to make some provision, as other men do, for the inactive years ahead? Above all, why not pay up promptly what we have promised to pay them?

Many a faithful pastor receives for his own and his family's support little more than a young girl stenographer or a grocer's boy. The matter of the big salaries to the big preachers does not enter here. The small and middle-sized congregations, prosperous but thoughtless, they need this exhortation. Find out what your preacher needs. Don't neglect him. Don't drop behind in your payments. Encourage enthusiasm in him by being enthusiastic in supporting him. Look up some of your former pastors who have moved away, and find out how matters are faring with them. Help and lead your local church in doing its duty by its present pastor and in finding out the needs of its former pastor; help your denomination in the noble work of providing for its Gospel veterans, so that age shall not find them unsupported, forsaken, brokenhearted.

Blind Guides

MOST people seem ashamed to utter the frank words: "I don't know." Yet if they would speak them more frequently, other folk would be saved a deal of trouble. Travelers to an unfamiliar city are often sent far out of their way, following misinformation given in reply to their inquiries for direction.

It is an honor to have the opportunity of guiding the steps of a stranger or friend. But it is an honor that must be taken seriously. Pride in giving advice, or even a real desire to help, should not lead one to give untrustworthy directions. "If the blind lead the blind both shall fall into the ditch." The simple words, "I don't know," will send the traveler to another source of information which will set him on his right way.

Particularly in the realm of mind and soul is it a serious matter to give misinformation. Teachers and preachers, who are under the necessity of saying something at regular intervals, are often sorely tempted to utter conjectures instead of tried and proved counsel. Of course when an original idea occurs to such a leader of thought he may give it out for what it is worth, but always coupling it with the words which even the sage Paul was not afraid at times to pronounce: "I think." Scientists and philosophers must, in their studies and laboratories, follow lines of conjecture, working out certain hypotheses in an endeavor to reach the truth. But unreckonable harm has been done by too rapid rush into dogmatic statement.

The duty of the Christian, preacher and layman alike, is chiefly to state what he knows. "We cannot," declared the apostles, "but speak the things which we have seen and heard." The one sure, unanswerable argument for persuading people to the better life, the one sure word of direction, which will guide souls to safety, is the word that relates in simple, earnest fashion the facts about what Christ has done for the individual soul. "We have found him," said Andrew to his brother Simon. "Behold the Lamb of God," said John to his followers. We are never pointing people wrong when we are pointing them to Christ.

Three Hundred Years

AMERICANS have sometimes been tempted to be ashamed of the youthfulness of our country. Traveling in the Old World they have been awed by buildings whose history can be traced back through many centuries, by cities that were founded a thousand years ago and more, by countries whose life dates back to the beginnings of history. "Alas!" they have thought, "we are very young."

But now America begins to talk in centuries. New York City three hundred years old! Damascus laughs at Rome's near three thousand years. Rome laughs at London's scarce more than one thousand. New York, with but two centuries to its credit, must hide its head. But now, three hundred, almost one third of the way down the long path of a thousand years!

Three hundred years of consecutive, recorded, compact history! They have been great years. From a score of souls to five million; from insignificance to power; from one of the least to one of the greatest cities of the world.

For the future? What shall the next th hundred years bring? They will bring new resp sibilities. Our biggest Western city should gr in honor as she grows in prosperity and pomp beauty. Every added century must see her fillin still nobler and more helpful place in the worl civilization. Above all, in the whirl and clan of her work and pleasure she must not forg "Except the Lord build the house they labor in v that build it; except the Lord keep the city watchman waketh but in vain."

Mortality and the War

IN reading the cable despatches that tell of fighting in the European war and glancing o the estimated losses in the great battles, in wh hundreds of thousands of troops are massed agai each other, one is apt to receive the impress that the actual loss of life is greatly in excess all previous records. There is some consolati however, in knowing that military authorities a medical experts take another view of the case. a recent statement, Sir William Osler, professor medicine at Oxford, has declared that the pres war will establish "a new record for low mortal among the wounded." In former wars, if six cent. of the injured died the rate was regarc as a fairly low average; whereas, today, the gene adoption of the slim, self-sterilized, high-veloc bullet, with its clean wound, and the vastly m efficient field hospital service, combine to redu the death-rate to comparatively small proportio Unless the wound is in a vital part the patie soon becomes convalescent. In a few weeks, months at most, he is usually able to be back his post in the field. Sir William Osler cites t case of some 700 wounded, all of whom recover with a single exception. That there have be many battles in the present war in which shrap and rifle shot accounted for thousands of deat on the field is unquestioned; but even in such furio engagements the death-rate has been pronounc not excessive in view of the vast forces engag The essential point gained is that in modern w fare the soldier has a much better chance to esca with his life than his predecessor had twenty thirty years ago. Correspondents' estimates casualties in battle are usually more vivid th accurate and they have been notoriously so in t war. Even military bulletins are apt to glow wi patriotic fervor, rather than to present simp provable facts. When we remember that t mortality rate among the wounded in our C War, according to careful military writers, w often as high as fourteen per cent. and rarely low as five or six per cent., the significance of t notable reduction in the death-rate in the prese war can be better appreciated.

Comment by the Way

Next week we expect to have an important a nouncement which will interest all of our reade regarding the new "Pollyanna" serial. It will a be good news to our readers that Dr. J. H. Jowe will lead in the "Meditations" during 1915. T moral is: SEND IN YOUR RENEWAL this mon this week, or just as soon after reading this not as possible. Don't miss a single issue!

– ONE OF THE FIRST official acts of Carranza on assuming office of provisional president of Mexico was to issue a dec on September 11 by which slavery in every form was abolish through the republic. This was especially directed against system of peonage, which prevailed on large estates. Yucat where such slavery had long existed, is now an inviting fi for missionary and educational enterprise under the new or of things. Enforced and unpaid labor, restraint of perso freedom and deprivation of civil rights are now declared by proclamation to be offenses punishable by removal from offi and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

– "PASTOR RUSSELL," who assumes to speak with authority many things Scriptural, has lately been making a sad mess prophecy. Many men, with more rashness than learning, ha lived to regret bitterly that they were ever tempted to join date-fixers who state the time when certain great events prophecy are to take place. Cuming, Hart, Wild, Baxter and host of others, all claiming to be able to read the "clock of ages," were self-confessed failures and did not live to see fulfilment of their forecasts, based on Daniel, Jeremiah a Revelation. Russell, as the Presbyterian points out, after ma ing sundry calculations and misquoting Scripture, says: "If with the close of the present year, Messiah should take to hi self his great power and begin his glorious reign of a thousa years." This is November. There is yet time to hedge, othe wise in a little over six weeks the pastor may regret his p sumptuous blunder when it will be too late to correct it.

Aviators Drop Steel Arrows

THE papers give an account of French aviators killing German soldiers by dropping on them showers of steel arrows. The arrows are about five inches long and a little thicker an a lead pencil. They are dropped in batches of e hundred, a mechanical arrangement spreading em over an area of about two hundred yards, om a height of 1,500 feet. From this height they ll go through a man's body. The Argonauts on eir way with the prince to secure the throne r him passed through hostile territory and certain rds flew over the place where they rested and cking from their wings long feathers, with sharp tal points, dropped them down as arrows of war to ound the Grecian heroes. Consulting the woman's ce on the bow of the ship as an oracle, the prince mmanded the men to strike their shields together, d the birds flew away and troubled them more. It is to be hoped that in answer to world's prayer all the evil instruments of ar on the earth, in the air and under the a may cease their work of death. The row was among the primitive instruments war. It is often referred to in the riptures as a weapon of warfare. "And they re mighty men, helpers of war. They were med with bows, and could use both the right nd and the left in hurling stones and shooting arrows out of a bow." (I Chron. 12: 1, 2.)

Clerks in Glass Cages

HE Charities Department of one of our greatest American cities spent twenty ousand dollars in tearing down plaster, concete and marble partitions separating the ices of the department and substituting ass partitions. The object was to keep employees within sight and thus increase their iciency. It was reported in the papers as a eat stroke of economy. We doubt the wisom of the masonry, even if it could have en done without cost. For while there is tendency in the eyes of others to touch the uscles of an activity, yet in the mature ties of life too much espionage on the part employers is an impertinence and a check the highest kind of service or efficiency. ather let trust take its place. Let men and omen be put on their honor to do their duty om the best motive. If they do not make od, then employ others who are ready to the work required. No, the departments many cities can institute a better economy an by putting men and women employees in ass cages so they can be watched. They n better spare some of the officers with fat laries, who are so numerous, and put in ass cages any who, behind the walls of aster, concrete or marble, might want to y plans of graft, small or great. The only re protection or incentive to employers or nployees in the departments of the cities or llages is, "Thou God seest me." (Gen. 16: '.)

Red Hair and Freckles

HE president of a company in a large city recently advertised for an office boy, to be d-haired and freckle-faced. The reason he ave for such a kind of boy was that he sually found such were not conceited and ere industrious and valuable. He said his ife and four children were red-haired and eckle-faced, and two young men with these eculiarities had grown up to be among his ost trusted employees. The morning after e advertisement appeared in the papers a ndred of such boys crowded the office and ace outside, and many more down stairs were not le to get in. A fourteen-year-old applicant for e job, in stepping from an elevator, noticed a oung lady to whom he took off his cap, and for hose exit from the car he waited. The young dy, it so chanced, was the stenographer in the fice, whose business it was to select the boy wanted, s he was needed in her department. Entering the fice she said: "I have chosen the boy I want. His oliteness and kindness to me, a stranger, convince e he has the other qualities needed." The ninety-ine were sent away and the one boy stayed. A y's dress and manners go a long way toward ecuring a job. Genuine politeness, which is but another name for kindness, is an important element of success in a boy or girl. There are some occupations where, other things being equal, the comely woman or handsome man will be preferred, but in the long run it is beauty of thought, kindness of sentiment and integrity of character which make for success in life. The boy did not have a comely face, but he had a beautiful behavior, reflecting genuine kindness, whose deep meaning is thus described: "The desire of a man is his kindness." (Prov. 19: 22.)

Rev. Edward Judson Dies

THE Rev. Edward Judson, for thirty years pastor of the Memorial Baptist Church and founder of the Judson Memorial in Washington Square, New York City, died suddenly in the Roosevelt Hospital the evening of October 23. He was the son of Rev. Adoniram Judson, founder of missions in Burma, and was born at Moulmein, Burma, in 1844. He was graduated at Brown University in 1865, and soon after received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Colgate University. From 1865 to 1867 he was principal of a seminary at Townsend, Vt., and from 1868 to 1874 was professor of Latin and modern languages at Colgate University. From 1875 to 1881 Dr. Judson was pastor of the North Orange Baptist Church, and then became pastor of the Berean Baptist Church of New York, which he changed to the Judson Memorial Church in honor of his distinguished father. Dr. Edward Judson was one of the ablest and best men in the ministry in the United States. With an intellect so strong, a culture so broad, a manner so gracious and winning, a service so democratic and unselfish, a spirituality which irradiated his face and a sense of humor spicing life for him and every one with whom he came in contact, his ministry was an unmixed blessing to his own denomination and to the Christian world without. In estimating the character and life of Dr. Edward Judson he seems to have fulfilled this requirement of another: "Thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ." (I Tim. 4: 6.)

BEECHER STATUE UNVEILED

A STATUE of Henry Ward Beecher was unveiled in his old charge, Plymouth Congregational Church, Brooklyn, the other Sunday morning. Addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. Hillis, pastor of the church, General Horatio C. King, and Captain John R. Howard. The statue is of bronze of heroic dimensions, and rests on a pedestal of red granite. It shows the famous preacher in one of his pulpit attitudes, and below him on the left seated on the base of the monument are two female slaves, commemorating his auctioning off in his pulpit a young negress for her freedom. Mr. Beecher came a young man from Indianapolis, Ind., to Brooklyn, and till the time of his death was at the head of the American pulpit in ability, popularity, and power. Brooklyn built a statue in his honor facing the City Hall. Mr. Beecher needs no monument to perpetuate his memory in Brooklyn; such can be found in the trees of Prospect Park which he selected, in flowers of the public gardens he chose, and in the better thought and life of the city. And yet it is beautiful, in the Plymouth Church still so virile under Dr. Hillis' pastorate, to dedicate this monument to the great founder. The bronze figure will preach perpetually from this text: "He being dead, yet speaketh." (Heb. 11: 4.)

World's Savings Banks' Depositors

THE following statement shows the proportion of depositors in the savings banks of the world to each thousand of the population: Switzerland, 544; Denmark, 442; Norway, 415; Sweden, 404; Belgium, 397; New Zealand, 360; France, 346; Holland, 325; Germany, 317; England, 302; Australia, 300; Tasmania, 280; Japan, 270; Italy, 220; the United States, only 99. This has been commented upon as an evidence that our country is the least provident in the list. We can scarcely accept such a conclusion. For over a hundred years our young nation, having the raw material in prodigality, had to import labor and capital in large quantities to develop the stupendous industries which were to become its wealth and pride. We have borrowed money from Europe ever since the birth of our nation, to build so many of our railroads and to promote so many branches of industry. We shall have to shut this borrowing off short, as Europe will be so exhausted financially after the war that it will have no money to lend. It may not be bad for us in the long run to be thrown more upon our own resources in financing our enterprises. The ninety-nine depositors in savings banks per thousand of inhabitants in the United States, in the table, does not indicate that the people have not been saving. The people have accumulated property of a real and personal character in such enormous quantities as to make the nation fabulously rich. Great wealth will be a weakness, a menace to our nation unless we retain with it our virtue. We have every reason to believe that these words of wisdom can be taken up truthfully by our nation: "Riches and honor are with me; yea, durable riches and righteousness." (Prov. 8: 18.)

Mountain of Rock Salt

A MOUNTAIN of rock salt, three hundred feet in height and nearly a mile in diameter, near Jelfa, Algeria, has just been brought to the attention of the world by a scientist. The Jelfa hill, though of soluble material, stands up in bold relief above the clay that surrounds it. In constructing this earth as a habitation for man, the Almighty mixed an abundance of salt with it. Two-thirds of the earth's surface is salt water. As a preservative salt is an absolute necessity, especially in warm climates. Among the Hebrews the slaughter of animals in religious service, as well as for food, was so great that the large salt deposits of Palestine were a great blessing. Christ used salt as the type of a Christian to preserve life and to keep the individual heart and social institutions from the corruption that would destroy them. He said: "Ye are the salt of the earth." (Matt. 5: 13.)

White Slaver Heavily Punished

THE head of the white slave traffic in the Bronx was convicted in the Bronx County Court the other day and received the heaviest sentence possible—nineteen years and five months in Sing Sing and a fine of $5,000. His accomplice turned State's evidence, and was sentenced to from three years and six months to eleven years and eight months in the State prison. The conviction and punishment of these criminals call to mind these words: "Let his net that he hath hid catch himself; into that very destruction let him fall." (Ps. 35: 8.)

IN THE LAND OF THE DISPOSSESSED

EYE WITNESSES TELL OF THE SCENES THAT ARE STAGGERING EUROPE

AMERICA is learning the story of the greatest tragedy in history, slowly, piece by piece. And the tragedy grows even as we read. And as our realization of this horror quickens, we in America [illegible] with a heart within him can think of [illegible].

UNTIL recently the fertile land of Normandy, France, has been undisturbed by war. But now Havre and its vicinity are dangerously near the war zone, and the country is flooded with Belgian refugees. Mr. Ringrose, a New York lawyer, of 25 Fifth Avenue, spent some weeks in this region. He says:

"One sees everywhere people sleeping in the fields; they drop down just in the spot where they are as they dare to, stumbling over the ridges and then falling face downward for a long sleep, perhaps for a whole day. These exhausted men and women have come far. There are hopeless-looking old people, perhaps the most pathetic of any, and unceasing numbers of women and children.

"I was staying at a town near Havre and saw several hundred go by or drop from the throng and stop, each day. Every housewife had a cart, about as large as a child's express cart, in which were packed her belongings, and which was drawn by a dog. He was harnessed underneath the cart and half lifted, half pulled it, while she pushed behind. So they got along, perhaps for a hundred miles. The Norman people are opening their doors in most generous fashion to these needy ones. But they are coming in ever-increasing numbers and the winter is coming, too. I cannot think what will be done with them all."

Miss Ray of Los Angeles, Cal., tells of what she saw in London of these same poor people. "At the Victoria Station they were arriving in scores. And women, hardly a man among them. They were mostly mothers, too, whom I saw, lugging babies, with others tugging at their skirts. And all very dirty from the three days' journey without a chance to wash. They seemed to be almost all young or youngish people. I was told that many of the aged died on the journey or during that terrible exodus from Antwerp.

"People do the best they can with them. If there are children in the Kaplick family, they take to older women if not, they look after the babies, the sick, injured and infirm of whom there are a great many, are cared for in improvised hospitals. The Belgian people are very prolific and the number of babies that are being born continually is surprising. Clothing for them is a very great need."

In Bruges, made famous by Longfellow's poem, Mr. Ringrose tells of seeing the lace-makers. "There, in the square, in the center of the city, they were still sitting when I arrived. It was just before the Germans entered. About seventy-five of these old women make enormous quantities of the famous Brussels lace, as they sit and chat, their great white coifs nodding in the breeze. It is a peaceful and pretty sight in ordinary times, but now all is upset. The poor old women run to and fro, their treasures of lace hidden in holes in the cellars and they themselves in hiding half the time, so alarmed are they at the prospect of the coming of the Uhlans. Their mental sufferings are terrible, and besides, their industry is completely stopped for the winter, or as long as the war lasts; no one buys lace at such a time, even if all trade in Belgium were not prostrated."

HURRYING CHILDREN OUT OF A THREATENED TOWN

Another writes: "Germany is a land of children doing men's work. Near me lived a family, consisting of the mother and five children. The husband was at the front, whether dead or alive no one knew. It was a marvel how they lived. They had the government allowance of $2.50 a month and $2 per child, which kept them from starvation, but that was all. The children wore no shoes, and everybody just patched and patched them clothes. If food absolutely gave out they could go to the nearest free kitchen and get a meal. This did very well for summer, but I was wondering how they would get along if the mother became sick, and the cold weather came. It is very cold in Bremen."

THAT the sad case of the poor mothers and children of Belgium, bereaved by the war, has appealed very warmly to the American heart, is shown in the kindly expressions in many of the letters received during the past week, only a few of which we can quote here:

Mrs. G. W. L., of Cairo, Ill., writes: "My little boy and I send $1 for the widows and orphans, and with it goes a prayer for the sad, heart-broken and hungry sufferers. Jesus came to bind up the broken-hearted. I pray that they may go to him for comfort."

N. M. C., South Hampton, N. H. ($10), says: "This is for the relief of the women and children who are suffering from the war. It makes no difference which country it helps. One-half is from an old veteran of our Civil War, and one-half for myself."

Mrs. E. J. T., Nobleboro, Me. ($1), says: "I hope it will help some poor sufferer. I also am a war widow. My husband was a soldier in the Civil War."

"May God bless this work and hear the prayers that go up to him for peace and for relief for the sufferers, both in the lands of the war and in our own country," writes H. J., La Crosse, Wis. ($1).

"I might not have another chance to lay up treasure in heaven," writes N. B. Lisbon ($2); I hope that the good Lord will lay it on the hearts of the people to give liberally to this cause."

"I hope God will bless this little mite for the widows and orphans," writes L. H., Cincinnati, Ohio ($3).

"May God bless the enclosed mite on its mission of mercy," writes a reader of Manchester, Kan. "May he in his own good time cause peace to reign in all the warring nations."

"I have been a member of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family for many years. I am a Civil War veteran, but to me war is simply horrible. Enclos please find my mite to help those po helpless ones," writes Captain H. H., Roby, Ill. ($5).

Mrs. S. H., Morriz, Mich., sends $ with a prayer "that this may help buy bread for some poor child."

THE lists of givers published bel are eloquent in behalf of this cau It is safe to say that the majority these gifts represent sacrifices. N one was given carelessly or with i difference. These sums are acco panied by prayer, by earnest thoug about the women and children w are to be helped, by thankfulness th the givers may have a share in r lieving the sufferings of these mothe and their little ones.

Mr. Waters should reach London b fore this issue is off the press, a will expedite the distribution of the gifts among the destitute refuge in England and in Belgium, a wherever our international committ can reach them. Thus new courag new and wondrous hope and gratitu will come into the hearts of ma mothers because of the splendid offe ings that our readers are making.

From $30,054.33 in hand a week a the fund has grown to $39,052.13 noon of Friday, October 30. And n we are entering upon the period lea ing up to Thanksgiving Day. Eve schoolboy in the land has already re the President's proclamation, as reads it every year, always with fre interest. After all, what is Thank giving? Is it not to make a than offering to God for his gifts to us? I any dare give thanks in breath alo as though that were all God has giv them? And yet how can we ma thank-offerings to God? How can see him a hungered and feed him? athirst and give him drink? Or nake or sick, or in prison and minister un him? "Verily I say unto you" (the are his own words), "inasmuch as have done it to one of the least of the my brethren, ye have done it unto me

So we call upon the CHRISTIAN HE ALD Family to make their thank-offe ing quickly. Help us to send a migh message of good-will and hope a material help to these forsaken on who wait at our door for bread a clothing, lest they perish. Christi friends, deny yourselves somethi quickly. This is a real, a bitter, a te rible and overwhelming trouble; your utmost to relieve it. If that gre "inasmuch" is ever to constrain when can there be another such occ sion as this?

Please address all gifts to t Widows and Orphans Fund, T CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, Ne York. And if you would like to more than your purse allows, write that you are willing to join our sta of volunteer helpers in this greatest charitable causes.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

INTERNATIONAL HIDE-AND-SEEK AT SEA. A compass is no longer the mercantile mariner's arbiter. The lookout has taken its place, and a sight of the flag of any of the nations at war will cause an American ship to change its course quicker'n scat. This is because there is not unanimity in the mind as to what is contraband of war. After much discussion England has officially notified this country that cotton will not be considered contraband by that nation, and the trade is understood to be hopeful of better times at once in consequence. For the year ending June 30 raw cotton exports amounted to $71,000,000 to Germany, $74,000,000 to France, $15,000,000 to Belgium, and about $6,000,000 each to Austria and Russia. Anything like these purchases [illegible] however. And cotton is not yet entirely free from seizure, it would seem, as Secretary McAdoo on October 28 ordered all customs officials to keep secret for thirty days the nature of all outward-bound cargoes and their destination. It was said this order was for the protection of vessels carrying cotton and other staples. Two oil ships have been held and then released by Great Britain, and on October 23 the Kroonland, with a cargo of copper, was detained at Gibraltar for examination, and the State Department began inquiries.

DIE FOR THEIR FELLOWS IN BURNING MINE. More than 350 men were caught in the Franklin Coal and Coke mine near Rossiter, Pa., October 27, by a gas explosion that set fire to the mine, and at latest reports, on October 30, over sixty bodies had been recovered and some 280 men had been rescued, many of them unconscious. The explosion is said to have been caused while the men were making their way through the galleries to begin work, by a miner's lamp igniting a pocket of gas that had been marked dangerous by an inspector the night before. In order to save the greater number, who were scattered through the mine away from the zone of the explosion, the air pumps were reversed and most of the sixty now known to have died and who were trying to reach the airshaft perished. The wives of two of the men, Italians, died from the shock. A mine rescue car and crew were on the scene four hours after the explosion.

THE WAR AND NEWSPAPER PROFITS. It has been pointed out by the president of the Associated Press, Frank B. Noyes, that the cost of the paper in a newspaper is more than the wholesale selling price of the printed sheet, and would result in a loss on every copy sold but for the advertising income. In war times there is a big temporary increase in sales, but no increase on that account in advertising; in fact, recognizing that readers in times of public excitement are less apt to browse through advertising matter, merchants take much less space. Then, too, the cost of procuring the news greatly increases when a paper must print so much on one subject and from so many different points as in the present war. "The simple fact is," said Mr. Noyes, "the newspaper is probably a heavier financial sufferer in the business world through war than any save those whose property is physically destroyed."

ONE SWALLOW DOES NOT MAKE A SUMMER. Believing it would help his country into entering the war, an Italian naval lieutenant, Angelo Belloni, retired, early in October stole a submarine and away he ran for glory. He headed for Rome to report to the vacillating country on the side of the Allies. The French Government detained the craft at Ajaccio, and required of Italy regarding it. Result, a court-martial of the rescued submarine crew, and Italian neutrality unbroken.

BRINGS BACK ABANDONED BAGGAGE. A small mountain of trunks has been piled in a New York express warehouse to await inspection by the customs officials before being distributed to their owners, who fled from Europe at the outbreak of war, leaving their baggage behind them to be gathered up by more leisurely persons and sent to America, where they arrived on a Hamburg-American liner, which crossed without a passenger aboard.

WE'RE GETTING OVERRUN BY ORIENTALS. It is pointed out in the nick of time that of the ninety million and more of population in continental United States in 1910 fully 71,531 were Chinese and 72,157 were Japanese, a total of 136,585 being ten years of age and over, most of whom were engaged in gainful occupations. How many had adopted Christianity through contact with us is not stated.

BOSTON BOTH MODEST AND AMBITIOUS. By gathering its representative men together to organize an association whose object shall be to "boost" Boston to first place in the nation, that city has the grace to admit that it is not now first, and the audacity to proclaim that it ought to be. The further activities of the Boston First Association will be of interest to other municipalities.

LABOR WILL TALK THINGS OVER. The American Federation of Labor expects more than 10,000 delegates from all over the United States at its convention in New York, November 9-23, during which there will be a monster parade of union men. Allied bodies will also convene, holding meetings that may occupy six weeks in all.

ITALY SHAKING IN ITS BOOT. Earthquake shocks were felt at various places throughout Italy in the latter part of October, the city of Florence experiencing a severe convulsion. At Turin and elsewhere the population camped in the open, and some panic was felt, but no serious damage has been reported.

WASHINGTON HAS A LAND (VALUES) BOOM. Real estate in the national capital has increased in value $45,000,000 in three years, according to the triennial assessment figures just made public, total valuations being $390,000,000. Some property owners refuse to enthuse over this fine showing. They might move to New York, where the valuations remain pretty much the same, about $8,400,000,000, the municipal budget alone showing growth, being $204,129,441.44 for 1915, an increase of more than $11,000,000 over 1913, causing a rise in the tax rate from 1.78 to 1.92 in Manhattan. This budget is subject to modification.

DOING THE NEXT TO THE BEST THING. Recognizing that they have not paid their ministers enough to enable them to provide for old age or other natural disqualification for service, the various denominations are continuously trying to establish funds out of which to make such provision when the need arises. The Methodist body in a convention at Washington late in October (ordered by the General Conference) inaugurated a campaign to raise $5,000,000 for this laudable but second best purpose. It was stated at the convention that the movement dates back to one year before the signing of the Declaration of Independence. Secretary of the Navy Daniels, addressing one meeting of the convention, pleaded for a union of all Methodist bodies, North, South, everywhere, to be known as the Methodist Church of America.

THIS COUNTRY TO HAVE A MONEY SHOWER. November 16 is the date fixed for the actual start of the Federal Reserve Banking System. Instantly there will be released for business purposes about $580,000,000 now held in reserve by national banks under the old law in excess of the requirements of the new, $116,000,000 of which is in excess of even present requirements. The present national bank reserve required by law is $1,460,711,345. Under the new system it amounts to $995,792,269. The Reserve Board is confronted with a stupendous task in getting the new banking machinery in operation, supervision of the counting of all the reserve funds not being the least of their burdens.

EARNS IRON CROSS 6,000 FEET IN AIR. The coveted iron cross bestowed by the German Emperor for extraordinary bravery was the reward received by a military aviator whose name the press gives as Luickhardt, for climbing over the side of a Zeppelin car while maneuvering 6,000 feet aloft to saw off a propeller which had been hit by the enemy and threatened to disable the airship, clinging to the outside of the car for a half hour to accomplish the deed; later he went overside again and repaired a long rent in the hull made by a shell.

CALIFORNIA'S TRAVELING LIVE AGRICULTURAL EXHIBIT. Twenty schoolboys, who have won the trip by excellent work at experimental farming under the auspices of the College of Agriculture of the University of California, are visiting twenty-four States and most of our cities to extend their knowledge by observation, and to rest up from their summer's prize toil. They are the winners out of hundreds of contestants in California schools, some of whom worked as much as ten acres. Not gross yield, but net profit was the goal. Thus one boy grew 319 pounds of beans on a quarter acre and made $12.76 over all costs. Another cleared $38.65 in potatoes from a quarter acre. Another raised mixed vegetables on an eighth acre and made $36.18.

WHERE EYESIGHT IS STILL VALUED. The school children of the Panama Canal Zone have been officially warned against reading while traveling, especially at dusk and when the lamps are lighted. Those who must study on trains are cautioned to slip a card or piece of paper under each successive line. A high standard of physical efficiency is sought by the Canal Zone schools, of which there are eleven for white children with a total enrolment of 951, and six for colored children with an enrolment of 731.

THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION

By the President of the United States of America

IT HAS long been the honored custom of our people to turn in fruitful autumn of the year in praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God for his many blessings and mercies to us as a nation. The year that is now drawing to a close since we last observed our day of national thanksgiving has been, while a year of discipline because of the mighty forces of war and of change which have disturbed the world, also a year of special blessing for us.

It has been vouchsafed to us to remain at peace, with honor, and in some part to succor the suffering and supply the needs of those who are in want. We have been privileged by our own peace and self-control in some degree to steady the counsels and shape the hopes and purposes of a day of fear and distress. Our people have looked upon their own life as a nation with a deeper comprehension, a fuller realization of their responsibilities, as well as of their blessings, and a keener sense of the moral and practical significance of what their part among the nations of the world may come to be.

The hurtful effects of foreign war in their own industrial and commercial affairs have made them feel the more fully and see the more clearly their mutual interdependence upon one another and has stirred them to a helpful co-operation such as they have seldom practiced before. They have been quickened by a great moral stimulation. Their unmistakable ardor for peace, their earnest pity and disinterested sympathy for those who are suffering, their readiness to help and to think of the needs of others has revealed them to themselves as well as to the world.

Our crops will feed all who need food; the self-possession of our people amid the most serious anxieties and difficulties, and the steadiness and resourcefulness of our business men will serve other nations, as well as our own.

The business of the country has been supplied with new instrumentalities and the commerce of the world with new channels of trade and intercourse. The Panama Canal has been opened to the commerce of the nations. The two continents of America have been bound in closer ties of friendship. New instrumentalities of international trade have been created which will be also new instrumentalities of acquaintance, intercourse, and mutual service. Never before have the people of the United States been so situated for their own advantage or the advantage of their neighbors or so equipped to serve themselves and mankind.

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate Thursday, the twenty-sixth of November next, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, and invite the people throughout the land to cease from their wonted occupations and in their several homes and places of worship render thanks to Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington this twenty-eighth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fourteen and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-ninth.

WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:

ROBERT LANSING, Acting Secretary of State.

FRIENDS OF INDIANS AND FILIPINOS CONFER

INDIANS and Filipinos equally divided the attention of the Thirty-second Annual Conference on the Indian and Other Dependent Peoples at Mohonk Lake, N. Y. As Mr. Daniel Smiley, the host of the conference, remarked in his words of welcome, so contented and prosperous are the Hawaiians and Porto Ricans that it did not seem necessary to give special consideration to their needs.

That "fire water" has been one of the greatest curses to the Indian is matter of universal knowledge. Very recent years have witnessed the alarmingly increasing use of a habit-forming drug—peyote or mescal—even more serious in its effects than whisky. Peyote, known commercially as mescal, is a species of cactus grown in northern Mexico. Mescal buttons, about one and a half inches in diameter, are very soft when moist, but when dry become brittle and hard. Taste and odor are both disagreeable. Generally eaten in the dry and brittle state, they have been called "dry whisky." Some of the effects of the drug are trembling, nausea, and over-estimation of time—minutes becoming hours and hours long periods of time—a sense of dual existence, and in some instances a delirium somewhat similar to delirium tremens. But the most remarkable effect is the visual hallucination and the extraordinary influence upon the hearing. The habitué enjoys "kaleidoscopic play of most wonderful colors, an incessant flow of visions of infinite beauty and grandeur and variety, while each note produced on the piano becomes a center of a medley of other notes which appear to be surrounded by a halo of color, pulsating to the music."

A further complication is the fact that a religious cult has grown up around the use of the drug. In many tribes meetings are held, developing into all night sessions, where peyote is passed around in dry form or as tea. It is widely used also as a medicine, even for infants, and missionaries report cases of infants and young children that have died as the result of frequent doses. Scientists and missionaries agree as to the terrible effects of the continued use of peyote. It makes moral and physical wrecks of its victims, and its increasing use demands that the Indian Department be given power to deal with it as it does with liquor.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST IN CONVENTION

MEN and millions: these words represent the vital heart-throb pulsating through every session of the sixty-fourth annual convention of the American Christian missionary societies of the Disciples of Christ, held in Atlanta, Ga., last month (October 7-14). Not the fact that the men and the millions in this denomination have increased so remarkably, although it is true that the Church of the Disciples of Christ, in its little over a century of organization, has come to be the fifth Protestant body in the United States, growing from a membership of thirty in 1811 to its present number of 1,350,000 communicants. The attendance at several sessions of the convention numbered 10,000, including 3,000 delegates. Thirty-eight States were represented.

But the Men and Millions movement, whose development reads almost like a romance, was the dominating thought of the convention. Less than a year ago A. E. Cory of Cincinnati, then a missionary in China, was sent back to America by his fellow missionaries to plead for a quarter of a million dollars for missions. By the time Mr. Cory was ready to sail he had decided that one-quarter of a million would not be enough, and doubled the sum to be raised. He had plenty of time to reconsider his plans before he reached the United States, and when he landed it was with the determination to raise $1,000,000. The Board of Missions had even greater faith and after much praying and planning the sum of $6,300,000 was decided upon for enlargement of missionary and educational work at home and abroad. R. A. Long of Kansas City gave $1,000,000, and the second million is already nearly raised.

The movement also has definite plans for securing 1,000 young college men and women for missionary fields and is adopting the "Every Member Canvass" plan, giving each and every member of the denomination an opportunity to participate in the maintenance or extension of its missionary, educational and benevolent interests.

What has been described as "the heart of the whole convention" was the afternoon devoted to reports from the Commission on Foreign Relations, a commission organized last March, with Rev. Dr. Z. T. Sweeney as president. During the past summer Mr. Cory was sent by the commission to Russia, and Rev. M. M. Amunson of Brooklyn, the secretary, made a tour of investigation to Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Russia. The war cut their visits short, but they returned with souls on fire. "The two greatest opportunities for religious work in the world today are Russia and China," they reported; "the present war will break down many barriers and open many doors."

This general delegated convention is the outcome of a need felt by the Disciples for several years for a body which should be a sort of clearing house for their mission boards and which should afford a medium through which they might unite in the great philanthropic and social movements of the day. It was organized at Louisville two years ago and met last year in Toronto. Next year the meeting is scheduled for July, 1915, in Los Angeles.

The financial exhibit showed that the Woman's Missionary Board, which set for its aim for the year closing September 30 the raising of $400,000, received $419,401, a gain of $38,000 over the previous year. The Foreign Board showed receipts of $463,749, a gain of $29,565. During the six years just past this society has steadily gained in receipts. During this period the number of workers has doubled in the foreign field. Eighty-four new buildings have been erected, or more than one per month on the average.

The American Christian Missionary Society showed a decrease of $12,617 in its receipts. The income last year was $168,198. There was a gain from churches, Sunday schools, annuities and book receipts, but bequests declined.

The Board of Church Extension active fund now totals $1,115,475. The number of churches aided in the twenty-six years is 1,717. Many of these would have ceased to live had it not been for the timely aid of the Church Extension Board. During the past year eighty-two new churches were housed by loans aggregating $201,150. And these same churches, encouraged by the assistance of the board, raised $402,300 in the year.

Rev. Walter M. White of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, was chosen to preside over the convention next year, which will meet at Los Angeles.

Rev. F. W. Burnham of California was elected secretary of the American Missionary Society, with the understanding that he is to be made president of it as soon as necessary constitutional changes can be made.

FEED MY SHEEP

BY DUNSTAN CRAIG

Concluded from last week

"NOW, I ain't just ready to stand up an' be killed for the sake of a bunch of sheep that's eat their fill an' gone off an' forgot all about me. An' I don't need to. I ain't boastin' to say't I'm quicker an' surer with a six-shooter than Sanders is. Besides, I know what's comin', which he don't, an' he's dead in his tracks if I ever want to end it that way. An' right there Mister Red Devil sneaks up behind me an' whispers that Sanders's reputation'd save me with any jury in Wyoming. So I stop thinkin' for a while, an' go out an' ride till Bonypart wonders what's ailin' me. That night I don't sleep none, but when day comes it's all clear in my mind what's to be done.

"It's like this: When a bad man gits killed that's so much the better for everybody, an' when it's a good man that goes sudden, why, he c'n take care of himself on the other side. But when a man's about half good an' the other half bad it's a pity to send him off before he's had time to decide which way he's goin' to flop. Sanders needs more time, an' here I come along doin' the surest thing in the world to send him either to hell or back to the Hole-in-the-Wall jury accordin' as I kill him or he kills me. I've got to stop him without killin' him, an' the only way I see is to put across some of the fanciest shootin' I've ever done in my life. So I go down along the crick an' trim the willows a bit to see if my eyes an' nerve's all right.

"The fourth day after the blizzard Sanders comes back, an' things begin to work out just as I want them. He finds me out by the corrals, an' I notice he's left his gun in the house, but mine's in its leather on my hip. 'Good!' says I to myself.

"'Looks as if you'd kept things tidy,' Sanders begins.

"'Toler'ble,' I admit.

"'You'll be a foreman yit,' says he.

"'P'r'aps,' I answer.

"'An' maybe you'll git a bunch of cattle o' your own.'

"'I've been near to it more'n once,' says I, laughin' as I think how some new foolishness has three times sent me out on the trail of a new job just when I'm about ready to settle down.

"'There must be nigh to a thousand dollars of your money, countin' what you brought here with you,' he goes on noddin' his head toward the house.

"Then I see that Sanders has it on his mind to help me, one way or another, an' I've got to hurry.

"'It ain't all mine now,' says I.

"'How's that?' he asks.

"'I owe some of it to the 6 Bar J.'

"'I don't see it,' says he.

"'What's that hay worth that was left over?' I ask.

"'I paid twelve dollars a ton for most of it,' he answers, lookin' at me wonderin' like.

"'But it's worth more'n that now.'

"'No. There won't be no more blizzards till next winter.'

"'I mean,' says I, speakin' very careful, 'it was worth more'n that the day the last one hit us.'

"'Yes, I reckon it was.'

"'Say fifteen,' I suggest.

"'That's about right. But what're you drivin' at?'

"'Ten tons at fifteen dollars makes a hundred an' fifty I owe the 6 Bar J.'

"Sanders looks at me steady for a minute.

"'What's all this about, Brinker?' says he, gittin' impatient.

"'I couldn't ask your permission when you wasn't here, so I just helped myself.'

"'You mean you took—' An' he stops there.

"'About ten tons.'

"'But what in blazes did you want with ten tons of hay? Is this some brilliant cowpuncher joke to welcome me back home?'

"'Nary a joke,' says I.

"He eyes me a full half-minute, an' begins to breathe hard.

"'Well?' says he, very short.

"'I bought ten tons of hay, an' I owe the 6 Bar J a hundred an' fifty dollars. You c'n take that out o' what

JESUS AND PILATE

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL TOPIC FOR NOVEMBER 22.
MATT. 27: 11-44

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By [illegible]

"What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ? They all say: Let him be crucified." Matt. 27: 22.

In every heart there is enacted a similar scene. The most important question for us all is: "What is to be done with Jesus?" It is a question of vital importance, pressing the matter to us, because there is a decision to make of us. "They cannot remain," but rather is many," and there is plenty of time for indecision or apathetic lingering, except [illegible] the immediate. This is what Paul [illegible] to impress on his hearers, so that we should not [illegible] the decision of one. But, also, [illegible] gain, any [illegible] Judas, an opinion about [illegible] to crucify, and even [illegible] it on the part of [illegible] as it is presented to us in [illegible] with all its surprises and surprises. Instead of it being "None of self" and all of Jesus" it is "None of Him and all of self" and "Most of self, and as little as possible of Him." What wonder that our heart is left often so desolate!

Jesus and Pilate

By Arthur H. Hufford, B.D.

"WHEN Pilate saw that a tumult was arising—" That was the trouble with Pilate: he wished to avoid trouble. His story throughout is the story of a coward. Jesus, surrounded by his enemies in the garb of a poor man, weary from his long vigil, fearing upon his head and flesh and in his raiment the signs of ridicule and contempt, stood forth, the embodiment of courage. Pilate, in his palace, in royal robes, in royal state, surrounded by the fawning multitude, with all his civil and military authority stands forth, the abject coward.

The place where this civil trial of Jesus occurred was strangely out of keeping with the dark deeds, the strange hatred and the contemptible weakness which lay back of his arrest and prosecution. It was the Praetorium, the Jerusalem residence of the governor of Judea. Probably this building was identical with what was called "the palace of Herod the Great." described as having been "very gorgeous, half citadel, half fairy pleasure-house." "Set in a sumptuous park, the central portion was a fortress from the sides of which sprang massive wings. It was girdled round with a stately colonnade, within which was a rich mosaic pavement, and out here, seated upon an splitted throne, Pilate was wont to hold his assizes."

Into this scene of pomp and splendor and authority came Jesus, the carpenter of Nazareth, the mystic, wandering healer and teacher, whose deeds and sayings had set the people into an uproar. Since his accusers knew that no charge of treason would have any standing in the court of Pilate they accused their victim first of treason: "We found this man perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, and saying that he himself is Christ a king."

"Art thou the king of the Jews?" asks Pilate in careless, tolerant, good-humored curiosity.

"Askest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee?" asks Jesus. This is another point out: "Do you speak as a Roman or a Jew?" If you speak as a Roman, no. I am no rival of Caesar. My kingdom is not of this world."

"Art thou a king, then?"

Yes. King of the kingdom of Truth.

"Truth! what is truth?" asks Pilate, perhaps contemptuously, perhaps earnestly, perhaps carelessly. But he goes forth and announces to the [illegible]

"I find no crime in him."

He hears that the accused man is a Galilean, so he sends him to Herod, who happens also to be in Jerusalem. Herod is glad to see him, hoping that he may prove to be his daunting victim, John the Baptist, risen from the dead. But to his questions Jesus answers not one word. Herod, in angry mockery, dresses him out as a "mock king" and sends him back with the crowd to Pilate.

Then Pilate makes another effort to release him. He suggests that in accordance with the custom that sets one prisoner free at the time of the Passover feast he let this innocent Galilean go. But the mob cries "give us Barabbas," a thief and robber.

"What then shall I do with this Jesus?"

"Let him be crucified."

The third time Pilate tries to stay their fury. "Why, what evil hath this man done? I have found no cause of death in him; I will therefore chastise and release him." Then Pilate took Jesus and scourged him. Can you fancy that? This little governor whipping Jesus! Jesus, the King of truth and all kindness, the King of earth and heaven, is scourged at the hands of this weak-willed politician. The soldiers took him away then within the court, stripped him, and arrayed him again in mock garments of mock royalty. Pilate came and led him out to the people. Jesus stood before them, meek but kingly, wearing his crown of thorns and the shameful purple robe of ridicule.

"Behold the man!" said Pilate.

"Crucify him, crucify him!" shouted the crazed mob.

"Take him yourselves and crucify him," said Pilate. "I find no crime in him."

Then the Jews said something which frightened him. "We have a law, and by that law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God." Pilate was nearer the spiritual kingdom than he had ever been before, or than he ever came again. He looked eagerly into Jesus' eyes. What were these strange things that were being said: "Son of God!" "I am a King!" "I bear witness of the truth."

"Whence art thou?" asks Pilate.

But Jesus does not answer. He knows that there is no real intention on the part of this slave of the people to follow the truth if it had been told. "Speakest thou not unto me?" cries Pilate. "Knowest thou not that I have power to release thee and power to crucify thee?" Jesus tells him that of himself he has, with all his pomp and pretense, no power at all.

Then Pilate really wishes to set him free, but the Jews seeing him desirous of yielding, cry out: "If thou release this man thou art not Caesar's friend. Every one that maketh himself a king speaketh against Caesar." Pilate sits down again in the judgment seat, and a strange message comes from his wife telling of a dream that had frightened her, and warning him to have nothing to do with this righteous man.

"Behold your king," said Pilate to the mob.

"Away with him! Away with him! Crucify him!"

"Shall I crucify your king?"

"We have no king but Caesar."

Here they reached the depth of their shame. The kingship of Caesar was their great reproach and disgrace and curse, the sign of their disobedience. Their sin. Yet rather than submit to this King of Truth they caressed the hands that held them to an alien and impious potentate.

Pilate surrendered then. With silly show of innocence he washed his hands and laid the blame of what might follow upon them. "His blood be upon us and on our children," they cried.

Then Pilate, tired of the confusion and the perplexity and the annoyance, "gave sentence that what they asked for should be done, and he released unto them Barabbas, but Jesus he delivered up to their will." They mocked their victim further, took off the robe and put on him his own garments again and "led him away to crucify him."

There is a strange side light on this scene in the statement that the Jews would not go inside of Pilate's palace because they would by so doing be ceremonially defiled. This insignificant tenet of formalism they would not break. While refusing to do that, they sent to his death the Son of God who had come to deliver them. So we sometimes shrink from outward faults and in our hearts commit again that same grim crime, crucifying afresh by our indifference, our carelessness, our compromises, the same eternal Son of God.

Pilate could have saved Jesus, saved him from ridicule, from shame, from pain, from the cross. So can we save him today from these things. What then shall we do with Jesus, who is called the Christ? Wound and grieve and crucify him again? Or love, honor, worship, obey, trust, acknowledge, serve him?

Water Could Not Cleanse

By Amos R. Wells, Litt.D.

ONE of the most satisfactory statues of Christ is the famous one in the "Lady Church" of Copenhagen by Thorwaldsen. At first the sculptor modeled the figure with the hands upraised as in benediction, but at last he depressed the arms, stretching them out in an attitude of yearning entreaty. This is certainly the favorite posture of Christ: "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." That is one reason why he seemed to hesitate when Pilate pressed him for a declaration of his kingship; he was King, but he preferred to be known as Brother.

Besides, Pilate was incapable of understanding Christ's kingship, and was sure to confound it with the trumpery kingships he knew about. "King" is connected with "can," and Christ was "King" because he "could." In Damascus is an old mosque, greatly revered by the Moslems, over the door of which is the inscription, remaining from the time when it was a Christian church: "Thy Kingdom, O Christ, is an Everlasting Kingdom, and Thy Dominion Endureth Throughout all Generations." For twelve centuries that inscription has borne witness to the power of the Prisoner whom Pilate scourged and mocked.

King Edward of England was once passing in review a great throng of school children when a little girl was seen by her teacher to be crying. "Why are you crying?" asked the teacher. "Didn't you see the king?" "Yes," sobbed the little girl, "but he didn't see me." Here is the pre-eminent royalty of Christ, if Pilate could have understood it: that while the crowds see and acclaim the kings of earth, Christ alone, the Infinite King, sees every one of the crowd, and makes his presence and power felt. Pilate was conscious of those eyes upon him, and testified of the "just person" whom he delivered to death. By this reluctant witness he gave all the acknowledgment of Christ's kingdom his little soul was capable of giving.

"Behold the man!" cried Pilate as he presented the divine Martyr to the jeering throng. He did not speak it with a capital letter, as the reverent ages now write it, "Behold the Man!" If he had done so, he would have had a far different place in history. Sir Joshua Reynolds closed his magnificent lectures on art by saying, "And now, gentlemen, I have but one name to present to you: it is the incomparable Michael Angelo." Thus also the millions upon millions who now belong to Christ's kingdom cry, "Behold the Man! The one Man of all the ages, the God-Man, our Saviour-Brother, Jesus Christ!"

If Pilate's wife had been in Pilate's place on that judgment-throne, there would have been a different verdict. "That just man," she also called Jesus; Pilate was only quoting her. She dared to command the Roman governor: "Have thou nothing to do with that just man." Her dreams of Christ were truer than Pilate's daylight seeing. "At your age," said the great composer, Gounod, to a young poet, "I used to say, 'I!' At the age of twenty-five I said 'I and Mozart'; at forty, Mozart and I'; now I say 'Mozart.'" Pilate's wife was saying, "I and Jesus"; we may well believe the tradition that she came to say, "Not I, but Christ liveth in me."

It was John Randolph, that stout-hearted Southern statesman, who coined the word "doughfaced," and applied it to certain truckling politicians. About two years ago men were selling on the streets very amusing little faces made of rubber, which could be pulled and twisted into the most grotesque forms, never twice presenting the same expression. Such was Pilate, now seriously moved by Christ's matchless personality, now cringing before the fierce Pharisees, now ready to compliment Herod by getting his advice, now stirred in his superstitious soul by his wife's message of a dream. Set off against such a doughface, such a rubber-face, the spirit of bold Isaiah: "The Lord will help me. Therefore have I set my face like a flint."

What eternal folly, that basin of water and that futile washing of hands before the multitude! We are reminded of Lady Macbeth, walking in her frenzy after she had murdered her royal guest, and crying that never, never could she wash the blood from her hands. In the greatest of all tragedies Pilate is Macbeth, with all of Macbeth's irresolution, and yet it is he who held the deadly dagger. Down through the centuries ever since has stalked his desperate form, wringing his hands together and trying to wash off the fearful guilt. But in vain. For water will cleanse much, but the only cleansing of sin is in the blood that Pilate murderously spilt.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

Barabbas. There is an inherent tendency in unregenerate human nature to protect romantic criminals. The stories of Robin Hood, even though partially false, are a case in point. When people have lost confidence in the uprightness of their own courts and government this tendency becomes a sort of unwritten creed. We have in the Lebanon today a criminal who has been a fugitive from justice for fully twenty years. Guilty of many murders, he has eluded the officials, now disguised as a monk, again as a woman, a shepherd, a beggar, always welcomed, fed and clothed by some of his countrymen and fellow regionists.

Pilate. There have been many Pilates in human history in all lands and all times. The Pilate of Christ's day was a typical specimen of the man of the world. The good in him unsupported by moral principles, under severe testing was completely overborne by personal and political considerations. He knew that the Jews had delivered Jesus from envy of his place and influence among the people.. He knew that they in their own Sanhedrin had condemned him to death on a charge that could not stand in Roman law. He knew that the three accusations of (1) perverting the nation, (2) forbidding to give tithes to Cæsar, and (3) claiming to be a king were false in fact and form, and yet from fear of the turbulent Jews this vacillating judge has gone down in history as the man who permitted Jesus to be illegally crucified.

—MATERIAL FROM WRECKED cars furnished by the Emergency Despatch Car Company at Rochester, N. Y., was used by volunteer workmen to build an evangelistic tabernacle at East Rochester, N. Y., for the services conducted there in September by Evangelist George E. Burgess and the Gospel soloist, Benjamin F. Butts. The structure seated 1,200 people; the four weeks' campaign resulted in several hundred decisions for Christ. The young folks were especially looked after, Mrs. Butts being in active charge of that feature. From East Rochester these workers went to Wayland, N. Y., to conduct a campaign there.

W. A. S., Hamilton, Ontario. "Does the command in Mark 1: 15 [Mark] that God will not answer our gifts if our lives are not consistent to him"

"Repent ye in these words of Jesus we recognize that the gift will not be accepted. First we must come to the problem and then come and offer the gift. He is insisting that we respect purity God asks gifts. If there is something in our lives" he informs some will [illegible] that point. Someone a thief wishes to get right with God. He cannot do so by making gifts. He must make every possible effort to return to the rightful owners the property he has stolen before his gifts can be acceptable to God. In other words, we cannot straighten out by charity. Justice should precede generosity. There is something specific and vital about the confessing sinners of Jesus. A prominent New Testament pastor has a favorite saying: "Nothing is made right until it is made right." If God commands us to do one thing we cannot fulfill his requirement by making a substitute proposition and doing something else. He demands that we live on terms of justice and honor with our neighbors. He is so insistent upon this that he cannot be pleased with our worship or service until we have established our lives upon this basis. At every step we need his divine grace to help us be in a right spirit with our neighbor, and what is actually and not in his accounts. We must be careful not to judge others in this matter, though in many cases we know that positive wrong has been done. The final decision to your question depends upon what you mean by the term "unconverted." There are many Christians who are not what they wish to serve and there are certain questions and practices in which they differ from making their full consecration. While God is very gentle in such cases as in your case, gentle and patient. He will receive any persons and gifts, hoping that we shall soon be led to make the full surrender. The passage you refer to does not deal with this phase in Christian life, except so far as it refers to the matter of making right the wrongs we have done to others. In this there must be no delay. Honest steps should be no delay whatever. In making the complete, glad surrender to God which will bring us the fulness of his grace and put us in the way for richest blessings.

A. R. S., Fayette, N. J. The passages you mention (Matt. 12: 31 and John 5: 16) are interpreted by most commentators to mean that the disciples were empowered in a decisive way against accepting the gift of God and not as though the power were of themselves. Some suppose, however otherwise. In any event and notwithstanding some such person who never continued for a single minute and flatly and bitterly blasphemed the Holy Spirit as being possessed by Beelzebub or controlled by Satan. He refused to partake upon the conditions [illegible] and was suffering, and this could have been given by Christ to the multitudes of the people in the Authorized Testament of the Word. There is not a single passage to countenance anything contrary to the use of the gospel as it is practiced in the Rescue Church.

W. A. W., Pasadena, Calif., writes: "In Pan Christian Review of October 24 is an article about the Day of Atonement. My wife and I would like such a Messianic Passover seder. The one in question is the most accurate. It is easy to secure in the vicinity of Los Angeles, which is largely Jewish, or right from Chicago to Milwaukee. It is a question of expense, and we think it is important. Any assistance you can give will be appreciated."

Reuben Kinnard. It is right for people who are not in good health to be asked to pray for a special object as to practice of the [illegible]

A New Herial Appliance

This Invention Holds More Firmly, Comfortably and Surely Than Any Truss.

Sent on Trial

The new Brooks Appliance for rupture so thoroughly meets every test and requirement that it is ordered by the U. S. War Dept. and is recognized as the most reliable support ever invented. It is fitted with an Automatic Air Cushion which follows every movement of the body and always covers the ruptured spot. The cushion which comes in contact with the skin is soft, pliable gum rubber and clings closely, so that slipping is impossible, and it is cool and comfortable because of the constant circulation of air through it.

This Appliance is sold under a positive guarantee of money refunded if not satisfactory. We do not guarantee to cure any more than any doctor will guarantee to cure his patient. We do guarantee to furnish a perfect fitting Appliance, which will give the wearer solid comfort and retain the protrusion at all times. The purchaser is the sole judge and if for any reason whatever (which does not have to be furnished us) it is returned, the price paid will be refunded in full.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

FROM Columbus, Ohio, R. B. writes: "God is and has been wonderfully answering prayers in giving us health and strength for our strenuous labor, and is providing a way out of our financial distress. He has also made known his will to me in a particular and vital matter for which I asked you to join with me in prayer." M. E. M. writes from Talladega, Ala.: "This is the second time I have acknowledged God's answer to my prayer and yours. I asked for spiritual blessing for my loved ones and myself. God has come into my heart to stay." Mrs. A. A. D., writes from Dillar, Neb.: "I wrote a short time ago asking you to pray that I should hear from an absent son. I have now heard from him." Mrs. E. E., of Missouri, writes: "Some time ago I asked prayer that an absent son from whom I had not heard for almost two years, and who had not been home for eight years, be restored to us. Almost as by a miracle the prayer has been answered."

One of the sad features of the Prayer League work is the receipt of occasional letters confessing wrongdoing. In such cases the editors endeavor to give sound spiritual advice, besides putting the matter before the members of the Prayer League. Some weeks ago a trusted official of a large financial organization sent a request for prayer which implied that he had acted dishonorably. The editor of the Prayer League wrote reminding him that before one could expect help in prayer whatever wrong has been done must be confessed to the person or persons wronged. This man now writes that he has confessed to the organization and the State authorities and asks the prayers of the league for relief in this time of distress, that his mother and family may be spared disgrace, and that he be extricated from his difficulties.

Mrs. J. W. F., of East San José, writes: "I am in deep trouble. My husband, seventy-five years old, in a demented state, wandered from home on November 15, 1913. Please join in prayer that he be found." Miss A. G. repeats her earnest request for prayers for the mental restoration of her twin sister. Mrs. J. H. McP. asks prayer for deliverance from the morphine habit. Special prayers of the league are asked for a wife who has been driven almost to desperation by abuse.

E. B. requests prayer for a revival in a church at Zion, Mo.; V. B., for a revival in the churches of Memphis, Tenn.; Mrs. O. L., for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit at meetings to be held at Pleasantville, Ohio; M. C. D., for a great spiritual awakening in Whitefield, Me., and surrounding communities; J. A. U., for blessings upon revival meetings being held at Carterville, Ill.; Mrs. H. W. and Mrs. S. A. B., for Statewide prohibition in Ohio; Mrs. A. M., for special blessing upon a meeting at McCrimmon, Ont., and for a revival in the community; Mrs. R. H. G., for a revival at Mayo, Fla.; A Mother, for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the village of Port Kent, N. Y.; A. G. for stricter observance of the Sabbath and greater reverence and spirituality on the part of the churches; R. T. E., Fayetteville, Tenn., that a newly organized church work may prove successful.

MR. WATERS, secretary of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Company, left the United States on October 28 for Europe to expedite the distribution of money furnished by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for the widows and orphans of the European War. The trip will be accompanied not only by the ordinary perils of the sea, but by the new perils of war. For Mr. Waters's work of mercy will necessarily lead him near the scenes of siege and battle. The members of the Prayer League are asked to unite and continue in prayer for his protection while on this journey and that he may return in safety to his family, his friends and his work in the home land.

Our Great Book Offers

THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES EVERY CHRISTIAN HERALD SUBSCRIBER SHOULD READ

In Christ's Own Country

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK

PROBABLY no other living American has devoted so much time and study to Bible Land travel as Dr. Francis E. Clark, the world-president and founder of the Christian Endeavor Union. Last spring he made a journey through Palestine, and by special arrangement with The Christian Herald has written a very remarkable book on his tour entitled "IN CHRIST'S OWN COUNTRY," which he has copiously illustrated with photographs taken by Mrs. Clark.

In his preface he writes: "It was my desire to be eyes and ears and feet for my readers. Many of them have longed to visit the Saviour's native land, though circumstances have prevented them from making their dream a reality. I have journeyed for them, gazed for them, listened for them. I have tried to imagine them with me. I trust that our faith will be quickened and our view of spiritual things clarified."

This beautiful volume, which, in addition to its many illustrations, is pictorially enriched by a number of superb four-color photographs, will be hailed as a priceless treasure by everyone who secures a copy. It is the next best thing to making a personal tour to Palestine. The reader seems to see before him, with all the vividness of reality, the places where Jesus watched, talked, wept, discoursed, healed, revivified, agonized, and where He bore the Cross to the Mount of Crucifixion. It is handsomely bound and is, in the best literary sense, the last word on Palestine. There is a personal charm about Dr. Clark's story which few writers possess. He is a real companion, a delightful guide, a reverent instructor, and the reader who journeys with him learns many new things, and feels that he is making a pilgrimage that is well worth while.

"In Christ's Own Country" will be mailed to every subscriber, together with The Christian Herald for one year, for $2.

555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered

Ever had a question about the right and wrong of something you wanted to do come up in your mind? Ever find yourself unable to say just what the Bible teaches on some point? Ever had some little, seemingly easy question about some subject in the Bible trip you up and humiliate you before others because you could not rightly answer it? What is conscience: do you know? Has a man two natures? Does God send disease? Could Jesus sin? Who was the little child that Jesus blessed? Is misfortune a judgment of God?

You can answer part of the above questions; can you answer them all—according to the Scriptures?

For twenty-four years THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been conducting a chair in Biblical questions. Thousands of intelligent inquiries, addressed to this chair, have conveyed practically every phase of Christian living and Biblical difficulty in this time. Their searching questions have been answered by experts after thorough research. These answers are sound in theology, sympathetic in feeling and clear as daylight in their simplicity. They have helped myriads over hard places.

Over half a thousand of these questions and answers, covering in one form or another perhaps every reasonable question that may be asked in the realm of theology and morals, have been gathered into one volume. This book is a unique addition to Biblical literature. It will be found a handbook that the user will greatly value and love. We believe this book may become one of the most used of all Bible helps. It has been compiled with great care; it is published in attractive and durable style; and it will be given with a subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for $1.85. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Miss Margaret E. Sangster is one of the few young American authors who have made a sudden leap into popularity. In this volume of poems and stories she gives evidence of talents which promise to win her a very high place in public appreciation. There is a peculiar charm, a gracefulness and sweetness in her lyrics, showing that she has inherited, to a very large extent, the literary gifts of her distinguished relative, the late Mrs. Sangster, who was for many years the most widely-loved poet in the American home circle.

Friends o' Mine includes love poems, stirring poems on the war, on religion, on the home life, on the holiday season and on a large variety of miscellaneous subjects, the whole constituting a delightful collection of about seventy-five poems, covering a wide range of subjects. Some of the titles are "The Ballade of the Sleeping Princess," "Machree," "The Firelight and You," "The Question," "Lad o' Mine," "The King and the Beggar," "The Unreturning," "The Ballad of Happiness," "Betty's Bonnet," "The Terror of the Sea," "My World."

Some of the short stories in her book have won high praise from the critics. One leading editor, well known in magazine circles, declared that she had written "the best short story he had seen in a year." "The Onlooker," "The Punishment" and "Heredity," which, with many others, appear for the first time in the present collection, will be read with keen appreciation. We bespeak for Miss Sangster's book a very cordial welcome from CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Sent to every subscriber, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for $1.85.

for the teeth

"An ounce of prevention," etc., certainly applies to the care of the teeth. Decay begins in tiny cavities and imperfect enamel. Sozodont will keep healthy teeth healthy.

Sozodont tones, Sozodont whitens, Sozodont is delightful in Paste, Powder and Liquid. Your dentist would be glad to have you use either the Paste or Powder in the morning to polish the teeth, and the Liquid at night, because it gets in between the teeth and around the gums, stimulating and hardening them, and contains better than Paste or Powder.

Sozodont Liquid is whiter and neutralizes the acidity of the mouth.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

HOW TO MEASURE YOUR THANKS

How thankful are you for God's rich blessings upon you and your own home circle this year? May we suggest one way of measuring and demonstrating your thankfulness? Think of the hundreds of thousands of woeful sufferers in Europe who lack all the things for which you are giving thanks today. Make your thanksgiving a matter not only of words but of deeds. Put it into dollars and gifts for those who are suffering and lonely and sad and desolate in Europe. Let us send of our American bounty for their heart-breaking needs. How much do you? Put it down in figures, and send to the widows and orphans of the European war.

The Joyous Life

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Topic for Nov. 22. Joel 2: 21-27.

HAPPINESS and Thanksgiving Day! Surely they belong together. It is strange that we forget that almost the chief note of the Christian religion is joy. It is true that many things are said about duty and service. But these also have prominent place in other religions as well as ours. But the joy note, that is what our Christianity means. Our God comes to us bringing gifts. Almost the foundation word of our Christian theology is "grace."

Even in the Old Testament there were many glimpses of this life of gladness into which God wishes to lead all men. Our Scripture lesson, Joel 2: 21-27, is full of gladness. "Be glad and rejoice, for the Lord will do great things." "Be glad, then, ye children of Zion, and rejoice in the Lord your God." Many of the Old Testament promises of joy were accompanied with promises of temporal prosperity. "The floors shall be full of wheat, and the vats shall overflow with wine and oil. Ye shall eat in plenty and be satisfied, and praise the name of the Lord your God."

A beautiful verse in the Psalms touches the higher note of spiritual gladness, a gladness that is independent of physical blessing: "Thou hast put gladness in my heart more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased" (Ps. 4: 7). God's grace is not dependent upon temporal things to make us glad. Paul and Silas, singing praises in the Philippian jail; Peter, John and the other disciples "rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame in his name," the long line of Christian witnesses and martyrs show that no matter what outward circumstances may be, the Spirit of God can come into the trustful and obedient soul, filling it with gladness.

A joyous life? It lies here: First, to receive gladly and freely God's abounding grace to make glad our souls. And then to throw our lives away in happy service, passing on to others the gifts of grace which we have found, sharing our possessions with them and finding a way by which all may have access not only in matters of the soul, but in matters of food and drink and home and culture, to "the joyous life."

A Song of Thanksgiving

Epworth League Topic for Nov. 22. Ps. 103.

THERE is always danger of being selfish in our Thanksgiving thoughts. The keynote of Thanksgiving Day is that certain blessings have come to us; and if we are not careful that thought will grow to be that we are thankful they have come to us instead of to others.

There is a peculiar sadness about America's Thanksgiving Day this year. Last year when we celebrated our annual day of thanks the lands of Europe were rejoicing in the same kind of prosperity and gladness. But this year, as we gather to thank God for the blessings which have flowed to us down the streams of the months just passed, there is grief and horror at our hearts as we realize the anguish and destitution of war-swept Europe. Homes broken, fathers, brothers and husbands wounded on the battlefield or lying dead in unmarked graves; desolation, and want, and grief. So our Thanksgiving must be blent with earnest prayer that peace may return to the lands at strife and plenty to the homes and communities destroyed or sore beset.

We should always look upon our own blessings as things which will make us more helpful to others. And this Christian principle which has come to be recognized, at least theoretically, as the correct one for personal and home and community life, must be accepted as correct and even obligatory for international life. Only so shall wars cease. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD commented in its Fourth of July issue on the stirring words President Wilson spoke on Flag Day, touching this new note in international affairs. He said that the flag "is henceforth to stand for self-possession, for dignity, for the assertion of the right of one nation to serve the other nations of the world—an emblem that will not condescend to be used for purposes of aggression and self-aggrandizement—that is too great to be debased by selfishness."

Many eyes, formerly not specially interested in America, are now looking to us as a new world leader into paths of peace. When the European war ends we shall have altogether new opportunities to help the other nations of the world. We said that President Wilson's call to the ideals of national service for other nations was new. Yet our first President, as well as our last, caught a glimpse of this glad day when the relationships of nations would be mutually helpful rather than mutually antagonistic. George Washington declared: "My first wish is to see the whole world at peace and the inhabitants of it as one band of brothers, striving which should contribute most to the happiness of mankind."

Make the keynote of this Thanksgiving Day not gratitude that we have received blessings of which others have been deprived, that we have escaped disasters which have been visited upon others, but that our rich blessings give us power to be of service to other nations, to aid their sufferers with our bounty, to be ready, when the time shall come, to help in arranging terms of peace and to show the world the way to live justly, kindly, and at peace.

War and the Woman

THE fife and drum, the banners fine,
Spur on the men in warring line
Until the battle's lost or won;
But out in lonely hamlets wait
Those who can only guess the fate
Of father, brother, lover, son.

The Red Cross nurses gladly go
To ease the pain of those laid low
By murd'rous shell and gun and dart,
But science has no surgery
That for a moment can set free
A waiting woman's grief-torn heart.

The soldiers in the deadly fight
Soon grow accustomed to the sight
Of wounded men and ghastly dead,
But daily deeper grows the pain
That rends a mother's heart in twain
When children cry in vain for bread.

O God of nations, grant, we pray,
That there may be some speedy way
Of quieting this warring host:
And meanwhile grant thy special care
To war-robbed women everywhere,
For they it is who suffer most.

ALICE CROWELL HOFFMAN.

A REBELLION

Food Demanded

The human body will stand a lot of abuse but sometime it will surely rebel and demand proper food in place of the pasty, starchy, greasy stuffs on which it has been made sick.

Then is the time to try Grape-Nuts, the most scientific and perfect food in the world.

A lady of Washington says: "Three years ago I was very ill with catarrh of the stomach and was given up to die by one doctor. I laid in bed four months and my stomach was so weak that I could not keep down medicine or hardly any kind of food and was so weak and emaciated after four months of this starvation that my daughter could easily lift me from bed and put me in my chair.

"But weak as my stomach was, it accepted, relished and digested Grape-Nuts without any difficulty the first time that wonderful food was tried.

"I am now strong and in better health than for a great many years and am gradually growing still stronger. I rely on Grape-Nuts for much of the nourishment that I get. The results have certainly been wonderful in my case and prove that no stomach is so weak it will not digest Grape-Nuts.

"My baby got fat from feeding on Grape-Nuts. I was afraid I would have to stop giving the food to him, but I guess it is a healthy fat, for his health is just perfect." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

you've got o' mine, an' send me the rest of it where I'll tell you later.'

"Sanders gits up from the soap-box he's been sittin' on an' comes closin' in on me.

"'You're leavin' the 6 Bar J?' says he. 'Speak out, Brinker. I don't just fancy this game.'

"'Th' game's on the level,' I answer. 'You never knowed me to play no other kind, did you?'

"'That's right enough, but what did you want with hay?' An' then he adds sarcastic, 'Been goin' into the sheep business on the side, maybe?'

"I have to laugh at that, seein' how close he's come without the least guessin'.

"'Not exactly,' I answer.

"'Not exactly?' he repeats, very suspicious by now.

"'I mean I don't own no sheep.'

"'Then what do you mean?' he demands, his voice risin'.

"'I've been feedin' some sheep, that's all.'

"It was worth the whole thousand to see the sense of it begin to come into Sanders' head, an' the red fires kindlin' deep down in his eyes.

"'Where?' says he, chokin' back the storm inside of him.

"'There,' says I, wavin' my hand toward the sheds.

"For some seconds Sanders stood lookin' at me, an' I could see the tussle he was havin' tryin' to keep cool. So I went on:

"'They come from over the hill yonder. They're drove on by the blizzard, an' the herder's found later in a snowdrift with both feet froze, an' others have followed the lost sheep by the dead ones that's left along the trail. An' there's two thousand of 'em piled up against the fence, dyin' as fast as the Lord'll let 'em. So I cut the wire an' feed 'em. That's all. Ten tons at fifteen—'

"'Whose sheep was they?' asks Sanders, boilin' with rage.

"'Johnson's,' says I.

"He starts to swear, but can't quite make it. He gives up and begins a pet name for me, but I put my hand on the butt of my gun, an' take a step nearer him. I reckon he sees somethin' in my face that stops him, for he cuts it in the middle of an ugly word. For a minute he glares. His face is red an' then white, an' the fires of hell burn in his eyes. He grabs at his throat, an' clutches it, an' there's a snarlin' sound like a wild beast that's held. Then he breaks out in a sort of savage cry, an' his right hand drops swift to his hip.

"Then he does swear, not findin' the gun where it ought to be. At that he turns an' runs like mad to the ranch house. I could bring him down as he goes, but that ain't my game, an' he knows, crazy with rage as he is, that I play fair.

"There's a minute of stillness over everything. The sun is shinin' bright, an' a little breeze is blowin' up from the south, an' the smell of spring's in the air. I draw in a long, deep breath, an' pull my gun out slow, an' put my finger soft on the trigger, an' wait. It ain't many seconds till Sanders comes out of the house again. He don't try no trick on me, an' don't look for the best of it in no way, shape or kind. He comes straight at me, an' we wait till we c'n see each other's thoughts. Then it's all over quicker'n I c'n tell you. His arm goes up, an' mine, too, an' I figure on shootin' his gun out of his hand before he c'n use it. But there's three shots ring out, not just together, but almost, like giant firecrackers on a string, an' I'm amazed to find myself lyin' on the ground with a bullet in my left shoulder.

"This's what happened, provin' once more that no matter how fine an' proper you plan things there's always some fool buttin' in to spoil your game: Just as I've covered Sanders there's the crack of a gun off to my right, an' a bullet sings so close to my head that it burns. I duck mechanical, an' that spoils my aim. My shot goes wild, an' the nex' second Sanders' long thirty-eight downs me. I'm not so dazed but I c'n raise up on one elbow an' see Shorty Blevens steppin' out from behind the bunk house with his gun in his hand.

"As for me, I just fade away after that. I remember 'em carryin' me, none too gentle, into the bunk house, an' turnin' me over to Pete, the cook, who ain't took sides in none of these ructions. Then I go out on a long trail where it seems I'm a sheepherder searchin' an' searchin' for sheep I ain't never able to find. There's what Doc Pearson calls complications, but I don't know what it is till long after, when the trail at last brings me home again. When I look around me sensible I see I ain't in my own bunk. I'm in a room that's strange at first. There's a man settin' over by the window, an' when I figure out that it's nobody else but Sanders, an' that I'm lyin' in his bed, I think it's time I'm goin' out on the trail again.

"'Well, I'm blest!' says I, in a voice so thin an' squeaky I hardly know it's mine.

"'You're not to talk!' says Sanders. 'Doctor's orders.'

"I don't want to talk. I'm too busy lookin' at Sanders. He's haggard, an' there's deep lines around his eyes, like a man that's clean fagged. But that ain't what I mean. His face's most extraordinary changed. It ain't basalt no more. It's human. It's almost gentle, like a woman's. He looks at me a minute, an' smiles, an' then gives me somethin' out of a china cup, an' pretty soon his face an' everything dims away gradual, an' I sleep.

"When I'm awake again Sanders is still settin' there watchin' me. It's evident he sees questions in my eyes, for he puts his fingers on his lips an' smiles. I've never seen Sanders smile like that before.

"'You ain't allowed to talk yit,' says he, 'but if you'll keep very still I'll tell you.'

"I nod my head.

"'You've had typhoid on top o' that piece of lead,' says he. 'I never had no notion that you wasn't shootin'—as I was—to kill, an' I was all for lettin' you die out there in the bunk house till the boys come in an' tell me you're talkin' some queer things't maybe I'd ought to hear. An' you sure was.'

"'About sheep?' I venture to ask, very uneasy, for I've no notion of ever tellin' anybody about what I heard on the hill.

"'Yes,' he says, 'an' voices in the wind. You needn't be ashamed o' that, Brinker, though I laughed like a fool when I first heard you givin' yourself away. But that don't last long, there bein' somethin' else on your mind.'

"'What?' I ask, very anxious.

"'You talk a lot about me,' Sanders goes on, 'an' when it comes to that, I drive the men out of the bunk house, because what you're sayin' ain't for nobody else's ears but mine. It's reely funny at first, like the talk about the sheep. Then it's insultin', for I see you've pitied me, an' bein' pitied's bein' insulted, an' I swear that if you ever git well you'll pay for it. Then I hear somethin' that cools me down like ice. It's how you figured as I oughtn't to die before I'd had my chance to flop right or wrong, one way or the other, an' how you planned to save me. An' it comes to me like a thunderbolt that I'm only a lost sheep like them you fed on the hill yonder, an' that you've been sent to find me.'

"He stops, an' turns his head, an' looks out the window where there's cattle feedin' on the hill, an' a blue sky beyond, an' the white peaks of the Wind River Mountains in a purple haze.

"Then he leans over and grabs my hand."

"The Return of Pollyanna"

To Make Her Second Debut in the Thanksgiving Issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

WHEN ELEANOR PORTER wrote her great story of "Pollyanna" she created an absolutely new type in American fiction. Under the inspiration of "Pollyanna," who was the sunniest and most delightful of optimists, people everywhere began to play "the Glad Game"—the game that brings contentment wherever it is played. Just two years ago this month, "Pollyanna" made her debut in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, where for a whole season she played the game to fascinated audiences every week. When the story was ended and the curtain dropped over the game and its player, a great sigh of regret for the vanishing "Pollyanna" went up all over this continent.

Now the great secret is out—"Pollyanna" is to appear again! Mrs. PORTER writes from her home in Cambridge, Mass., in a letter just received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "I am sure I do not need to tell you how glad I am to get the story into your hands at last. I have taken a world of pains with it. You will notice that the story opens at about the point where the first story in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD left it. I have gathered that, interested as 'Pollyanna's' friends are to 'know what happened next,' they yet almost fear to see her grown up, so I begin the story with 'Pollyanna' still a little girl; but she is in Boston, amid a brand-new environment and among new incidents and new experiences. This has enabled me to introduce naturally the new characters who are to figure so largely in her young womanhood and her 'love story,' with which the latter half of the tale deals. I shall hope to hear that your readers like the story."

Like "Pollyanna"? They will love her, grown up, just as they loved her when she was the young embodiment of the spirit of right-minded childhood. Now she is coming back to us—more grown-up, more lovable. And it will be on Thanksgiving Day—most appropriate of all seasons—that sweet, joyous-hearted "Pollyanna" Whittier will return.

We will not attempt to tell, in advance of Mrs. PORTER'S own way of doing it, just what "Pollyanna" will do when she comes back. By and by, the romance of "Pollyanna's" life will develop, for of course there is a Prince Charming in the background.

If you have not yet renewed your subscription to The Christian Herald, send $1.50 today, and then you will make sure of not missing a single weekly visit of "Pollyanna," who will, beginning Thanksgiving week, and for many months thereafter, come only to the homes of Christian Herald readers.

Questions and Answers

F. G. M., Corvallis, Ore. In Rev. 1: 3, it is written: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: for the time is at hand." "Blessed," "readeth," "hear," "keep." Surely all Christians want the blessing; hence, we want to read, hear and keep these words of prophecy, but help is needed to understand. It seems to some of us that events have traveled so fast, since John received the Revelation, that doubtless we are at the pouring out of the vials of the seven last plagues (Rev. 15: 1). What do you think concerning this European war? May it not be one of these awful plagues of God's wrath spoken of in Revelation?

The proper Christian attitude should at all times be one of prayerful hope and expectancy, and of individual preparation and readiness. His "times" are wisely hidden from human knowledge, and this is well. The mysteries of prophecy are not to be solved by the human mind. Jesus himself warned his followers that no one, not even the angels, could hope to know the day and the hour of certain events divinely purposed. We are to keep them in mind and be prepared. Many learned men in the past have devoted themselves to the unlocking of God's secrets, but all have failed. Theirs was a rash ambition. We should be content to be watchful and to trust God, believing that he is faithful who promised, and that he will bring all to pass in his own good time.

Perplexed. Are the promises in the Bible covering man's temporal needs intended for me or for those to whom they were written?

Of course some of the passages you mention in your letter and some other similar passages were written particularly for the people directly addressed, and were promises of special help at special times. But there are multitudes of other promises of temporal aid which were written for all God's people. Such a promise as Paul's statement: "My God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4: 10) was undoubtedly intended for all Christians as well as for those at Philippi. Also the broad statements of Jesus about the Father's care and provision were intended for all trustful souls. Again, it often happens, as in your own case, that a promise made to a certain individual or group will come with special light and force to present-day seekers, and we feel, in our souls, that the promise was meant for us as well as for those who first heard or read it. Modern life contains many examples which prove that God still takes care of those who trust him. Many a mission convert finds that God provides work and support when he accepts salvation. God does not promise us riches. Nor does he promise to reward inefficient, careless, or spiritless work. He puts us at our best, makes the opening for us, then, as we live for him and try to serve others in his name, he sees to it that our needs are met day by day.

Mrs. S. J. C., Indiana: Our hearts go out to you in deepest sympathy at this time of crushing sorrow. But you will be surprised at what we are about to say. We feel sure that if you could see your little daughter now, could know where she is and what she is doing, and if the uttering of a word would bring her back to you, you would not utter the word. We do not minimize the grief and disappointment and loneliness you feel. But the very fact that you love her so much would, if you could know all about her condition now, lead you to wish her to stay in that fair land she has found rather than to come back to this world so full of heartache and sin. You remember how she used to go to sleep. Suppose you had not understood, the first time you saw her do this, how horrified you would have been at the thought that she would not wake up again! But day after day proved that after every sleep she would awake; so you watched her go to sleep without alarm or sorrow. Just so surely, when our loved ones go to sleep in death, do they awake in light and glory. Trust God, who is Master of death, as you trust nature, who is master of sleep. As to your disappointment, trust God for that, too. He will find a way of getting that music into the hearts of men which you had hoped she would make. Best of all, perhaps she is not so far away as you think. Sometimes the veil between that other world and this is very thin, and communication very easy. She is not dead; maybe she is not far away. She has only dropped the fair garment in which her soul was clothed, and taken a form that now, for a little while, you cannot see. Do not worry because our present faith does not give us power

Dr. Clark's New Book

In Christ's Own Country

A SPLENDID VOLUME EVERY CHRISTIAN HERALD SUBSCRIBER SHOULD READ

PROBABLY no other living American has devoted so much time and study to Bible Land travel as Dr. Francis E. Clark, the world-president and founder of the Christian Endeavor Union. Last Spring he made a journey through Palestine, and by special arrangement with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has written a very remarkable book on his tour entitled "IN CHRIST'S OWN COUNTRY," which he has copiously illustrated with photographs taken by Mrs. Clark.

> In his preface he writes: "It was my desire to be eyes and ears and feet for my readers. Many of them have longed to visit the Saviour's native land, though circumstances have prevented them from making their dream a reality. I have journeyed for them, gazed for them, listened for them. I have tried to imagine them with me. I trust that our faith will be quickened and our view of spiritual things clarified."

This beautiful volume, which, in addition to its many illustrations, is pictorially enriched by a number of superb four-color photographs, will be hailed as a priceless treasure by everyone who secures a copy. It is the next best thing to making a personal tour to Palestine. The reader seems to see before him, with all the vividness of reality, the places where Jesus watched, talked, wept, discoursed, healed, revivified, agonized, and where He bore the Cross to the Mount of Crucifixion. It is handsomely bound and is, in the best literary sense, the last word on Palestine. There is a personal charm about Dr. Clark's story which few writers possess. He is a real companion, a delightful guide, a reverent instructor, and the reader who journeys with him learns many new things, and feels that he is making a pilgrimage that is well worth while.

"In Christ's Own Country" will be mailed to every subscriber, together with The Christian Herald for one year, for $2.00.

"Friends o' Mine"

The Book to Charm the Hours!

INTRODUCTIONS to people Worth Knowing are not always easy to get. People worth knowing are folks little or big, who have Accomplished Something—or have Suffered something. They have had Experiences. They can vastly entertain us, or instruct us, or comfort or inspire us, as the case may be. And the author of this book in her inimitable freedom of style that puts you right at ease with her from the start, introduces you to a wonderful range of acquaintances, every mother's son of them worth knowing—to say nothing of the daughters, and of the mothers and fathers themselves.

This delicious collection of short stories, poems and unclassified literary delights by Miss MARGARET E. SANGSTER, contains the most popular things she has written, and many not before printed which are bound to be as popular as her best. We have prepared this gift book as a premium with enthusiasm all along the line, for we know it will never be relegated from the center table to the book case.

We do not care who you are or how young or old, we recommend this book to you with confidence. We want you to have it. You need this book if you are human and have human frailties and ups-and-downs.

And so we have had it especially printed in attractive form, and will send it to every subscriber, together with The Christian Herald for one year, for $1.85.

to raise the dead. Take these "better things" of the Christian faith, and find your joy in them and in the wonderful consolation and affectionate companionship of the Saviour Christ, who is near to you and also near to her.

Reader, Washington. Do you not think parents make a mistake when they show partiality to a first-born child and an indifference toward the younger ones?

This would be a truly frightful condition to be found in any home, and should least of all be expected in a Christian home. The only excuse for partiality would be when one child in the family is weak or sickly or in trouble of any kind and so requires special sympathy and care. It often happens that one child will be by disposition and temperament specially congenial to a parent. In such a case the parent should take special pains to be thoughtful, helpful and winsome to the others, so that they could not feel any restraint at thinking that one is a favorite. Kindness and attention to all and real comradeship will help the rest to come up to the parent's ideal. It is inconceivable that any Christian parent could be "indifferent" to any of the children. Almost the cruelest heartaches of life are those suffered by children who fancy their parents do not love them. Any mother who finds herself tempted to be specially fond of one child must exert herself to extra thoughtfulness for the others, and, in trying to make all happy, will find her heart expanding to give all an equal place of love.

Miscellaneous

N. W., Utica, N. Y. Belgium is a Catholic country, although there is a considerable number of evangelicals there, who hold Protestant doctrines.

G. C., Fairmont, W. Va. No statistics available on the subject. Write to the China Inland Mission, 235 School Lane, Germantown, Philadelphia, for information.

E. F. H., Gallipolis, Ohio. The divorce laws vary in different States. Consult a reliable attorney in your own town, who is familiar with the Ohio laws.

G. H. S., Furley, Kan. Servia is Catholic, although there is a very large Russo-Greek element among the population. The latter church does not recognize the spiritual supremacy of Rome. Archduke Ferdinand was a "devout son of the Roman Catholic Church."

Reader, Pottstown, Pa. 1. The major prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel; the minor prophets are Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. 2. Smith's Bible Dictionary and Fausset's Biblical Encyclopedia are standard books of Scripture information.

Miss C. H. B., New York. The language generally used by the Jews of Christ's time, and which he doubtless employed for his ordinary conversation and addresses, was Aramaic, a dialect or corruption of Hebrew. He and his disciples also spoke Greek, as did many of the lower as well as higher classes of Palestine.

Reader, Pleasant Hill, Ill. We are not to judge others by appearances. The people you mention may be very good citizens, although abnormal in development. Their condition probably prevents them from obtaining other employment. While their vocation is an unusual one, it is quite likely that they are doing their best and living good, moral lives, in spite of their surroundings.

F. W., Pensacola, Fla. It is related by certain authors that, when the Turks took Constantinople, they defaced and attempted to obliterate some of the paintings and decorations in the great church of St. Sophia, including a large picture of Christ, but that it is still partially visible, and might even yet be restored. We cannot now quote the authority for this statement.

A. J. W., Birmingham, Iowa. There is a wide difference between a legitimate contest, decided by votes or otherwise, and a gambling game. The contest you describe is not gambling. As to its propriety in connection with the church, however, that is a matter for the trustees to consider. We hold to the view that the church which gets along without such aids is to be congratulated.

I. W., Webster, Mass., writes: "I wish to state two reasons why I dissent from Professor Wylie's opinion on the present European war as being the Armageddon of Revelation. I believe the time for the Armageddon is at or near the close of the 'great day of God Almighty,' and not at the beginning as his article implies. As to the place, Revelation specifically says it will occur in the valley of Megiddo, and by no stretch of imagination can we locate 'Megiddo' in the territory of any of the nations now at war, nor can we come to the conclusion that the character of the battle is aught else than as described in the 16th and 20th chapters of Revelation, and we believe that all the events named in that wonderful book will occur in the order named therein. If so, there are many and great events to transpire before the battle of the 'great day of God Almighty.'"

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE WINNING OF A GENERATION

BY FRANK L. BROWN

Joint Secretary World's Sunday School Convention

KAMAKURA TOTS

NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR JAPAN'S WAR ACTIVITY—AND NEVER WILL BE IF CHRISTIANITY HAS FREE COURSE

PICK-A-PACK

MOODY has said that if we can save one generation we have put the devil out of business. The World's Sunday School Association is in the business of saving a generation.

And at this very time, too, the value of training youth in moral and religious character is being realized by national leaders in the Orient. Especially is this true of Japan. The people are idealists; they love their children and want for them the best in everything.

Upon landing at Yokohama, the one thing that impresses you next to the two-wheel, rubber-tired man-carriage, called the "Pullman car of the Orient," is the crowds of babies. This is Japan's best and biggest crop, for Japan and Russia are increasing in population faster than other countries.

These babies are carried in cheap and convenient fashion, on the backs of little sisters or brothers, held in position by a long cloth or shawl tied about the body. And both babies and the little nurses are wonderfully patient. The babies are fat, the red of their cheeks glows through the brown, and only occasionally do you hear them cry. They become hardened by exposure to sun and air.

These little nurse sisters will walk about with their loads, almost as big as themselves, play games of hopscotch, battledore and shuttlecock, and bounce balls. The handkerchief is an essential in the care of a Japanese baby.

If the child happens to be a boy, and especially the oldest boy, who must carry down the family name, he has a chance to get thoroughly spoiled by having his own way. He can do pretty nearly what he wants, and children in Japan are rarely punished. The wonder is that they turn out so well.

THE girl in Japan had formerly very little chance to know and to be. This was partly because of the teachings of Buddhism, which gave a subservient place to women and children, and partly to the plan of family succession, which required a male successor or an adopted son if there were only daughters.

With the coming of the missionary schools for girls in Japan, a challenge was made to the Japanese that had to be met. Formerly girls were not thought eligible for education. But the splendid type of girls turned out from the scores of Christian girls' schools drew the attention of prominent Japanese to the effect of education, and especially education under Christian influences.

On my first visit to Japan I met a missionary who was then on his way to select from a Canadian Methodist girls' school a wife for the son of a rear-admiral of the Japanese navy. A year ago I was a guest at Tokyo in the home of a wealthy Japanese merchant. At my left, as I sat upon the floor, in Japanese fashion, eating a Japanese dinner, was the beautiful wife of the merchant. She was too modest to speak, and I discovered by chance that she could speak English, and found she had received her education in a Christian girls' school at Tokyo, which she held in grateful remembrance.

A Japanese mother brought her two girls to a Methodist girls' school in Shidzuoka, Japan, saying: "I want you to put that polish on the faces of my daughters that I notice in the faces of the students of your school." She had noticed the transforming effects of the school upon the faces and characters of the girls, but did not know how it was produced.

MOLASSES CANDY VENDER

And now every avenue in education is opened to the girls of Japan, by the government, clear up to the university. They can teach in the elementary grades. Girls are found in railroad, postoffice, and telegraph offices. Formerly confined by social custom to the home, where they would spend their time upon the rice mats, doing up their hair in elaborate coiffures, stunting pines or plum trees, or arranging and bending branches for home decoration, learning how to serve ceremonial tea, or chanting in a plaintive minor the legends of old Japan, accompanied by the bewa or goto (an approach to our banjo), they are now in the open, modest as ever, but taking part in athletics, and feeling the pulse of the new day. These girls are reading modern literature, an abundance of which is being produced and translated. Some of this literature, in introducing the American idea of courtship in which the girl is given a choice in deciding her destiny, is opposed to the practices of Japan, which require all marriages to be arranged by a "go-between."

When the Sunday school tour party, headed by Mr. H. J. Heinz, was in Japan last year, one of the party, Miss Brown, of Nebraska, spoke to the girls of a large public school at Aita, and one of the first questions asked of her by the girls was in regard to American courtship.

AND there is a movement, with strong leaders, among the women of Japan, akin to our suffrage movement, which will doubtless result in securing larger rights to women, especially in matters of divorce and interests affecting most closely their happiness.

And let not people delude themselves that these Japanese girls lack courage, because of the pictures of the Japanese girl which are most frequent in art work. There is a quiet obstinacy of purpose and character in these girls which only awaits a test.

Many of you have read The Lady of the Decoration. That story was written at the Southern Methodist Girls' School at Hiroshima, Japan. Seven years ago, when visiting Japan for the first time, I spoke to the girls of this school about the call for their service as Sunday school teachers.

A revival sprang up in the school shortly after, and some sixty of these girls, many of them from strongly Buddhist homes, were converted and dedicated themselves to Sunday school work, going out by twos to teach groups of children from the streets, gathering them into the rooms of Japanese homes for this purpose.

A little girl wandered one day into one of these mission Sunday schools. Later she joined the school. Her father was a brewer and a Buddhist.

EARNING THEIR LIVING IN THE OPEN AIR

After she had recited Scripture texts in common with the others, she would go through the form of washing out the words with water. When, after graduation, she was leaving for the Tokyo University to complete her education, she found the teachers of the school had placed a Bible and a hymnbook in her satchel. At first tempted to throw them out, she finally kept them as a souvenir of the school.

At Tokyo she became a Christian and at the close of her education chose as her life work to become the Christian matron of a section of 2,500 girls in an Osaka cotton factory. She associated with her Christian helpers and is trying to atmosphere those girls with Christian love and interest. Her father disinherited her when she made her Christian decision.

These girls are the type of the real womanhood of Japan, and as the ideals of Christian home life shall gradually prevail in Japan we can look forward with confidence to Japan's future.

It is not generally known that 98 per cent. of Japan's boys and girls are in the schools, a larger percentage than can be matched by any other nation.

BUT the tragedy in Japan is that the millions of its educated young people are growing up without a sufficient basis in character. This is giving its educators deepest concern. Shintoism and Buddhism are not solving the problem. And with education the young people are turning away from many of the claims of these religions.

And this is why Count Okuma, the prime minister of Japan; Baron Shibusawa, Japan's great industrial leader and philanthropist; Baron Sakatani, the mayor of Tokyo, and Hon. B. Nakano, the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Tokyo, have, with Christian leaders, urged the coming of the next World's Sunday School Convention to Tokyo, October 18 to 26, 1916. They want to see what is the Sunday school, which stands at the foundation of American life.

The principal of one of Tokyo's large middle schools was recently in America. After visiting one of Brooklyn's large Sunday schools, going from department to department, he said, "I can now see the secret of America's greatness. You are enlisting all ages in the study of one book in order to make character."

"WE'RE GOING TO SUNDAY SCHOOL"

PUZZLE: GUESS WHO IS HAVING FUN

And the vice-mayor of Tokyo, in visiting the same school, said: "What I have seen today in terests me more than the forty-story buildings I have seen in your city."

So Japan is pushing on in Sunday school work. Seven years ago, when I went to Japan to organize the Sunday schools of the Empire, an association was formed, which now enrolls over 1,600 schools with an enrolment of over 100,000. About twenty books for teachers and workers have since been written in Japanese or translated. Great conventions have been held annually, and in Tokyo 1,200 Sunday school children were gathered in one Sunday school parade. That gathering sent a great Sunday school balloon over the city from which hung a streamer, "God is love," and thousands saw this balloon with its message.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Independance Belge

THE most singular newspaper being published in the world today is probably that which is now being put forth at Bervenop-Zoon, Holland, under the title of Le Journal des Réfugiés.

This is a two-paged paper, which started publication October 15, and contains, besides information more or less exact of the military operations in Belgium, hundreds of advertisements from parents, children, husbands, wives, etc., who are seeking by this means to reunite themselves with the members of their families separated in the headlong flight from their former homes.

Copyright, George Grantham Bain

DEGRADATION OF FRENCH TRAITOR

The spectacular event of the last week has been the battle betwen the British and German fleets in the Pacific, off the coast of Chile, which resulted in the defeat of the former.

It may be remembered that a few days ago the German armored cruisers Scharnhorst and Gneisenau were reported from Australia as having, through lack of coal, been forced to enter an enemy's port and surrender. This information, like much other which reaches us by the cable, was absolutely untrue.

These two boats were at the time off the South American coast, some five or six thousand miles from Australia. On this coast these two cruisers were joined by three other cruisers of the same nationality, the Nuernberg, the Leipzig and the Dresden. The German admiral in assembling this fleet, the individual members of which had been scattered all over the Pacific, illustrated the extraordinary uses of the wireless.

The Scharnhorst and the Gneisenau are armored cruisers of 11,500 tons displacement, with a waterline armor of six inches, four torpedo tubes, a speed of 25 knots and an armament of eight 8.2-inch and six 6-inch guns; the Leipzig is of 3,250 tons and 23½ knots; the Dresden, a sister ship of the justly celebrated Emden, of 3,600 tons and 24 knots, and the Nuernberg of 3,450 tons and 23½ knots speed, all lightly protected by two-inch deck armor, and, except the Dresden, which has twelve, all with ten 4-inch guns. None of these ships are new, all dating from 1904 or thereabouts.

After their union into a fleet, the fleet fell in with the British South Pacific fleet, consisting of the Good Hope, the Monmouth, the Glasgow and another vessel, called in the cables the Otranto. No such vessel, however, appears in the British naval list. She is probably a tender or supply ship.

The Good Hope, the largest of the British vessels, is an armored cruiser of 14,100 tons, has a speed of 24 knots, six inches of armor over belt and guns, and carried two 9.2-inch and sixteen 6-inch guns.

The Monmouth was also an armored cruiser of 9,800 tons and of about the same speed and armor, carrying fourteen 6-inch guns; and the Glasgow was a 5,000-ton unprotected cruiser, with a speed of about 25 knots, carrying two 6-inch and six 4-inch guns. The two larger ships date from 1903 and the Glasgow from 1910.

On sighting each other on November 1 the fleets engaged off Coronel, Chile, and the action resulted in the sinking of the Monmouth and the apparent destruction of the Good Hope, which, when last seen, was on fire and burning fiercely. The Glasgow and the Otranto took refuge in the harbor of Talcahuano, Chile, into which they were pursued by the Leipzig and Dresden. [An official English announcement concedes the loss of the Good Hope with all on board, but claims the fate of the Monmouth to be still in doubt.—EDITOR.]

The British loss of life is supposed to be about 2,000, and in all probability the Glasgow and the Otranto will be hereafter captured, sunk or interned. The German loss of life is reported to be nil, and it is officially stated that the ships suffered but little damage.

The effect of this action is to make the Germans supreme in the South Pacific which means that the commerce of the Allies there will be probably subjected to much serious annoyance, and that very possibly Japan may experience some difficulty in holding the miscellaneous lot of islands of which she has lately taken possession.

While these things were happening in the South Pacific the Van Dyck, a Lamport-Holt liner, running from New York to South American ports and two freighters were captured by the Germans.

But the most startling thing, looked at from the standpoint of the Briton was the fight close to the English coas between two small flotillas, which resulted in the sinking of a British submarine.

During the whole week the British had bad luck on the water. However, another week it will be their turn to win. The British take these things well, however. The London Times, in its leading editorial October 22, shows the old-time spirit and speaks the old-time language of the plucky Briton, who, being plucky himself, can admire the same quality even in an enemy, saying: "Until now the British public has been inclined to regard the cruise of the Emden with amused tolerance, largely because her officers have repeatedly shown themselves to be good sportsmen. The accounts given by the crews of the destroyed steamers invariably bear testimony to the considerate restraint with which the Emden does her deadly work."

Nevertheless, they are not altogether satisfied with the way the British navy is being handled, and judging from the reports concerning the manner in which the news of the German naval victory off the Chilean coast has been received by the public in Great Britain, this battle may have important political consequences to Mr. Winston Churchill, first lord of the admiralty.

Public discontent, we are told, has been steadily growing since the taking of Antwerp, owing to the way in which the British naval brigades were there handled, to the various British naval fiascos in the North Sea, and to the fact that the Emden has not been captured or sunk.

All these things, coupled with this latest disaster, are creating a sentiment in Great Britain which may grow strong enough to force Mr. Churchill's retirement from the cabinet. Mr. Churchill is a figure in British politics of more than ordinary interest to Americans, as his mother was a daughter of the late Leonard W. Jerome of New York City. There have been rumors of friction between Lord Kitchener and Mr. Churchill for some time.

As a result of the entry of Turkey into the war we now have three separate and totally distinct groups of fighting lines to consider: those in France and Belgium, those in East Prussia, Galicia and Poland, and those in which Turkey is meeting its foes. These last are rather scattered, and will involve the brushing up of much of our long-forgotten geographical knowledge of the Eastern Mediterranean and Asia Minor.

Dissensions seem to have broken out to a considerable degree between the two groups of allies. If reports can be believed, all is not serene in the relations between the Germans and Austrians. The Germans do not seem to hesitate to state that the Austrians are not making a very good fight, and the Austrians do not appear to regard with great complacency the transferring of the command over their troops from Austrian to German generals.

On the other hand, as in the Crimean war dissensions arose between the British and French, then, as now, allies, so, too, in this war there are signs that all is not harmony and union. The most important and significant of these signs is, perhaps, the recent speech to soldiers in the trenches by Joseph Caillaux, once prime minister of France, whose wife, just before the war, was tried for killing the editor of the Paris Figaro. Now a paymaster in the French army, his speech was bitterly contemptuous of the British troops and has resulted in the orator's imprisonment.

SERVIAN PRISONERS OF WAR ANSWERING ROLL CALL

On the Belgian battle-line during the week there have been several slight changes. The line last week ran from Lille to Ypres, thence to Nieuport on the coast. The coast end of this line has been considerably forced back through bombarding by the British fleet, which has worked in unison with the allied land forces, and through the flooding of the German position by the opening of the dikes by the Allies. As a result the German extreme end has fallen back till it is now near Ostend.

In all probability the final German position will be along a line joining Antwerp, Brussels and Lille. It would be folly to waste many lives to hold the country to the westward of this line, and neither its possession nor that of the towns included in it is worth much sacrifice from a strategic point of view.

The new point from which the Germans are launching their attack toward the French Channel ports, Calais and Boulogne, is Lille. This city has been in their possession for some time, although that possession has been daily, even hourly disputed. It forms a very convenient base for the projected operations. The line along which the attacking force will move is so far from the sea as to render the co-operation of the British fleet in the defense impossible, and there are no dykes to open.

The fighting here has been very violent all the week. Lille, one of the richest of French provincial cities, is said to be almost completely in ruins and thousands of lives have been lost. In fact, severe as the fighting was last week, this week's is said to have surpassed it in intensity.

On the rest of the line, from Lille to the Vosges, the fighting has been much more desultory. Rheims has been bombarded from time to time and some severe fighting has taken place near Soissons. In the Verdun-Toul district, continual but not severe fighting has been the order of the day. In the Vosges and towards Belfort there has been skirmishing from time to time, but no serious movements. The French offensive towards Metz and in lower Alsace does not seem to have been sustained.

On the whole, on this long line of battle the changes, except as above noted on the extreme western end, have been insignificant and the really important points remain in the same hands as last week.

The French government announces that it will probably return to Paris on the 20th of November, but this seems hardly likely to come about in view of the fact that there are German forces at the moment within fifty miles of the outermost Paris gates. The announcement is probably made for the purpose of encouraging the French people, and will not be, I think, an accomplished fact.

The American Ambulance Hospital at Paris is winning great praise on all sides. It is not only the best equipped and organized, but all its staff are imbued with American energy. So well established is its reputation for efficiency that the French are sending there for treatment, in preference to their own hospitals, all their wounded of high rank.

There has been the usual crop of rumors during the week. As usual, the crown prince has been killed off, and equally as usual he is still very much alive.

Both armies are becoming considerably hampered in their operations by lack of cavalry. The mortality among the horses has been enormous and the supply is running very short. It is difficult to see how this is to be remedied. Not all horses are suitable for field military work, though all or nearly all can be used for transportation purposes.

Considerable discussion has been provoked this week by the closing of the North Sea by Great Britain, but this discussion has as yet reached no conclusion. All of the American vessels bound for neutral ports, the seizures of which were made the subject of protests by our government, have been released.

The news from the Eastern campaign is in no degree favorable to the Germans and their allies. Unquestionably their attack on Warsaw has failed, as had the attack on the fortress of Ivanogorod. Three weeks ago both of these places were, it was stated on apparently good authority, namely, that of our consul there, on the point of falling. Today the German lines have been driven back almost to the German border, over a hundred miles. The causes which brought this about are obscure, but this obscurity only arises in all probability from lack of exact information.

Whether, as some suggest, the German left was beaten back by a direct frontal attack, or whether as others suggest the end was turned by heavy forces of Russian cavalry, cannot at the present moment be definitely stated. The result, however, is certain, though the means by which this result was brought about are not clear: the Germans were badly defeated and forced to a rapid retreat in which they lost both many men and much war material.

According to the fragmentary accounts which have reached us, the Germans were very greatly embarrassed in this retreat by the terrible condition of the roads over which their line of march forcedly lay. These are described as being rivers of mud, in which men and horses sank to the middle. Necessarily, therefore, much of the artillery, particularly the heavy guns, had to be abandoned. They are said to have saved the bulk of their forces, and to have reached a good defensive position on the line of the Warta, but this news still lacks any certain corroboration.

This retreat of the left wing left the German center with their left flank exposed, and no matter whether they are defeated or not in the fighting now going on, they will have to fall back to cover that wing. These retreats will constitute for the present at least a complete collapse of the invasion of Poland. Winter is now at hand, particularly severe in these northern regions, and it is more than doubtful whether this disaster can be retrieved this year.

In Galicia matters are moving a little better for German arms. As a result of the Polish campaigns, the

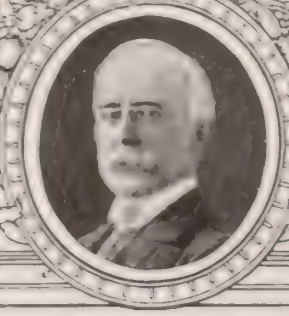
MAKING CHARACTER A SERMON



BY

Rev. J. H. Jowett, M.A., D.D.*

"Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Gal. 6: 7

NOW, I think the first thing for us to recognize is this, that we cannot sow an act and reap nothing. There is no such thing as a moral act devoid of moral influence. Every moral act, however trifling it may appear, possesses an inherent power. There are no such things as moral trifles. There are jots and tittles in rituals and formalities, but there are no jots and tittles in relation to moral law. He who breaks the apparently least of the moral commandments has abused the spirit of the whole law. We are apt to judge the moral consequence of an act by an altogether extraneous standard. I can recall a little couplet which I learned in my childhood: "It is a sin to steal a pin, much more to steal a greater thing." What is the principle in this? It is this—that the degree of moral sin is conditioned by the size of the occasion which prompts it. If you steal a shilling, that is bad. If you steal five shillings that is five times as bad. That is a pernicious doctrine, and it is pernicious because it teaches us that the most grievous sin is the outbreak of a great occasion, and that if our life be full of trifling acts it can only be atoned by trifling consequences.

Now, ordinary life is not made up of large occasions, it does not swell into either large external nobilities or into large external crimes. For the majority of us, life does not consist of startling tragedies; it is a level commonplace, consisting of obscure and unobtrusive deeds, and in that humdrum plane of a life moral havoc is wrought, not so much by stealing the greater thing, as by stealing the few, the light-hearted yielding to seemingly small deviations from moral rectitude and truth. The caterpillars in your garden will create far more havoc than an occasional visit from a mad dog, and what we regard as petty deeds in our life are often more tragic in their consequences than the occasional outburst of a fierce passion or a sordid lust. I want you to emphasize this great truth: that every moral act is possessed of moral influence, moral energy, which tends inevitably to shape our destiny. Every time we do a moral act, the moral energy of that act is, as it were, released, is extracted, and enters into our life. Our lives are reservoirs of moral force, and the quality of that force depends upon the quality of our moral strength. Our muscles become reservoirs of physical force. From mental exercises we extract mental force, which is deposited in the brain. From moral exercise we extract moral force, and this resides in the will. That is an inevitable law, and we cannot evade or resist it. We are storing up in our lives moral force, and we are doing this every day. Every little act, however trifling, pours into our life its own quota of power, and helps to create the central force. Now that moral force can be one of two kinds. It can reside in the will as a tonic, or it can reside in the will as an opiate; if as a tonic, it braces and fortifies us to withstand the solicitations of the flesh; if as an opiate, it will lull and benumb our resistance and we shall drift with the desires of the flesh.

The Law of Compensation

MORAL tendencies and drifts result from the impulse given by moral acts. Every act, by its own inherent power, helps to create a tendency. It may be that the influence of one act cannot be detected. It may not be appreciable, yet it is still there, if not patent, yet latent, helping to create the ultimate drift of the life. It is the combined impetus of small things which beget a tendency we cannot check. Our life becomes stored with their energies, and a movement is begotten which we cannot control. If we sow niggardly acts, we shall reap the force of avarice. If we sow sensual acts, we shall reap the force of lust. If we sow envious acts, we shall reap the force of jealousy. If we sow generous acts, we shall reap the force of benevolence. Out of them arise their corresponding force, which determines the drift of our lives, and it is left to us to decide as to what that drift shall be. There is a classic legend which I think many of the young people here will remember, of a huge cave which was said to be the home of the winds. Here all the winds slept before they are let loose to sweep over the lands. Æolus kept the mouth of the cave, and Æolus could let out which wind he pleased. He could let out a south wind, or a north wind, an east wind, or a west wind.

I think the old legend is suggestive of a great truth. Moral acts are the caves in which slumber the winds which sweep the human heart. We have control of the caves, and we can let out whatever wind we please. If we do Christly deeds, we let loose a south wind in our lives, a balmy, genial wind, which will waft us towards our God. If we do un-Christly deeds, then we let loose a north wind, cold and destructive, which will create a wintry, desolate heart. In the common daily life we are every moment originating the force which is to determine our destiny, and "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

Now we have seen that moral acts create moral force, moral habits. We begin with acts which we possess; we end with forces which possess us. Now take another step. We have seen how a moral act gives its power to form a moral habit; mark now how a moral habit tends to shape a character. Remember, we are speaking about moral habits. There are other habits, of an inferior and more local influence, which may color, but do not determine the fundamental type of character. There are habits which produce merely slight eccentricities of manner, superficial deviations from the common type, but to these I now pay no regard. The color of a watch-face is no criterion to its value as an index of time. The dial-plate may be most eccentrically devised, while the works within may be of the most sterling, regular, orthodox workmanship. So I do not refer to superfine habits which only affect the manner. I refer to those deep-seated moral habits which affect the inner life. A man may have a dozen eccentricities of manner, which will no more affect the sublime grandeur of his character than a few erratic dashes of paint will affect the smooth, regular motion of a fly-wheel. But it is not so with a moral habit. You can localize the influence of an eccentricity; you can't localize the influence of a moral force. Your acts combine together to make a force; the force exerts itself to shape a character.

Finality of Choice

LET us suppose that a man has, by many little and often repeated niggardly acts, acquired in his life the force, the habit of avarice. What moral results will such habit produce? What will be the harvest reaped? Think for a moment how complex is the life in which the habit is formed. Think of the heart flowers which cannot bloom where avarice burns. Here is a pure, snow-white flower, exceedingly delicate, and requiring just a temperate heat. Its name is conscientiousness. That flower sickens where avarice burns. Here is another, white as the wings of a dove: spirituality. That droops and dies where avarice burns. This is not exaggeration. It is hard, stern provable fact! Wherever avarice lies in a life as a habit all these glories of the heart begin to fade. Well, take out of a life conscientiousness, take out benevolence, take out spirituality, and what have you done? Why, you have altered the whole character! The presence of that one habit has transformed the life. It cannot be there and work no mischief. To be there means that it is exerting its blackening, blasting influence throughout the whole. Its fierce heat is incompatible with healthy, beautiful growth. It is marvelous how thoroughly avarice makes its influence felt throughout the life. It stifles prayer. It clips the wings of aspiration. It paralyzes philanthropy. It is a down-dragging tendency enslaving the mind, and holding in subjection all the qualities which were intended to rule.

I have read that "in some of the American lakes it is found that boats are strangely hindered in their progress. They are drawn downwards, because of the magnetic power of deep mud concealed below the surface of the waters." Now a vicious selfish habit in the life is like this magnetic mud. It lies in the depths of the life, and it pulls at everything; it drags down everything; it makes progress difficult; it makes doing good a burden, and charity a pain. Niggardliness in little things leads ultimately to niggardliness of character; its influence is pervasive; it freezes all the genial currents of the soul.

But now, take another example of the influence of habit in the life, and this time let it be a radiant habit such as we all admire. Let us take the habit of benevolence. Let us assume that a man has been so deliberately and persistently generous in little things that he has now acquired a spiritual force, a habit of benevolence. He has sown so many generous acts that he has now reaped a generous and benevolent habit or disposition. Now, how will such habit or disposition affect his character? Why, the habit of benevolence in the life seems to warm and loosen everything. It is the sunlight which seems to flood the whole heart. It creates an atmosphere which is peculiarly Christly, and in which it is easy for Christly graces to grow.

I am speaking of benevolence, not only in its narrower meaning of acts of giving, but in its deeper significance of acts of good will. Now a man who has got a good will, and a good will can be acquired, has something which will determine the temperature of his character, and will give color and warmth to every part of his daily life. You know that the Gulf Stream, that ocean river of immense breadth, which flows in a great, steady current from the hot tropics to the colder north, skirting the eastern American States, in passing through those colder regions, imparts its own warmth to the right and to the left, and considerably modifies the atmosphere of those western lands. A similar phenomenon is witnessed in human life. When a warm tropical current of good will sets through a man's life, the temperature of the character is affected; it communicates warmth to the whole. Think of the effects of good will upon a man's words, upon a man's deeds, upon a man's thoughts; why, it will chasten them and suffuse them with the spirit of the everlasting Christ. Avarice pinches and blights until it makes a Judas! Benevolence warms, loosens and unfolds until it makes a Dorcas or a John. This is not only true of avarice and benevolence. These are only taken as examples. Such is the influence of every leading moral habit. A habit lives to enlarge its dominion. It encroaches before and behind, to the right hand and to the left, and the sovereignty it seeks is the crown of the whole life. This is appalling Gospel for the man whose leading moral habit is a bad one! Your habit lives to grow. Cultivate it. It will surely, if gradually, lend its influence to the whole character, and in every part of your life the Saviour shall be crowned.

Brethren, beware of your acts, for they bring forth habits. Beware of your habits, for they bring forth character. They that have sown the wind shall reap the whirlwind. They who sow in righteousness shall reap in mercy. They that sow iniquity shall reap vanity. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

Strangers and Pilgrims

By Eben E. Rexford

STRANGERS and pilgrims through the world we wander,
Like exiles longing for their native land,
And all our longing for the sweet rest yonder
The homesick hearts of earth will understand.
Pilgrims and strangers, wearily we roam,
But in God's own good time we'll all get home.

Strangers and pilgrims! When, like souls benighted
We grope through darkness for our Father's hand,
Lo! just ahead we see the heaven-lamps lighted,
To guide our footsteps to the Fatherland.
Be patient while a little time we roam—
At eventide will come the gathering home.

O rapturous thought! Beyond the world of sorrow
Beyond the hills of earth where now we roam
We'll find the rest of God some glad tomorrow,
And all our dear ones, safe in God's sweet home.
Be patient, heart, till he shall call to thee:
"Come home, to dwell forevermore with me!"

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, November 22. John 7: 6, 8. "But your time is always ready. The world cannot hate you; but me it hateth, because I testify of it, that the works thereof are evil. Go ye up unto this feast: I go not up yet unto this feast." The kinsfolk of our Lord did not believe in his mission as Saviour of the world. Their invitation to our Lord to attend the festival at Jerusalem was meant as a challenge of his godliness: if he really was the pious person he claimed to be, let him show it by complying with the pious practices of God's people. Let him join the pilgrim throng, build with them the booths in the holy city, take part in the ceremonies at the temple, and help magnify the glory of the church. Our Lord declares all this worldly business. Strange, but true! The spirit of true religion had left the Jewish hierarchy, and the masses of the people had been trained to regard the mere outward performance of certain prescribed devotions as the all of religion. Worshiping God in spirit and in truth, as Jesus preached and practiced, they despised. A conception of the law such as Jesus had revealed by his masterful exposition of it in the Sermon on the Mount they declined. And that disregard of the letter of the law, which Jesus had manifested in some of his acts of charity, had roused the anger of the priesthood. They wanted docile worshipers, who never questioned the righteousness of the rules of the Scribes and Pharisees, and, by their submissiveness and dumb allegiance, helped to increase the power of the hierarchy. Let worldly men go and worship in their fashion. Jesus will have no share in their doings. When he comes to Jerusalem—as indeed he will—he will only stir up animosity, because of the truth he will speak unflinchingly and the righteousness he will do.

MONDAY, November 23. John 7: 16. "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me." On his own business our Lord finally decided to visit Jerusalem during the festival. He went "not openly, but as it were in secret." He did not travel with the multitude of the pilgrims. At Jerusalem he at once began to teach. The festival had already begun. The crowds were amazed at his teaching, and there was much questioning and taking sides on what he said. The leading church party at Jerusalem sought to discredit his teaching. Whence could he have derived such knowledge? they asked. From this premise our Lord's answer must be understood. He had not obtained his wonderful knowledge by a laborious process of studies in the schools of the world; he had not received it by tradition from some sage; he had not drawn it from any human source. It was not a mere man's teaching at all that he offered his hearers. He had brought it with him when he was "sent." Out of the bourne of eternity, out of God's everlasting counsels of mercy, a message of love and peace, of truth and righteousness has come to this poor world. And the bearer of the message is not simply commissioned like one of the old prophets to declare to men: "Thus saith the Lord"; no, the messenger is God's own Son. The Word that was with God in the beginning, and himself was God, has become incarnate in Jesus, in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. He is not a wise man merely, as the Jews thought him to be, and in that sense his doctrine is not his. It must be received not as man's word, but, as it is in truth, the Word of God.

TUESDAY, November 24. John 7: 17. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." The exalted claim which Jesus has just advanced as to the divine origin of his teaching can be tested. The great statement about his doctrine which the Jews had just received with their ears and the grammatical meaning of which they had grasped, may also be received by them with an inward conviction. The way to reach such inward knowledge is by willing. "If any man willeth, he shall know," that is what this text says. The trouble is that men do not will. "Ye would not," is the standing charge of Jesus against men. This charge stands against all who are born of the flesh. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them; for they are spiritually discerned." In reference to his salvation, and to the righteousness which is in Christ the Redeemer, natural man by his own reason or strength never puts forth a will. It is God who worketh in him both to will and to do. In the new birth, by faith, his will is quickened into life and does what the Lord here demands. This "willing" in our text is faith. The believing acceptance by any hearer of what Christ offers him for his salvation, the "doing" of that will which Christ proclaimed when he said: "Repent, and believe the Gospel," brings to the human heart a divinely certified knowledge of the teaching of Jesus, and makes the heart firm in this confidence that the doctrine of Jesus is of God. Many in our day face the teaching of Christ with doubting, halting, debating hearts. "How can we know," they ask, "whether these things be so?" Augustine well caught the spirit of this utterance of Jesus when he said: "Believe, and thou shalt know."

WEDNESDAY, November 25. John 7: 18. "He that speaketh of himself seeketh his own glory: but he that seeketh his glory that sent him, the same is true, and no unrighteousness is in him." Our Lord is still wrestling with the fatal notion of the Jewish leaders that his teaching was a mere man's teaching, that Jesus spoke "from himself," as their rabbis were doing. He refutes this notion by a commonsense rule: Any human teacher, sage, philosopher, who insists that men shall accept his teaching because he has said so, is guided by ambition of personal glory. Any one who in our day will take the trouble to study the Talmudical writings of the Jews will be struck with the selfishness, the self-seeking, of the writers. It is always: Rabbi So-and-so has stated, but Rabbi This-and-that says thus, etc., etc. Christ has on other occasions demanded acceptance for his teaching on his own authority. On this occasion he reasons from the viewpoint of his opponents, and varies the argument. He had habitually declined all personal glory, and had at all times pointed to the Father from whom he held his commission. To oppose his teaching, then, meant, not to detract from the renown of a man, but to deny Jehovah his glory. The common people, who were instigated by the Jewish leaders to resist the teaching of Christ, were led to believe that there were dangerous errors in our Lord's doctrine, that he was really a teacher of unrighteousness. The Pharisees actually raised the charge against Christ: "He deceiveth the people." Christ here tells them, in effect: If I deceive you, God deceives you. But there is no deception, no unrighteousness, in my teaching. It all tends only to the glory of him whom you ignorantly worship.

THURSDAY, November 26. John 7: 19. "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill me?" Ah, but had not Christ on a number of occasions broken the Sabbath law, and caused, or suffered, others to break it? Had he not healed on the Sabbath, made a person carry his couch home, tolerated the plucking of ears of corn by his disciples on the Sabbath? Surely there was "unrighteousness" in his teaching! It is this reasoning of the Jews that our Lord follows in his rebuttal. He tells them that the law which they have cited and which they are now in their hearts urging against him does not condemn him but themselves. They had emptied the law of its real import; they had been very punctilious about a few externals but had utterly neglected the great things in the law, righteousness, mercy, and truth. He had truly fulfilled the law; all his dealings with men had been governed by the royal law of love. He had exhibited to them the true sublimeness and grandeur of the law of holiness. And for all this they had conceived such a dislike of him, and become so angry and malicious, that they were now harboring thoughts and devising ways and means of murdering him. Yea, they knew of instances where others before him, e. g., David and the priests at Nob, had broken the letter of some law; they knew that their own priests performed labor on the Sabbath. They had suffered this to go uncensored. But him they must kill. Thus divine wisdom ever pricks the bubble of hypocritical sanctity and reveals the malicious cunning of men who, under pretense of fighting for God and upholding his statutes, strive only for their own glory and the perpetuation of their tyranny over the consciences of men.

FRIDAY, November 27. John 7: 21. "I have done one work, and ye all marvel." The last remark of our Lord about the intense animosity of the Jews against him drew from the bystanders an angry retort. They shouted that he must be possessed, to think that anybody meant to kill him. With sublime patience, the Lord passes this remark by. The ignorant masses who blindly followed their blind guides did not understand, as he did, the fell designs of the Jewish authorities against him. Refusing to notice the blasphemous interruption, he reverts to what happened some time before at the pool of Bethesda. The remarkable cure which he had effected at that time was but a small fraction of his wonder-working activity. They had marveled at the liberty he had taken at that time, and they had been amazed and dumbfounded at the sermon which he had preached in reply to their remonstrance. The claim of his divine Sonship which he had made on that occasion had made a profound impression on them. The marvel had not ceased, but the more they had reflected on his stupendous utterances, the angrier they had become at him in their hearts. Their marvel at this time is the marvel of impassioned men who are roused to ever greater fury by the defense which a hated party makes of his action.

SATURDAY, November 28. John 7: 22-24. "Moses therefore gave unto you circumcision (not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers); and ye on the Sabbath day circumcise a man. If a man on the Sabbath day receive circumcision, that the law of Moses should not be broken; are ye angry at me, because I have made a man every whit whole on the Sabbath day? Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment." Had the Jews—so our Lord argues—ever stopped to consider that the law of Moses, which they guarded with such jealous care, contained an element that was hostile to their view of the stringency of the Sabbath law? Moses had embodied in the statutes which he gave to the Israelites the sacred ordinance of circumcision, which was first received by Abraham as a seal of the covenant of grace which God established with him and his posterity. Circumcision must take place on the eighth day after the child's birth. If that day fell on a Sabbath, the Sabbath law in its strict Pharisaical construction clashed with the law of circumcision. But in the common practice of the Jewish Church, the former law yielded to the latter. Admission into covenant relations with God takes precedence of everything else. Not that Jesus means to discredit circumcision to the Jews, but circumcision attacked the offense of sin only in one member of the body, while Jesus, by the cure of the infirm man, had attacked it in the entire human frame, and made the poor cripple taste and see how gracious God was to him. Why should they be wroth at him for this act of mercy? Was not their view of his act of healing a most superficial view, unworthy of the principles that had been embodied in their religion? Bias and passion often warp men's judgment, causing them not to see the inconsistency of their mode of reasoning and wrecking the whole argument on the rock of inconsistency.

DENOMINATIONAL NOTES OF INTEREST FROM THE FIELD

—THE REV. HERBERT A. MANCHESTER, representative of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, and pastor of the English Church, advises the board that Rio Janeiro is in a state of siege. The price of food has risen so that mobs are stoning the shops where provisions are sold, and the streets are ripe with ribald shooting frays held in check only by the troops. Rio Janeiro just now, he declares, is the most expensive place in the world. An income of $2,500 a year would merely furnish a bench in the park. The poorest house possible for habitation could not be had for less than $1,000, and he had failed to find one at that price. Board is $5 a day each at the most insignificant hostelry with a very small room. Ships have stopped and passage has doubled in price. The city is thronged with squadrons of soldiers, and everywhere is heard the clanking of the cavalry and tread of artillery marching briskly by.

—ENCOURAGING REPORTS ARE received by the Women's Board of Domestic Missions of the Reformed Church, from the Committee on the Kentucky Mountains Work; especially the schools of the mission in McKee, Gray Hawk and Annville. One boy from their high school, now attending State University, was one of the five who had highest standing in the freshman English class. Seven of the students went away this fall to higher institutions. Normal class, kindergarten and domestic science classes have been added and the girls are doing excellent work in the cooking and sewing classes. The boys in the workshop class are learning simple carpenter work.

—THE AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION has received word from their missionary in Hawaii that in spite of the many hindrances, the work is growing. Two new chapels have been built recently to offset the new temples; Chinese and Japanese missions have been established on four of these islands, and the new branch chapel for Japanese work has just been completed in Korea with a Japanese evangelist in charge.

—THE LATEST ADVICE from China to the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church is to the effect that Chinese farmers north of the Yangtse are planting with wheat the fields where poppies used to grow. More than forty flour mills, recently put into operation, are now supplying the needs in densely populated districts all through this region.

A PEOPLE WITHOUT A COUNTRY

BELGIUM BECOMES THE SCENE OF THE WORLD'S GREATEST CALAMITY

[A cablegram announces the safe arrival in England of Mr. Terrell Waters, secretary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who has gone abroad to expedite the distribution of our Relief Fund. We expect early reports of his conferences with the American ambassadors here and on the continent, and with the American Commission.]

THE war in Europe has almost taken second place in world interest. It may reasonably be questioned if it has not entirely done so, for the world is threatened by a situation among the innocent sufferers of the war that defies the telling. On the battlefields men are deliberately rushing to their deaths, cheered on by a number of emotions. But upon the most reliable authority it is now known that millions, actually millions of women and children, aged people and invalids, face death by starvation and exposure as winter comes on, because their homes have been destroyed, their means of self-help taken away, and their natural providers forced to the scenes of war.

The CHRISTIAN HERALD Family began none too soon to gather a relief fund for these broken-hearted people. Now that the full extent of the need is beginning to be known, it is all too evident that to meet it in any measure every generous heart in the world must make some sacrifice.

In London there has been organized an official body, which arranges for transmitting foodstuffs into Belgium; it is known as the American Commission for Relief in Belgium. That commission has been asked by King Albert of Belgium to appeal to the American people on behalf of Belgium's famine-threatened women and children. "It is a great comfort to me," he wrote, "in this hour of sorrow and misfortune to feel that a great-hearted, disinterested people is directing its efforts to relieving the distress of the unfortunate civilian population of my country. Despite all that can be done the suffering in the coming winter will be terrible, but the burden we must bear will be lightened if my people can be spared the pangs of hunger with its consequences of disease and violence."

Reports from members of this commission who visited Belgium state that there are still some seven million people in that country. "In many centers," the report says, "people are receiving an allowance of little more than three ounces of flour per capita daily. . . . This is a question of feeding an entire population. The situation affects the wealthy as well as the poor. It touches every home in Belgium. Our experts calculate that in order to avoid actual starvation, Belgium must have every month a minimum of 60,000 tons of wheat, 15,000 tons of corn, 5,000 tons of peas or beans and a limited amount of bacon or lard." Such a bill of fare, meager to the point of privation as it is, will cost between four and five million dollars monthly, and there is no money in Belgium and no credit, and eighty per cent. of the people are unemployed.

Belgium is by no means the only scene of suffering. Wherever the war has hurled its armies there homes are in ruins, fields destroyed and industry quenched. In Northern France, in parts of Germany, in the west of Russia, in Servia, the extent of conditions similar to those in Belgium must be very great. No one can say when it will be within the power of the countries at war to go to the rescue of their own non-combatants whose sorry lot it was to live within the zone of actual fighting. It may be months. Presently we in America shall doubtless hear the cry of these other multitudes upon whom the winter is rushing. Surely the world has never known such a frightful condition.

BUT Christian hearts will not faint at the thought of such a stupendous burden to be carried by the charitable. American Christians who count their blessings at this Thanksgiving season will surely find that there is enough and to spare. More than enough and to spare, when such cases as the following make mute appeal for our aid:

Mr. Léon Houtekeete was, till a few weeks ago, a prosperous ship-chandler in Antwerp, with an English trade. His wife, a handsome young woman of the Flemish type, kept a clothing store, and there was a baby eight months old at home, little Antoinette, who kept grandpa company. Grandpa was a retired military man with a pension. They had a comfortable, cozy home, with a piano, phonograph, sewing machine, and a dainty cradle for the baby. Mr. Houtekeete's story follows:

We all knew of the probable bombardment of Antwerp, and I had laid in supplies of all kinds sufficient for forty days; potatoes, groceries, coal and wood. But it was pretty hard living, because for three days we had had neither water nor light. Still, I meant to stick it out on account of my business and my wife's. We had no idea of leaving. The big guns were thundering night and day, but we knew our brave defenders were at the forts, and thought they could protect us.

One night my wife and I were awakened by a noise different from any we had heard. It was a terrible screeching like a siren whistle. "That's shrapnel," I said to my wife. "They must be bombarding the city!" With fear in our hearts we took our bedding and the baby's cradle into the cellar, and stayed there the rest of the night. But it was very damp, and the baby cried all the time. The shrapnel went screeching over us, and through a crack we could see flames. In the morning we found some of our neighbors' houses were on fire, and two quarters of the city were in flame. A house opposite us was split in two. People were hurrying by with bundles, their faces white with fear; they were mostly women and children.

My wife and I did not stop long. We could not stand it there, not knowing when a shell might hit us, so we took $1,000, which I had saved for emergencies, tied together a few things in a bundle, just a change of clothing and a few things for the baby, and started for the railway station for Holland, where we had friends. But when we got there we found a mob of people jostling and crowding for the station, women being knocked over, and babies with the breath squeezed out of them. Then a railroad man told me that a trainful of people had just been seized by the enemy. So we decided to give up going there, but to go to England instead, and hurried to the quay where the boats left for Ostend.

There was a big crowd there, too; an iron gate separated the boat from us. The boat was a sort of lighter with side wheels. Some of the men and I climbed over the gate onto the dock, and the women threw over first the bundles and then the babies. We caught them all, and the women who could climbed over after them. They would not let us aboard by the gang-plank, so we men just jumped onto the boat near the bows and they threw the babies and bundles to us again, and we helped the women over. I must have helped hundreds of people on board that boat.

Well, the long journey ended, and we were in Ostend. They told us Ostend was perfectly safe, but an English friend warned us to leave at once, and we got off the next day.

We landed at Folkestone, England, and I can never say enough of the kindness the people there showed to us. All the houses in town were open to us, and the fishermen just turned over the contents of their nets.

Then on to London. There we were directed to a place where there were counters with sandwiches for everybody, and cocoa and tea, all you could want. You should have seen the people standing round them eating like wild things, and the children hungrily devouring the food. There was shelter for everybody according to your station in life.

But I couldn't stay in London, because men are not allowed to work there for fear it will interfere with the British workmen. They will do anything for you but give you work. They don't want the men to be about. I must support my father anyway; my wife can take care of the baby; perhaps they can get somewhere together. And I thought I might as well get right over to America. So we shipped from Liverpool, and here we are.

The writer found this Belgian family living in one room on the west side of New York, near the river. They were very courageous, but showed the signs of nervous shock. The baby, little Antoinette, cried all the time, and Mr. Houtekeete himself said he started at every noise. Everything was clean about their quarters. It is to be hoped the pair will soon find work. The aged father seemed the most pathetic of all. He was evidently stunned by the change and only the baby could divert him from his stupor.

REPORTS have just arrived of the receipt in Belgium of the first consignment of food purchased by the American Commission, 10,000 tons of cereals. The word flew from mouth to mouth. The joy and gratitude of these people, most of whom so recently were self-supporting and in many cases well-to-do, cannot help but prompt the utmost generosity in every heart. What can money purchase so precious as tears of gratitude from the oppressed?

Our fund at noon of Friday, November 6, amounted to $48,270.79. Under the stimulus of the situation as it now stands revealed, we hope to see this amount quickly doubled, and then again doubled and again. It is a time for every member of every family to take some part in this charity. Let your gifts come in as a family Thank-offering, to make some cheerless family group in Belgium hope anew. Remember that as you read these lines winter is fastening its cruel grip upon these unhoused millions. Remember that where the war has touched Europe it has left a wilderness.

In the fullest confidence in the Christian tenderness and the unselfish generosity of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, proven a score of times in the past, we appeal to you to do your utmost, every man, woman and child, at this time. His banner over us is love: let us lift it high!

Address all gifts to the Widows and Orphans' Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

After the Election

ELECTION day has come and gone. The annual agony over, the nation breathes easier. There have been surprises in various States, and apparently some landslides; but these are among the usual mutations of politics. The Democrats still hold control of both branches of Congress, although the majority in the House is considerably reduced. Progressives and Socialists are apparently a tie, with three districts apiece. Ex-Speaker Cannon goes back to his old seat in Congress once more. In 29 gubernatorial contests the Republicans carried 15, Democrats, 13; Progressives, 1. For the time being, the sun of Progressivism would seem to be under eclipse. In New York and Illinois the gubernatoral candidates who were expected to poll a solid Catholic vote both went down to defeat. Governor Glynn, Democrat, was beaten by Charles S. Whitman, Republican and Independent in New York, the latter having a plurality of over 130,000, and the legislature being Republican in both branches. The result is a signal defeat of Tammany, whose corruption was startlingly exposed by Mr. Whitman as district attorney in the famous investigation a year ago.

But the outstanding feature of the election, as a whole, is that the people are satisfied. For each party there is a measure of consolation. There has been neither emphatic endorsement nor condemnation of the President's policies which were before the country, although the reduced majority in Congress and the failure in New Jersey and other strong administration States would have been regarded, at any other time than an off-year, as a disaster. Yet, with a divided party and with voters more anxious for the country's business welfare than for party éclat, what happened might have been expected. The Progressives are somewhat comforted by Colonel Roosevelt with hopes of a boom in the near future and the reflection that this is an off-year anyhow. The suffragists, though they lost the fight for "Votes for Women" in half-a-dozen States, are encouraged at the "safe majorities" for the amendment in Montana and Nevada. Even the Socialists, who were hardly heard from in the general tumult, are surprised to find that in the Twelfth New York District—the very heart of the metropolitan East Side—they elected a Socialist congressman, defeating a Democrat who had served in the House for years.

And so the great day went, with its changes, its triumphs and its reverses—a vivid reminder of the fact that the people soon forget, and that the passing of a year or two may dim the luster of the idol of the hour and set up another in his place.

Turkey and Prophecy

IN the eyes of Bible students, and more especially those who make a study of prophecy, Turkey's sudden entrance into the arena of European conflict possesses a special significance. They point to the fact that ten nations are now involved and that, with the Ottoman power in the field, there is a very distinct parallelism between the situation today and certain passages contained in the prophetic books of the Bible. While much of this prophetic discussion is necessarily conjectural, it is, nevertheless, interesting. Certain passages found in the thirty-eighth chapter of Ezekiel they interpret to indicate Russia; "Gog and Magog" they identify with the Czar's empire and its ruler, the principal chief of Rosh. It is explained that "Rosh" (which is both the title of a man and the name of a people) was the son of Benjamin (Gen. 46: 21), while Gomer, Magog, Tubal and Meshech were sons of Japheth and Togarmah was his grandson (Gen. 10: 23). Further, so the modern interpreters assert, "Meshech" is Moscow and "Tubal" is Tobolsk. "Togarmah" is the Armenian of the Caucasus. Russia is indicated as the leader of an anti-Turkish confederacy. 'Phut" is the ancient Libya, which today is Italian territory.

"The king of the North" (Dan. 11) they interpret as referring to Turkey, while the power that is to come from the "uttermost North" is Russia. In Dan. 11: 44, 45, it is indicated that the "king of the North" and his armies will ultimately make their headquarters between the seas, in the "glorious holy mountain," i.e., between Jerusalem and the coast; there the Moslem power will be wholly overthrown. In its farthest perspective, prophecy usually looks to a remote climax. This is made apparent in Ezek. 38: 8, which indicates what will occur "after many days." What follows is interpreted to mean that the "king of the uttermost North" (Gog and Magog) will attempt to overrun Palestine and will bring an immense host there for that purpose, which will be miraculously scattered, only a small portion escaping the general destruction.

An interesting point in this interpretation of prophecy relates to Armageddon. Professor Wylie, whose article on the subject was recently published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, held that Armageddon was a typical world-conflict, which may take place anywhere, and not necessarily on the plain of Megiddo. To drive the Turk out of Europe is a project that has frequently been discussed in Continental cabinets. England and France saved him more than once. Germany, foreseeing the far-reaching disturbance that would follow the disruption of Turkey, has also stood for Ottoman integrity. Russia for almost a century has had an eye upon Constantinople, which blocks her path to the Mediterranean. Her opportunity has come sooner than was expected. And it is quite within the range of possibilities that the last grand stand of the Crescent might be made in Palestine.

Still, viewing the situation in its relation to prophecy, there is so much that is purely conjectural that we must be reluctant to yield assent to the conclusions of the investigators. One cannot escape the conviction that some of the identifications have a fanciful aspect, and that the conclusions are speculative. The very next change in the international kaleidoscope may upset all the calculations of the experts and make their forecasts valueless. The secrets of the divine purpose in prophecy are well guarded and no man has ever been able to solve them. Whatever the issues of the present war, we should strive to await them with humble patience and with the hope that this old world will be made better after its terrible purgation.

The Spirit of Charity

THE first of the American relief ships to sail to the rescue of the starving millions of Belgium is the Massapequa, which is now on the ocean. She carries 4,000 tons of foodstuffs. This, however, is but as a drop in the bucket, when we consider the vast needs of the millions of sufferers in whose behalf their exiled king has appealed to American generosity. It is a great task that our nation has before it, of helping these starving multitudes—the largest charitable crusade the world has ever known! People of all classes are responding to the appeal. This remarkable situation and the urgency of the need is giving to the rich a new vision of usefulness and of the real service to humanity for which their millions can be utilized. The Rockefeller Foundation, with its $100,000,000 at disposal, has announced that it is going to do its full share toward relieving suffering. With its enormous resources, it should be able to do a world of good. And surely money can be put to no nobler purpose. Let us hope that this example may awaken among our citizens of wealth the spirit of emulation, that they may have a share in this great work which has only begun. Other relief ships should follow, and the effect of the co-operation of capitalized American charity will be felt in the alleviation of untold misery.

But it is not a crusade of a class, but one that is open to rich and poor alike. Every right-thinking American, who is appreciative of God's blessings in giving peace and plenty to our favored land, should show his appreciation by helping Belgium now. The CHRISTIAN HERALD Family is doing nobly in supporting its own share of the work, and the gifts they are now pouring into the relief fund for the widows and orphans of the war will add new laurels to those they have already won on many fields of distress at home and abroad, through their golden-hearted generosity. May God reward every donor to the cause! We may soon expect to hear that great things are being accomplished through these means, and we shall look confidently for greater things to follow.

Wholesome Religion

MANY people would be utterly surprised if they should go to the New Testament, especially the Gospel of Mark, with their minds wiped clear of the accumulation of misconceptions which have arisen about Christ. The church, aided by mistaken artists and poets, has produced multitudes of hesitant, introspective, anxious-minded, weakly people, with utterly false ideals of sainthood. Early centuries produced the "pillar saints," living their crazy, detached life atop the ridiculous pillars they had built heavenward. Later centuries gave us the cloisters with their sorrows, failures and crimes. Today we have the worrisome saints, wearing their religion as the monks of other days wore their hair shirts, refusing joy to themselves and hindering others from finding it.

Is this what it means to follow Christ? Read the New Testament and see. Vigorous, glad, hopeful, helpful, sometimes indignant, always just, tremendously in earnest about destroying things that were wrong and building up what was right, mingling closely with people, talking with them about their tasks of life as well as their hopes of heaven, lifting their burdens, healing their heartaches, blessing their children, eating with them at their homes, worshiping with them in their synagogues, showing the world what it means to be a Man as well as announcing that he had come to reveal the nature of God—that was Jesus.

Follow Him? Yes. In paths of glad and strenuous service, and in joy and health, in self-forgetfulness and cheer, in fearlessness, in faith, in firmness. Shall we help to perpetuate the misconceptions men have about him? Shall we not rediscover him in his Gospel, readmit him to our lives and announce to the world the continued presence of a strengthening, gladdening, fear-dispelling Saviour?

The Return of Pollyanna

TAKE away frowns. Draw up the window shades. Put down the worries. Stop fidgeting, and disagreeing, and grumbling. Cheer up, everybody! Pollyanna has come back!

Just as sweet, just as winsome, just as irresistible just—herself, Pollyanna returns to her thousand thousand friends.

Next week's CHRISTIAN HERALD will contain the first instalment of Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter's unbelievably excellent and charming sequel to Pollyanna. Mrs. Porter writes to the editor:

"I am sure I do not need to tell you how glad I am to get the story in your hands at last. I have taken a world of pains with it. You will notice that the story opens at about the point where the first story in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD left it. I have gathered that, interested as Pollyanna's friends are to know what happened next, they almost fear to see her grown up, so I begin the story with Pollyanna still a girl; but she is in Boston, amid a brand-new environment and among new incidents and new experiences. This has enabled me to introduce naturally the new characters, who are to figure so largely in her young womanhood and her love story, with which the latter half of the tale deals.

Isn't this an alluring prospect? Get ready to welcome Pollyanna. Send in your renewals to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD now, receiving for $1.50, the price of a year's subscription, all the remaining issues for 1914, and all of 1915. Pollyanna's visit will last through the winter, and well through the spring. Tell your friends about it. Get them to pay her fare to their own home—$1.50 wherever you live. And she will bring with her all the other excellent and helpful features of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—BY PROHIBITING THE MANUFACTURE and sale of vodka and other alcoholic drinks, the Russian Government, which had a monopoly of the liquor traffic, surrenders an annual revenue of 700,000,000 rubles, or one-fourth of the entire national budget. A graduated income tax and taxes on various commodities are expected to supply the deficiency.

—THAT TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND DEATHS are caused annually in the United States through the excessive use of drugs and medical remedies taken without the advice of a regular physician, is the startling statement made in a bulletin just issued by the Federal Public Health Service. Yet it is the fatuous notion of those beginning the drug habit that "they can stop whenever they please."

—THE GIFT OF A RESIDENCE for American women teachers at St. Hilda's School, Wuchang, China, has just been made to the Episcopal Board of Foreign Missions by an American who, while traveling in that country, became deeply impressed by the need for proper housing for the splendid staff of foreign workers.

—AS AN INDICATION OF THE widespread disturbance of prices caused by the war, a veteran missionary in Ceylon, Rev. A. S. Paynter, of Mahagastotta, Nuwara Eliya, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "The price of nearly all foodstuffs has risen enormously—some as much as 50 per cent. Our missionaries have already given up articles of food which many would regard as necessaries. The need of the Indian workers is so great that they themselves are living chiefly on bread and water, the bread being portioned out at so many slices a meal." This is indeed a world-wide conflict.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

Dakota Indian Bible Student

AMOS E. ONEROAD, a full-blooded Dakota Indian, is a student in the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York, preparing to go back to South Dakota for Christian work among his tribe. There have been numerous chiefs among the ancestors of Mr. Oneroad. Gingling Cloud, his maternal great-grandfather, was the chief of the Dakotas. His grandfather was one of the thirty-eight Indians who signed the treaty of 1867. He then became a government scout. His name was Wakarto. The young man wears the clothes of the white man, but has the features and characteristics of the genuine Indian. He is proud of his race and his soul is all on fire with a desire to bring his own people into the light of the Gospel. There are 20,303 Indians in South Dakota and many more in the neighboring States. The people to whom young Mr. Oneroad will go back with the Gospel of Christ are not devoid of religion. They believe in God as the "Great Spirit," and in a future life in the "Happy Hunting Ground." But they also believe in many other spirits, good and evil. The secret of the young Indian's ministry is that his mother was converted to Christianity and sent her son to a mission near his father's farm in South Dakota, and she is still a sacred influence behind him in his divine calling. This Indian's character and mission call to mind the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of the race as declared by the apostle: "And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." (Acts 17: 26.)

At 101 Still Active

MRS. HESTER PULLEN, the oldest resident of Westchester County, New York, celebrated her 101st birthday at the home of her daughter, Mrs. E. R. Phelps, in White Plains recently. Mrs. Pullen is active in body able to go up and down stairs without assistance, and has her mental faculties preserved in a remarkable degree. She takes a vital interest in all local affairs and in the questions of the day in this country and throughout the world. Relatives and friends assembled with flowers and gifts to celebrate her birthday and to congratulate her on her long and useful life. This republic was in its infancy when this woman was born. Most of the inventions that have multiplied the conveniences of civilized living were then unknown. Her life measured the greatest material progress of the centuries and the most significant religious advancement of the generations. How much such humble, modest, industrious and virtuous lives have had to do with the progress of church and state no tongue can tell nor arithmetic compute. Mrs. Pullen was within nineteen years of the age of Moses when he died, and has the physical vigor which is thus attributed to the lawgiver: "And Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died; his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." (Deut. 34: 7.)

Largest Organ in Country

UNDER construction at Hartford, Conn., is an organ which will be the largest in this country and one of the three largest in the world. It is being built for the Panama Exposition in San Francisco, and will cost $60,000. In the organ are 118 speaking stops and about 7,000 pipes. The console will contain four manuals, the swell, solo, choir and great organs. In the tower of the hall, 200 feet away from the key-desk, will be an echo organ of nine hundred beautiful solo stops, which may be played from either the solo or choir organs. Probably the most massive stops ever constructed will be the thirty-two-foot open diapason on this instrument. There is also a thirty-two foot metal open diapason stop. The largest pipe is thirty-eight feet in length and twenty inches in diameter. Daily organ recitals will be held and choral and orchestral exercises will be accompanied. The organ, in simpler form, but with the same principle, was used in olden times and among the Jews as a musical instrument in their religious services. "Praise him with stringed instruments and organs." (Ps. 150: 4.)

School of Philosophy Dedicated

THE Cornelius Baker School of Philosophy, erected for New York University by Mrs. John S. Kennedy as a memorial to her father, was dedicated at University Heights on November 2. The building, with its colonnade, completes the dominating group of the campus. Cornelius Baker, in whose memory it was built, was one of the founders of the university. Rev. Dr. A. F. Schauffler made the presentation address, Chancellor E. E. Brown accepted the gift, Rev. Dr. J. H. Jowett made the dedicatory address, and Chancellor Emeritus H. M. MacCracken offered the prayer. Dr. Jowett, among other things, said: "A hall of philosophy is more than a temple of dreams. Philosophy cannot be isolated from the practical life. We are having plentiful evidence just now in many countries as to how the philosophies of our universities steal like subtle spirits through a state, settling the policies and ambitions and empires and commonwealths." Our institutions of learning are in obedience to this instruction: "Get wisdom; get understanding." (Prov. 4: 5.)

OPIUM AND PIPES DESTROYED

THE authorities of Los Angeles, Calif., raided the Chinese dens, and captured thirty-five thousand dollars' worth of opium, pipes, etc., and taking the whole outfit into the Old Plaza set a match to it, and sent it up in smoke. Included in the layouts was the gold-incrusted pipe of an old Chinaman named Lim Too, who had smoked it for seventy-five consecutive years, and who, when his pipe was confiscated, gladly offered a reward of a thousand dollars in gold for its return to him. It is believed that there are thirty million habitual users of opium in the world, and the sallow-faced army with beclouded intellect and unsteady step marches to an untimely grave. Fortunately this wholesale massacre is being greatly reduced by the laws of nations. The ruin of the body and mind was so great in China that the conscience and law of the nation began by heroic measures to attempt the destruction of the opium traffic and habit in ten years. The great nation under the impulse of self-preservation, and of hatred of wrong, will soon have entirely abolished the growth, sale, or use of opium. The destruction of the opium and pipes in California and the opium trade elsewhere reminds us of the One who came to destroy not only the outer results of wrong, but also to banish the evil spirit which produces them. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." (I John. 3: 8.)

Darwin's Evolution Theory Denied

THE British Association for the Advancement of Science recently held its annual session at Melbourne, Australia. Despite the fearful conflict of war the delegates went on with their peaceful investigation of science with as much calmness as Archimedes manifested in solving a mathematical problem while the bloody Roman swords were thrust into his face. One of the important features of the convention was the blunt denial of Darwin's theory of evolution. Professor William Bateson, in his presidential address, said Darwin's famous theory, that natural selection, or the survival of the fittest, is the great motive force in evolutionary advance, was out of date and scientifically discredited. He said: "Modern research lends not the smallest encouragement or sanction to the view that gradual evolution occurs by the transformation of masses of individuals, though that fancy has fixed itself on the popular imagination. Almost the last shred of this error with which Victorian philosophy loved to clothe the theory of evolution has been destroyed. Those who would proclaim that whatever is right must hereafter base their faith on superstition and not on demonstrated scientific fact. The variations which result in evolutional changes all lie hidden in the living germs of things and are not added from without by the effects of experience and environment." The members of the convention said the theory of social and moral evolution was contradicted by the war in Europe, in which, after thousands of years of development, millions of men are killing their brothers as wickedly as the first man born on the earth murdered his brother. There are theories of development that involve the divine element that are Scriptural, but the atheistical theory of development that so many scholars and Christian ministers adopted so readily is being proven by the highest scholarship to be as unscientific as it is unscriptural. Degeneration is the law of the human heart, as the European war illustrates. The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. When the life of God touches it in regenerating power, then "evolution"—the development of the spiritual life—begins. "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." (John 3: 7.)

Silk Culture in Philippines

A VERY interesting experiment has been going on during the last half-dozen years in the Philippine Islands, in the development of silk culture. The Bureau of Science of the islands has made careful experiments to test the adaptability of these insects to the conditions of climate, altitude, food supply, disease, and natural enemies found in the archipelago and the practical methods of starting and maintaining a silk farm. The Filipinos are peculiarly adapted to silk culture, so the Scientific Bureau thinks that the women, with their patience and attention to details, will take good care of the worms, and that the men will successfully cultivate the mulberry trees. "She maketh herself coverings of tapestry; her clothing is silk and purple." (Prov. 31: 22.)

Telephone Listeners Rebuked

A SIMPLE little device has just been completed and will presently be put into general use on party lines which is expected to detect the eavesdropper. It can be applied to any telephone. It is a small disc which connects with a keynote tongue and whenever the receiver is lifted from the hook the sound is heard by "central." As each 'phone on the party line has its own keynote, it only remains to recognize the tone to identify the culprit. The little tell-tale disc will be something of a killjoy to those gossips who have a keen delight in surreptitiously learning all the news of the neighborhood over the 'phone, who remind us in a roundabout way of the Athenians who "spend their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing." (Acts 17: 21.)

PRESENT STATUS OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE

The Anti-Suffrage View

By Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge

[illegible]

IN THESE [illegible] days, all our ideas of relative values must be adjusted, and the change has come so quickly that the task is a most difficult one.

In the first message which the President sent to the American people after war was declared in Europe, he said that the greatest thing the people could do for their country was to remain calm and self-controlled, going about their usual tasks, thus conserving not only the present, but the future of the country. This appeal for sanity and common sense was made not only to the men but to the women citizens. Politics for men are sufficiently irritating to the nerves under ordinary conditions, but are more so at a time like this. Women in politics are under a greater strain because of their higher nervous organization and emotionalism.

It would seem as though both the suffragists and the anti-suffragists should have adjusted their political activity to the present conditions and, if possible, have declared a truce, in order to give their service and money to lines of work of more importance, it seems to us, than "Votes for Women." No such truce has been possible because of the continued activities of the suffragists.

Projected into this battle between the women of contending opinions has been the extraordinary action of the National Woman Suffrage Association in blacklisting eighteen members of Congress, primarily for their opposition to woman suffrage, incidentally, in some cases, because of their alleged opposition to two social welfare bills introduced into Congress; and the action of the Congressional Union in boycotting the Democratic Party in the woman suffrage States because that party, in the present session of Congress, has not endorsed a woman suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution. Some of the conservative suffragists, who have the clear vision to recognize the injury to a cause in which they sincerely believe, by this "pernicious political activity," deprecate such action, but are obliged to follow the policies of their leaders.

The importance of the National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage has greatly increased during the past year. The injection of woman suffrage as a live political issue, through Congress, and the methods used by some of the suffrage leaders have made both men and women realize the gravity of the question. Men, whether politicians or not, are beginning to acknowledge that the question is one which must be treated seriously and are evincing a willingness to listen to both sides, which was greatly lacking a year ago. Much against our will and with great sacrifice we anti-suffragists are forced into politics temporarily, so that we may help the womanhood of this country to keep out of politics permanently, our chief contention being that enforced political activity for women would be detrimental both to woman and the State.

Our national organization is now composed of associations in twenty-one States. In five of them, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota and Ohio, the question of woman suffrage will be decided this month. In four of them, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, a bill providing for a woman suffrage amendment to the constitution of the state has been passed by one legislature and undoubtedly will be passed by the second one, thus putting these States on the list of campaign States of 1915. Until eight months ago there was an active association opposed to woman suffrage in only one of the campaign States of this year, Ohio, which gave a majority against woman suffrage in 1912 of 87,000. This organization has been enlarged and strengthened by activity all over the State and the ambition of its officers is to make that former majority even larger.

In the four Northwestern States, new organizations have been recently formed, headed by women foremost in their communities for their intelligence, sanity and breadth of vision and for their active work in social reforms. Surrounded as these States are by suffrage States, the men have shown a firm determination to hear our side of the question and we feel that all we need to ensure victory is to get our arguments in the hands of the voters. The difficulty of reaching them in these States of wide area is almost insurmountable, hampered as we are for lack of speakers and funds.

Suffragists seem to have changed their line of argument and are now asking for enfranchisement as a matter of justice to women, omitting their appeal that the men need only to consult the records of the woman suffrage States to be convinced that woman suffrage has been a pronounced success. The comparison between the laws of these States and the male-suffrage States has been a failure, for it has proved that woman suffrage is not necessary for the making of good laws for the protection of women and children, as the best laws are on the statute books of the male suffrage States. Another change in the trend of the suffrage arguments is the assertion of the president of the National Woman Suffrage Association that "just what the position of women voters upon the liquor problem will be has never been guessed, much less stated by the suffrage associations. The opinions of individual suffragists are as varied as are those of an equal number of anti-suffragists, but suffragists, as a whole, are in no sense responsible for individual opinions."

The suffragists now issue from their platforms a statement which the anti-suffragists have always used, and that is that there are nine States with full suffrage for women and only one of them has prohibition, Kansas, which had been dry for years before woman suffrage carried. Of all the ten prohibition States, none have full suffrage for women. Continued attacks of affiliation with liquor interests are being made against the National Association in spite of a sworn statement sent out in my official capacity that the National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage has never received nor will it receive any assistance, financial or otherwise, from the so-called liquor interests. It would seem as though where arguments fail, unproved accusations are made in hope that they may succeed.

The women of the South have not needed to take an interest in either side of the suffrage question, because it has not come within the circle of their interests. Since the discussion of a Federal amendment, however, they have begun to consider the effect of such action as influenced by their local conditions. A large association has been formed in Macon, Georgia, and there has been one in Virginia for several years. In response to the appeal for assistance, associations will be formed in the various Southern States next year.

In our plans for the future are included the formation of an affiliated organization, the Public Interests League, already organized by the Massachusetts Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage, which will enable us to do constructive work as an organization along social welfare lines. As individuals most of us have been doing this work for years, but organizations, increasing by thousands each month, will be an enlarged machinery, powerful and effective, for the broad work.

Suffrage Outlook Full of Promise

An Interview with Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt

President, International Woman Suffrage Alliance

MRS. CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT, president of the International Suffrage Association, was receiving returns from the States which were called upon in the general election of 1914 to signify at the ballot boxes their approval or disapproval of equal rights for women. These States were Nebraska, Nevada, Missouri, North and South Dakota, Montana and Ohio. Of the seven, two—Montana and Nevada—declared in favor of the constitutional amendment. Despite the defection of the other States, the suffrage leader regarded the outcome as a substantial victory.

"Yes," she exclaimed, "certainly we are gaining ground, if not rapidly, at least surely. The addition of the two great, prosperous commonwealths of Montana and Nevada is a mighty incentive to further and determined effort. I confess I am somewhat disappointed in Nebraska. I had expected it also to fall into line, but the issue is still doubtful and there is yet hope. As to Ohio, a combination of the liquor interests defeated us there. The "Wets" exerted all the influence they could command against us, and as they are numerically strong in the State, the result was to be anticipated. An impression has been created which identifies the suffragists with the Prohibitionists, an impression altogether wrong. We know no platform but our own. The movement is not identified with any party or cause. It is non-racial, non-sectarian, non-partisan. We desire the vote, not alone to benefit ourselves, but for the benefit of the community and the nation at large, by supporting the party and side which we conscientiously believe would do the greatest good for the greatest number.

"The States which have granted the suffrage have been prosperous. Wyoming was the cradle-bed of the movement. For the past forty-five years women have enjoyed and employed the vote in that State with the most beneficial results. It is somewhat remarkable that all the other suffrage States have branched, as it were, from Wyoming.

"Look at the map and you will see what a large slice we have in the West. Suffrage territory now covers an area of 1,303,000 square miles with a population of upwards of 15,000,000. With Illinois, which has given presidential and municipal suffrage to women, we have now twelve States, or one-fourth of the entire Union. And gradually, by way of Kansas, we are marching towards the East. Next year will test the movement in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Iowa. I am sanguine of results. In the Empire State we are gaining recruits every day and we have the intelligent, thoughtful men of the State on our side. The Governor-elect favors equal suffrage. In fact the change of attitude towards our cause, both in New York City and State, is as remarkable as it is encouraging.

"The women who decry woman suffrage, who do not desire the emancipation of their sex, who are content to see their sisters remain hewers of wood and drawers of water; the women who publicly declaim against us, instead of hindering are in reality helping our cause, for they give it the publicity which sets men thinking, and they also bring it into quarters where we ourselves have not the opportunity of entering.

"Equal suffrage is inevitable; it must come, and the sooner all realize this fact the better. Clique or interests or combinations cannot defeat it; it is marching on to victory and I prophecy that within ten years the whole United States will be as one on the question of woman suffrage."

NATIONAL WOMAN SUFFRAGE CONVENTION

[illegible] the convention has been urging the new Susan B. Anthony Amendment, named for Senator Shafroth of Colorado, by which suffrage is to be voted upon in every State [illegible] petition of 8 per cent. of the voters in [illegible] the question is then referred to voters at following election [illegible] if carried in latter, suffrage becomes a law in that State. There is a small army approximating one half million [illegible] suffrage party which is opposed to the Shafroth amendment. There was an unusual number of resignations [illegible] official positions and the consequent election of new [illegible] to the proceedings.

[illegible] sessions of the convention and the Sunday mass meeting [illegible] scheduled to be held in Ryman Auditorium, which [illegible] 5,000 people. Among the speakers were Senator [illegible] of Tennessee, President H. S. Barkley of the State [illegible] of Kentucky, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, president of the National Association, Miss Jane Addams of Chicago, Mrs. [illegible] Breckinridge of Kentucky, granddaughter of Henry Clay, Mrs. Rosika Schwimmer of Budapest, Hungary, secretary of the International Woman Suffrage Alliance, Mrs. Kate Waller Barrett, president of the National Council of Women, Miss Rose Schneiderman, of the New York Women's Trade Union League, Mrs. Alice Stone Blackwell of Boston, editor of the Woman's Journal, and Miss Zona Gale. The programs varied. One evening program was assigned to the Men's League for Woman Suffrage, James Lee Laidlaw of New York, president of the Men's League, to preside, with speeches by both men and women.

The convention met in Nashville at the invitation of the Tennessee Equal Suffrage Association. The Chamber of Commerce, the Business Men's Organization and the newspapers cooperated with the suffragists to offer the convention the traditional Southern hospitality. This is the first time in many years that the association has met in the South. The growth of interest in suffrage among Southern women is said to be phenomenal.

In looking ahead to the coming year, the greatest problem confronting the association is to keep the financial and membership strength. There will be more campaigns conducted and more work of every kind undertaken. Singularly enough, however, every victory weakens the forces. Every State that wins weakens the national association, as it thereby loses members and money. Women of public spirit and intelligence find an overwhelming amount of work to do in their individual States as soon as the law permits them to engage in it, and they become at once so absorbed in civic work as to require all the money they can raise to attain their desired ends.

EPIDEMIC THREATENS MEAT SUPPLY. Attempts by the Department of Agriculture to confine the foot and mouth disease among cattle to the small herds in Michigan and Illinois, where it first appeared, have failed, and the department faces the worst such epidemic in the country's history. Eight States are under quarantine, Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, Iowa, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York, and others may be included any day. For the first time since 1865, when they began business, the Chicago Union Stock Yards were ordered closed for nine days from November 7, when all infected cattle will be destroyed, the pens disinfected and rats exterminated. This is the world's largest cattle market. The great annual National Livestock Exhibition, set for the latter part of the month at Chicago, will probably not take place. Fancy cattle to the number of 1,100 and valued at $2,500,000, which had been taken to Chicago for exhibit at the National Dairy Show, became infected, and may have to be killed. Interstate shipment of livestock is forbidden from quarantined States, and a shortage in meats is possible, though dealers declare there is no occasion for advance in prices and interruption of shipments will not be long continued.

WAR A PROHIBITION ALLY. The French Government has placed an absolute ban upon the transportation and sale of absinthe and all alcoholic drinks of a similar nature. This move is a direct result of war conditions, and it is said that a nation-wide effort will be made to perpetuate this temporary prohibition. More than one and a half billion gallons of wine and over seventy million gallons of alcohol are consumed in France annually. Its principal liqueurs are composed principally of alcohol flavored with a decoction prepared from a variety of roots and herbs such as aniseed, fennel, wormwood, hyssop, angelica root, sweet flag, orange peel and many spices.

VETERAN OF FIVE WARS DIES. Lieutenant General Adna R. Chaffee died at Los Angeles, Calif., November 1, of typhoid-pneumonia, at the age of 72. He rose from the ranks to the highest position under that of commander-in-chief in the United States army, lieutenant general and chief of staff. General Chaffee was the son of an Ohio farmer, and served in the Civil War, in subsequent Indian wars, in the Spanish war, in the occupation of Chinese territory by the allies in 1900, and in the subjugation of the Filipinos. He was buried in Arlington Cemetery.

OHIO CHANGES ITS CROP OF CELEBRITIES. Probably on the theory of rotation of crops, Ohio has for a time abandoned the raising of Presidents and instead leads all States in its product of heroes. The Carnegie Hero Fund Commission recently made its annual awards in Pittsburg, 69 in all, 19 going to Ohio, twice as many as to any other State. The flood on the Ohio River in March, 1913, produced many heroic acts. Silver and bronze medals and cash aggregating $60,000 for the purchase of homes and for educational purposes for dependents of heroes who lost their lives—there were 13 such in the list—composed the awards. Six heroines were recognized.

LAMP-POSTS TO THE NORTH POLE. Polar exploration will be appreciably easier if there is an extension throughout the frigid zone of the lighting system which has been instituted by the Canadian Government along the Hudson's Bay route. Seven lighthouses have been erected on the Hudson Straits and three in the bay to guide shipping to the southwestern extremity of the bay, Port Churchill, where railway connections are made. These lamps will be lighted next summer for the first time.

EARTH'S ARTILLERY LIMBERING UP. Under date of November 2 an eruption of Mount Vesuvius was reported serious enough to cause widespread alarm and send the nearby inhabitants to their religious shrines, where they prayed they might be spared a repetition of the disaster of 1906, in the spring of which year many villages were overthrown, nearly a thousand persons killed, other thousands made homeless, and millions in property destroyed.

WAS CAREFUL NOT TO BRAG IN ADVANCE. The Treasury Department made rather boastful announcement, after the event, that on November 2 it safely delivered to the sub-treasury in New York the largest single shipment of gold in its history, $25,000,000, which left Denver Friday, October 30, and traveled under heavy guard in three special cars, the public being carefully spared all anxiety by being left out of the secret. This may prove to be the last achievement of the present director of the mint, George E. Roberts, our foremost authority on gold as currency, as he is said to have resigned the post in order to return to the banking business.

ONE AUSTRIAN CAPTURES 30,000. And is executed for his pains. As he deserved to be. He was railroad manager at Lemberg, a railway center on the Austrian line from Cracow to the Russian frontier. Troops, ammunition and supplies were sent forward to Lemberg, where they were to be distributed along the line to hold it in the coming operations. The general staff there lost track of train after train. Investigation disclosed the grim fact that the manager at Lemberg, a traitor, was despatching the unsuspecting troops straight through to the frontier right into the hands of the waiting Russians. It is said that 30,000 picked Austrian troops were thus betrayed to their enemy. The traitor and his accomplices were made to dig their own graves and then occupy them permanently.

VOX POPULI. The elections which took place on Tuesday, November 3, resulted in a wide spread victory at the polls for the candidates of the Republican Party, not sufficiently so to be called a landslide, nor yet, in the opinion of many critical sages, of any real significance as an expression of popular opinion on the present administration at Washington. Congress remains Democratic, the membership of the House now standing 227 Democrats, 200 Republicans, 7 Progressives and 1 Socialist; that of the Senate, 53 Democrats, 43 Republicans and 1 Progressive, the Senate remaining unchanged. In the House the Democrats lost 58 seats, but retained a majority of 19. The Senate majority is 10. Woman Suffrage was an issue in six States, and was rejected by Ohio, Missouri, North and South Dakota, and granted by Montana and apparently by Nebraska. Six States also voted on prohibition, Colorado, Oregon, Washington and Arizona "dry," Ohio and California "wet." The following twenty-four States elected governors: Alabama, Democrat; Arizona, Republican; Arkansas, Democrat; California, Progressive; Connecticut, Republican; Georgia, Democrat; Iowa, Republican; Kansas, Republican; Massachusetts, Democrat; Minnesota, Democrat; Michigan, Democrat; New Hampshire, Republican; New York, Republican; North Dakota, Republican; Ohio, Republican; Oregon, Republican; Pennsylvania, Republican; Rhode Island, Republican; South Carolina, Democrat; Tennessee, Democrat; Texas, Democrat; Vermont, Republican; Wisconsin, Republican; Wyoming, Republican.

BRITISH FINANCES EASE DEBT TENSION. The approaching expiration of the moratorium (November 4) declared by the English Government when war conditions closed the stock exchanges and otherwise disorganized business; the maturing of huge trade balances due to England from this country, and the uncertainty about the safety of gold shipped abroad, caused two eminent British financiers of the treasury department, Sir George Paish and Basil B. Blackett, to visit the United States to confer with bankers and others. As a result of many meetings it is announced that the actual shipment of gold in payment of trade balances will doubtless be avoidable, cotton and other crops will be taken in part exchange at least, and if the danger of an unloading upon the American public of stocks held in England, which would increase the "trade balance," can be avoided it is likely that the stock exchanges here and abroad may be opened at an early date.

AMERICAN FOODSTUFFS FOR WAR VICTIMS. It has been decided by the Rockefeller Foundation, a corporation endowed with $100,000,000 "to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world," that its objects include the non-combatant victims of the war in Europe who have been made homeless and are facing starvation. The largest neutral ship which could be secured on this side of the Atlantic, the Massapequa, has been sent out from New York by the Foundation, carrying 4,000 tons of flour, rice and beans, consigned to the Belgian sufferers by way of Rotterdam. A committee is also to make thorough investigation of the situation abroad for the guidance of future relief work. It is announced that a steamship pier has been arranged for in New York harbor which will be put at the service of all organizations and individuals who wish to forward food supplies to the war sufferers, the Rockefeller Foundation standing ready to charter as many steamships as can be used and to pay all transportation charges. The officers of this corporation make it clear in announcing their plans that they regard it as absolutely necessary that all agencies working for the relief of innocent victims of the war shall maintain their efforts at the highest point.

UNITED STATES TROOPS TO ARKANSAS. Disorders in the Hartford Valley coal mining district, Arkansas, by rioting miners have necessitated the presence of United States troops to preserve order, and a squadron consisting of two troops of the Fifth Cavalry under Major [illegible] left Fort Sheridan, Chicago, November 4, under orders from the President, who issued a proclamation to be read to the miners causing them to disperse by noon of November 6. Martial law is practically established by this action, which was taken by the President in order to carry out the orders of the Federal Court in connection with the administration of the Bache-Denman Coal Company. The Federal troops which were sent to the coal region of Colorado were requested by the governor of that State. A Federal grand jury has been summoned to investigate conditions in Arkansas. It is stated that miners or their sympathizers have burned a number of houses, including one large boarding house. Dynamite has been used to destroy mining property, and it is alleged that two mine guards have been murdered.

AMERICAN WOMEN TO MOBILIZE. In view of the greatest and most ruthless war known to the world, now waging in Europe, the executive committee of the great central organization of missionary women has sent the following message to all Christian women of America: "The Council of Women for Home Missions has been asked to mobilize an army of supplication. There can be no neutrality to those who pray. Let the women in our churches in our November meetings lay hold upon Him who is mighty and plead specially for the multitudes which no man has numbered—mothers, sisters, wives and little children—who in millions of homes are fighting against want, suspense and anguish, the great unwritten battles of the war."

CHICAGO PULLS IN THE LATCH-STRING. Social workers and municipal officials are said to be planning to provide work for the unemployed men of the city this winter, to offset the abnormal depression in the labor market because of the war's effect upon business; and in order to have enough work to go round the country at large is to be notified that jobless visitors are not wanted there this season. Usually Chicago entertains, in one way or another, some thousands of strangers every winter: this winter there is apt to be but one form of entertainment, a night's rest in a wayside police station, followed by a speedy parting with the guest the morning after. To enable the authorities to distinguish between residents and visitors the former will be given a blue identification card. Of course this refers only to workless men.

PERPETUAL MOTION IN CULEBRA CUT. Apparently the earth that abuts upon the Panama Canal at this point may be expected to keep moving perpetually, first into the canal by slides and then out of it by dredges. A second slide closed the channel almost as soon as the slide of October 15 had been removed sufficiently to open up traffic, and Colonel Goethals has warned the government that no way has been found to stop these landslides in Culebra cut, which will continue until the surrounding earth has adjusted itself to the tremendous changes caused by the artificial channel dug through the base of the hills.

CHILDREN OF LIGHT GETTING WISE. This expression is strictly Scriptural. (The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light, said Christ.) Some religious leaders are said to be planning evangelistic and educational tours in the Rocky Mountain region, on the Pacific coast and in sparsely settled States generally, modeled after the traveling exhibitions which have been so successfully used by business interests and by the Federal Government. Special cars will be chartered and hitched to regular trains to be side-tracked wherever the workers wish, and crews of educators and evangelists and religious organizers will thus go about extending the blessings of Christian institutions.

A BOTHERSOME FORM OF THEFT. The practice of mixing up the parts of stolen automobiles so as to destroy their identity is annoying to the owners of the cars, and surely must be to the thieves. A stolen car is thoroughly dismantled, the number changed, the body repainted, parts of a half-dozen or more other stolen cars installed, and the contrivance sold as a second-hand car with almost a certainty that no one of its several part-owners will ever detect it: one of them, being short a car of course, may even buy the thing. And yet so unskilful are these clever criminals that the Philadelphia police are said to have recovered 136 out of 162 automobiles stolen in that city in a period of ten months. Or perhaps it were more gracious to say, so clever are the police, etc. Only then the question arises, what are the police doing before the thefts take place?

A VERY BENEVOLENT RAILROAD INDEED. The New Haven Railroad System, 21 of whose directors and officials have been indicted by the Federal Grand Jury for alleged criminal misadministration (and have pleaded not guilty), brings to the attention of a strangely critical public the redeeming fact that in the purchase of supplies, such as ties, the road allows considerable of its income to "find its way back to the people." That there may be no mistake about this a careful count has been kept of the number of ties laid in twelve months, 2,060,485, the big majority of which were bought of farmers and owners of woodlots along the right of way. The press report of this paternal expenditure also gives the reassuring news that "wherever these ties were laid the latest and most improved method of fastening the rails to them was used." The New Haven does not intend to allow its rails to get away as easily as its dividends did.

STAMP, STAMP, STAMP, THE BOYS ARE MARCHING. An edition of 400,000,000 internal revenue stamps, made necessary by the new war tax, is being rushed off the government presses at top speed. This popular work of art will become a familiar object this winter, and may prove to be one of the most effective pictorial stimulants to the peace sentiment in this country.

COUNT YOUR BLESSINGS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"COUNT your blessings," said the landlord complacently as he folded his plump, well-manicured hands over his immaculate white waistcoat. "Count your blessings, Mrs. Grady." He smiled placidly into the fire that crackled on the hearth.

The widow Grady twitched her thin, work-reddened hands on the faded black skirt of her dress. "Shure," she told him, wearily, "it's precious few blessings I have, Misther Cockrane!"

The landlord looked at the tear-stained, crumpled, nervous little woman before him. "You have something on your mind, Mrs. Grady?" he asked, not unkindly. "Suppose—" he paused, waiting.

The widow Grady's thin hand crept up toward her throat. "It's—it's—" she hesitated. "It's—me husband always paid ye the rent on time, didn't he, Misther Cockrane?"

The landlord stroked his mustache thoughtfully. "Yes," he told her, "your husband always paid on time."

"God rest his soul," murmured the widow piteously. A tear hung on her faded lashes. "It's about that—the rent—that I came"—then with a rush—"I haven't the money for this month, nor the others—for the work is scarce in these times, and the children—have to eat." Her voice sank to a whisper.

The landlord looked away from the fire.

"Mrs. Grady," he told her, "I've never been called a hard man, but don't you see I can't help?"

The widow Grady clasped her hands tightly in her lap.

"It's such a small house," she pleaded—"such a small house, an' it's in the back of yer yard where nobody else could use it, and I'll pay you when I get the money." She paused, fighting back the sobs that rose in her throat.

"That's what you said last month," the landlord told her. His face was gloomy, heavy-looking, "and the month before. No, Mrs. Grady, I can't help. It's my business, and it's a matter of principle. I have other tenants who are waiting for an excuse to fall behind in their payments and you'd be the excuse. No, Mrs. Grady, I can't help!" His tone was final.

The widow Grady rose stiffly to her feet—one thin hand brushed her eyes. "Then it's away I must go?" she asked tearfully. "An' the three children, so little, an' tomorrow Thanksgiving?" She waited in the doorway. The landlord was staring into the fire. He did not seem to hear the pleading voice.

Softly, with one hand pressed against her dry throat, the widow Grady closed the door after her. Like some wounded forest animal she crept down the long, thickly carpeted hall and through the kitchen that was filled with the unmistakable signs of Thanksgiving. A row of pies standing on a table, a huge pumpkin, a turkey ready to be stuffed.

"Some people have everything," murmured the widow Grady. She choked down a sob and walked quickly out of the back door.

Somewhere from the window of an upper room came the muffled cry of a baby. The widow quickened her pace. "It's them that can have children," she thought bitterly—"they that ha' money and can do for 'em. Mine—" her thoughts swept ahead to tiny Timmy and Kathleen—to the baby. "Mine ain't got anything."

The little garden path was narrow and short, but it seemed to the widow Grady a long time before the cottage, with its gray, unpainted sides, peered out at her furtively from behind the trees. Standing at the window were Timmy and Kathleen, their small faces eager, their small noses flattened button-like against the pane. Two grimy little hands waved a welcome to her.

The widow Grady opened the door slowly, and as she stepped into the bare, neat room the two small figures threw themselves into her arms. Over on a bed in the corner her baby crowed happily and waved a white-stockinged leg at her.

"Mummy," it was Kathleen, the oldest, who spoke, tugging on her hand. "Mummy—you have been gone a long, long time!" She nestled close to the rigid figure in rusty black.

Outside the shadows were drooping heavily over the landlord's garden. The widow Grady wrenched herself from the clinging fingers.

"It's not long I've been gone," she told them harshly. "There, don't bother me! I want to get you some supper."

The children drew back, hurt. Tiny Timmy vainly tried to keep his lip from quivering and a tear hung on Kathleen's lashes. The baby on the bed, too young to feel the trouble, gurgled softly.

The widow Grady cut two thick slices of stale bread. She slapped them on two saucers and poured a thin, gold-brown stream of molasses over them.

"You can eat," she told them sharply.

"But, mummy," little Kathleen crept to the table—"but, mummy—your dinner?"

The widow Grady laughed. Her laugh was not pleasant. "I ain't hungry," she said shortly. She crossed over to the bureau and began pulling the clean, patched garments out of the drawers.

"What"—little Timmy, his mouth full of bread and molasses, looked at her with large owl eyes—"What you doin', mummy?"

"I'm packin'," answered the woman. Again the sobs rose to her throat.

Silence—a heavy, thick silence—hung over the little room. The children, too young to know the cause, realized that the situation was strained. The little boy looked at his small, older sister pleadingly. She came to the rescue.

"Mummy," she questioned, "have you forgot what day's tomorrow? It's Thanksgivin'! Ain't you glad?"

The widow Grady laid down a roll of black stockings.

"There ain't any such day," she choked fiercely. "An' don't you speak to me again—hear?"

Tiny Timmy broke into a wail of grief and little Kathleen sniffed hard. Over on the bed the baby began to whimper. The widow Grady kept on packing.

The children went to bed early. Kathleen was clever at unbuttoning tiny clothes. They looked askance at the mother who sat, a huddled figure with her back turned, across the room. Wasn't she going to hear their prayers? Wasn't she going to kiss them good night? Wasn't she going to sing, "Sleep, Baby, Sleep?" As the darkness settled down, velvet-like, they dozed off, still wondering.

The widow Grady sat in the tiny rocking-chair, a sad figure with tightly shut lips and bright eyes that looked intently into the future. She did not move, only her hands twitched nervously. She saw herself and her children standing in the road shelterless; she saw herself asking for work—and not getting it—because of the two small figures that held her skirts, the soft bundle in her arms. "No one," she thought, "wants a married woman with three children. No one wants a baby in the house—unless it's their own. There's no place for us—no place." A little thought tugged at her brain, a persistent little thought.

"If it wasn't for the children," she told herself, "I could get work—lots of it—if it wasn't for the children."

Over on the bed little Kathleen cried out sharply in her sleep. The widow Grady hardened her heart. "There are places," the little thought whispered slyly in the woman's ear, "there are orphan asylums where they take children—whole families. Of course you wouldn't ever see them again—but—"

Kathleen cried out again. She was having a bad dream, and the widow Grady suddenly sobbed:

"I've got to do it," she cried. "They won't miss me and I'll get work. It's that I need." Her bent shoulders shook convulsively.

It was late and the room was dark. The widow Grady rose stiffly to her feet. "I'll get work," she said.

There was a light step on her tiny porch, and the door was flung in. The widow Grady saw a little woman standing in the doorway with hands stretched out beseechingly. A little woman with wavy yellow hair, falling over her quilted silk wrapper, and wide terror-filled blue eyes. The widow Grady had seen her many times—she was the landlord's young wife.

"What is it?" she questioned harshly.

The little woman swayed in the doorway.

"I was alone," she sobbed brokenly, "and my baby was taken sick—he's choking to death! The telephone's broken and I couldn't get the doctor. I was all alone—I came for you—my husband is away."

"It's lucky ye found me in," said the widow Grady savagely. "I'm movin'." But the little woman never heard.

"Come with me!" she begged. "Help me—he's alone, dying!"

The widow Grady stood still. "Your husband," she said, "wouldn't help me. And my children have to eat!"

"My baby!" moaned the little woman.

Over on the bed small Kathleen moaned again—and the widow Grady turned to the landlord's wife. Her face was cold and gray.

"I'll come," she said. They went out together.

The big house was reached quickly. Like one in a nightmare the widow Grady followed the frantic mother up the wide stairs to the large nursery. On the gilt crib lay a tiny boy with a blue face. The widow Grady gave him one look.

"Croup," she announced bruskly; "get hot water!" She had brought up three children—"and paregoric," she added.

The widow Grady was left alone in the nursery. Gently she picked up the little, coughing figure and held it tightly against her breast.

"Mine have all had it," she thought.

The baby opened her eyes, widely blue and terror-filled, like his mother's. A mist came before the woman's sight as she looked.

"Shure, he has eyes like the baby," she murmured.

All night long they worked side by side—the poor widow and the landlord's wife. The baby was bathed in hot water and wrapped in blankets—given paregoric and ipecac in large doses. And still he choked on.

"It's the phlegm in his throat," said one woman to the other one—"unless we can get it up—"

"I wish my husband was here," sobbed the other woman. "Dear God," her voice broke in prayer.

It was then that the change came. The baby coughed a little harder and his face grew slightly pink.

"Put hot water on his throat," said the widow Grady to the praying mother. It'll help him get his breath." And then a few minutes later:

"He'll get better now," she said.

The landlord's wife broke down.

"You're too good," she sobbed, "too good. You've saved my baby."

The widow Grady held up a warning finger.

"Hush," she said, "Dearie. He's restin'." Quietly she laid the limp little figure that was growing warm and pliant on the bed. The thin ghost of a smile played on the baby's face.

"He smiles like Kathleen," she said.

It was in the gray Thanksgiving dawn that the widow Grady walked home through the narrow little path. Behind her, in the big house, a mother and tiny baby lay sleeping—in front of her the cottage looked out, a dark blot from the misty grayness. It was an eager hand that opened the door, eager feet that carried her across to the bed. She fell on her knees beside the heavily sleeping children—Tiny Timmy, the baby, Kathleen. Her hand crept caressingly over their tumbled, curly little heads.

"My darlin's, my darlin's," she sobbed, "an' mother came near lettin' you go—" she caught her breath sharply. "What if work is hard to get? she demanded of the dawning day. "What if people don't want women with children?" Her voice arose defiantly. "What do I care," she cried, "my darlin's? We'll fight it out—together."

An hour later the landlord walked in with a huge basket—a basket bulging with turkey, and pies, and vegetables, and plum pudding. He found her kneeling there—her arms flung over the bed. On her face was a happy look—a listening look.

"Mrs. Grady," he told her huskily, "you've made me a very thankful man, and you've made me very much ashamed. I can't pay you ever! But," he hesitated, "I've brought dinner for you and the children—and you can have the house—always."

The widow Grady turned her head. The morning sunlight fell over her face and wove itself into her hair. She had not heard him, but a radiant smile smoothed the lines of care from her face.

"It's countin' my blessings I am," she said softly.

THANKSGIVING

By H. P. Lyman-Wheaton

FATHER, thou ever-living!
To whom all seasons move,
We take with fresh thanksgiving
Thy yearly gifts of love.
Yet, ere we take, we render
First-fruits of praise to thee
Who art the gracious Sender
Of wealth from sea to sea.

Thy sun hath shed its brightness,
Thy clouds have dropped their rain,
Thy snow hath spread its whiteness
And nurture o'er the plain;
Thy dews have soft descended,
Thy cleansing winds have blown,
Till, tears and doubtings ended,
We bless thee for thine own.

The seed that once in sorrow
We cast into the ground,
On this fair harvest morrow
In joy and strength is found.
That which men deemed had perished
The unkindly soil beneath
Hath sprung, in secret cherished,
With tenfold life from death.

Filled are our hands with blessing,
Our lips are wide with song,
Joyous our hearts, confessing
That all to thee belong.
Take what we gladly proffer,
As due to thee alone;
Take what we fail to offer
And press it for thine own.

We are thine harvest, Father,
Ripening till thou wilt shear;
Us may thy reapers gather
As wheat without a tare.
And when from earth we sever,
Where once in faith we trod,
May we be garnered ever
Within the smile of God!

Missionary Heroes and Heroines

Christian Endeavor Topic for November 29. (Missionary Meeting.) II Cor. 4: 1-18

THE story of Bishop Taylor, told in the Epworth League notes on this page, will make a good beginning for your hero tales. Then tell of Adoniram Judson, following his conscience to a new denomination after he had left the home land, facing hostility among the natives in Burma, suffering cruelty from long imprisonment and from deadly illness, laying the foundation of Gospel work, putting the Scriptures into the language of the natives, and leading many souls to salvation. Tell of his first wife, Anne Hasseltine Judson, left alone upon his imprisonment to continue the holy work he had begun, nursing a sick child, visiting her husband heroically in his prison, bearing another child in the midst of all this hardship, later building a new home with her own hands while her husband was absent on a mission for the government, teaching, writing, translating, suffering often, and at last unto death, with the horrible Oriental fever. Tell of William Carey's sacrifices and patience, giving away all but $200 a year from his salary of $7,500 as professor of languages in India, supporting himself and his family on this meager sum that the greater bounty might go to the needs of the work. Tell of his patience and faith in waiting year after year for the first convert from his preaching. Tell of John G. Paton's superhuman heroism in the New Hebrides, conquering the cannibals by the sweetness of his love, and leading multitudes of them to Jesus. Any encyclopedia will tell you the story of David Livingstone, and you can find in recent copies of religious papers the story of Dan Crawford, the new Livingstone, who with his faithful wife lost himself in the heart of Africa for twenty-two years, mastered the art of "Thinking Black," that is, learned to think and feel and understand as the native black men, emerged into civilization for a few months to tell the story of the new triumphs of the Gospel in the Dark Continent, and has now gone back to give the rest of his life to Africa. Tell of the hundreds of native Christians who gave their lives during the Boxer rebellion in China rather than deny their new-found Saviour. Tell of the Swedish martyr who died a few years ago at Shensi. Tell of Dr. Grenfel giving his life to heal the sick bodies and save the souls of the dwellers in the Arctic. Perhaps many of the young members of your society can tell tales of missionary heroism which they have read or heard, some of them about missionaries who are personal friends. The heroism of the twentieth century on the mission field is as glorious as that of the first. And we who stay in the home land must try hard to match in our own lives the heroism of those who have gone to the foreign field.

Builders of Methodism

William Taylor, Pathfinder on Three Continents. Epworth League Topic for November 29. Matt 28: 19, 20

OF ALL the Christian hero stories, few are more fascinating than that of William Taylor, pathfinder on three, it should rather be said four, continents. In North America, South America, Asia and Africa this gigantic man strode forward in undiscovered fields, bearing the message of a full and free and powerful salvation. He went with the "forty-niners" to California, and from soap boxes or whisky barrels sang and preached the Gospel of God's abounding grace. Many a gambler and drunkard was won to the better life by the message of this Spirit-filled evangelist; many a sturdy adventurer was kept in the paths of righteousness through his influence in the midst of the strange temptations which accompanied that new wild life; the foundations were laid for abiding Gospel work which was to mold and restrain and purify the new civilization of the Pacific coast.

His next field was India. He took the same Gospel there, putting into operation his original scheme for making foreign missionary work self-supporting, teaching his converts to build their own chapels and support their own ministers. He labored without pay from his denomination, even without traveling expenses, supporting himself and his family at home by the sale of his books. He made occasional trips to America, preached at camp-meetings and lectured, securing money for his workers and his work. Many new workers volunteered. At last his work was incorporated into the Methodist organization; he was appointed superintendent of South India Missions, and laid the foundation of the present India conferences.

But William Taylor was essentially a pioneer. He insisted upon leaving his work in India to follow what he recognized as the Holy Spirit's call to do similar work in South America. Here he founded churches and schools and laid the bases of two South American Methodist conferences.

But he was to go down to history as "Bishop of Africa," the "Flaming Torch" of the Dark Continent. In 1884 he received his appointment as missionary bishop of Africa. Though the perils of the task were great, there were more volunteers than he could use. Chains of self-supporting mission stations were laid from "Monrovia to Congo, from Congo to Angola, and from Angola to Inhambane." Savage hearts and tribes were won first to confidence in this white giant with the silver voice and the shining face, and kindled to love, first to himself, then to the Christ. In every way, physically, mentally, spiritually, his labors were gigantic. And the fruits are seen in the triumphant Methodism of Africa, under his successor, Bishop Hartzell. Livingstone, Taylor, Hartzell, Dan Crawford—these are among the high names that will shine in the final story of Africa's regeneration.

Our Home Mission Responsibilities in the Great West

B. Y. P. U. Topic for November 29. (Conquest Meeting.) John 4: 34-38

IT IS a fortunate thing that with the great material development of Western America there has been an accompanying spiritual conquest. But regions there are so vast and in many sections the increase in population has been so sudden that spiritual needs have come far from being met. Mrs. J. H. Haslin in an article in the November issue of Service quotes from letters sent by lonely Christians in the West: "We've had no religious services in this district for two years"; "I have lived here eleven years, and I think there have not been more than seven sermons preached in this district in that time"; "The cause of God is terribly neglected in these parts"; "There are only a few Christians, but immediate church services are needed, as the tide is fast ebbing." In one State alone 1,145 school districts were canvassed, and in more than half of them it was found that there were no church or Sunday school activities.

In the study of this lesson what is particularly desirable is to suggest some practical plan for evangelizing and spiritualizing these neglected regions in the West. Our Young People's Unions in the East should get in touch with certain assigned localities in the West and make arrangements to assist pushing the Gospel campaign. There are two great needs: workers and money. Your Home Missions Board will put you in touch with the most needy localities and tell you how your contributions may be used in paying the expenses of workers there.

Suppose your children had their choice of homes to which to go for breakfast—

And one home offered them a dish like this—Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice with cream and sugar, or mixed with any fruit.

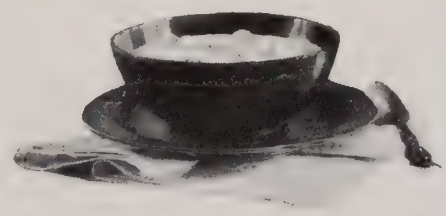
Suppose they saw these dainty grains, flaky, crisp and tempting. Grains brown and porous, puffed to eight times normal size.

Suppose they tasted one and found a fascinating flavor, much like toasted nuts.

Where would they go for breakfast?

Suppose your folks, for a dairy-dish supper, had their choice of bread or crackers, or Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice—

And they saw these toasted Puffed Grains—airy, thin, inviting—floating in bowls of milk—



And they knew that these were whole grains, made four times as porous as bread—the most digestible cereal foods known.

With all these attractions, have you any question which morsels they would choose for their milk?

CHRIST CRUCIFIED

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOVEMBER 29
Mark 15: 22-41; Luke 23: 39-43

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted." Isa. 53: 4.

The most unbelievable fact in the heart of the Lord himself that his sufferings disproved his claims. Time may have gone further, and as they gathered in their homes that evening, there may have developed that God had vindicated the sentence passed on him as a blasphemer. But how impossible and mistaken such conclusions were! As a matter of fact, our Lord was fastened to the cross, not by the iron nails of necessity, but by the golden cords of redeeming love. The bystanders challenged him to descend, but little dreamed how easily he could have done so. He remained there of his own choice, to bear our sins, carry our sorrows, suffering for and belonging in eternal redemption. Take care how you judge men! What appears to be a direct infliction may be a voluntary sacrifice, which has its roots in the all-blood that streamed from the heart of Jesus. There is much suffering in the world, which is no mystery of divine providence, but the voluntary association of the act of the pure and holy with that of the fallen and lost, for their recovery and salvation.

The Lesson in Life

By Amos R. Wells, Litt.D.

PROBABLY the greatest sentence ever written by that great Christian, William E. Gladstone, is this: "All I think, all I hope, all I write, all I live for, is based upon the divinity of Jesus Christ, the central joy of my poor, wayward heart." The prime minister of England, powerful and revered statesman, Gladstone, counted it an honor to be allowed to officiate as a lay reader in the little village church of Hawarden. The simple desk where he stood so many times, humbly and joyfully repeating the great words of salvation, has become to all travelers one of the most significant spots in England. It typifies the love and worship which the loftiest of souls of all history have rejoiced to lay at the foot of the cross.

"Christianity," said another great Englishman, Dean Stanley, "is, above all other religions ever known, a religion of sacrifice. It is a religion founded upon the greatest of all sacrifices, the sacrifice of the Incarnation, culminating in the sacrifice on Calvary." We may well think of the great Church of the Ages as built on the tops of those three wooden crosses. Not on the central cross alone, for that would be meaningless as a symbol if unaccompanied by the other two: the unrepentant sinner, the repentant sinner, the loving Redeemer. It is a complete picture of the drama of eternity. And note that one point would make a toppling structure, and even two points would be unsteady; Christianity is founded firmly on three points: the great offer, those that have accepted it, and those that have not accepted it, but to whom it is still held out.

Margaret E. Sangster once wrote a lovely Good Friday poem on "The Sorrowful Way":

> The [illegible] that he made,
> Each step was taken for thee

That is what we want to remember as we picture to ourselves the scenes along the Via Dolorosa. Thousands of men have struggled along bearing heavy beams of wood, which were to become their pillars of torturing death; but only one reaches across the centuries, only one pulses today in a living pity, only one is for me. Ian Maclaren once wrote a beautiful book, The Companions of the Sorrowful Way. Every Christian is such a companion, with Mary, and John, and Peter, and James.

Professor Marucchi discovered in a first-century building in Rome, the so-called "Palace of Tiberius," a rough wall-drawing of the crucifixion. Soldiers are mounting ladders placed against the cross. One is nailing a beam over the tops of all three to hold them firmly together. One is climbing with the inscription board in his hand. One is upon the ground forcibly stripping the clothes from the central figure, the Christ, or "Creatus," as it is spelled. In hastily scrawled letters the names of the soldiers are given, "Tertius," "Fidelus," "Eulogus," "Nestulus." This rough sketch brings us nearer the central scene of the world's history than perhaps anything else in the world, save the accounts of the four evangelists. It is not impossible to believe that it was drawn by the centurion who exclaimed: "Truly this man was the Son of God!"

Whether that is so or not—it is only a slight matter, after all—the important question is whether we have ourselves so realized the scene on Calvary and so entered into its significance that we can utter that centurion's cry. How large is Calvary in our thinking? Is it only a Judean hillock, with three suffering men upon it, or is it the Mount of God, with two suffering men upon it and between them the Infinite Son suffering for the sins of the world?

John McDowell pays his respects to the men who are always paring down big facts to fit little theories. Says he: "It is a good deal like a great artist who has spent his life in painting a masterpiece. Having finished it, he takes it to be framed. The framer starts to make his frame and after he has finished it he finds that it is too small for the canvas, and instead of discarding the frame he takes his shears and cuts down the sacred canvas to make it fit the frame, thus mutilating the harmony and the symmetry of the picture." "Whom say ye that I am?" is the question of Calvary. God help us all to give the large, unmutilated answer, as the centurion did.

One cold winter's day, early in the morning, the gasworks at Leeds caught fire. A horrible explosion was imminent. The terrified crowd watched the conflagration from afar. Would the fearful disaster be communicated to every house in the city? At last a messenger came, crying that the peril was over. One man had saved the city. He had crept down a red-hot passage. He had reached an iron door, white with the terrific heat. He had shut the door and he had perished ere he could return. "It reminds us of the Saviour, don't it?" said a rough man in the vast crowd at the funeral. "He died like you to save us from destruction."

"Oh!" cried Moody, "the height and the depth of our ingratitude and infamy if we scorn the love of such a Saviour, and if we exalt him not to his rightful place as King of our hearts and lives!"

What Does It Mean to You?

By Arthur H. Howland, B.D.

WHAT does the death of Jesus mean to me? It will do little good to study over the mere event, or even its relation to the history of the world, unless we go on to that other question: "What does it mean to me?"

During these present terrible days we are having new visions of death and learning new things about it. We read of the anguish caused by the death of husbands, sons and fathers on the battlefield. We think of the limitless sacrifice the soldiers of the war are making. And we know that, however mistaken they may be, they feel that they are giving their lives for some vague thing, or cause, or purpose—something that is to them greater than life. They are trying, however vainly, to bring something to pass by their death.

BAKER'S BREAKFAST COCOA

Has the delicious natural flavor of which one never tires. Artificially flavored cocoas soon pall upon the palate.

"In that word ('flavor') lies the key to the whole food problem" says Henry T. Finck in "Food and Flavor"; for without an attractive flavor there is no enjoyment of food.

And changes have been made in human history by death. There could have been another and a better way of making those changes, but there stand the facts: multitudes died and matters were changed for other multitudes.

In homes, as well as nations, matters are changed by death. Certain things which may have been greatly enjoyed, if they become in any way linked with the death of a loved one, most of all if they have any part in causing that death, are loathed and shunned ever after.

We know that, however involved in mystery the fact may be, the fact remains—that sin caused the death of Jesus. Can we then have anything more to do with sin? Does not his death make sin loathsome and offensive to us? He was the world's best Friend, our best Friend. And sin killed him. How, then, can we continue to be the friend of sin and his friend at the same time?

This is the heart of the Bible. All the wonderful promises, not only of the forgiveness of sin, but the cleansing from sin, have their center here. The love of God, bursting out into human history in the death of Jesus, shocks every earnest soul who beholds and admits it, into an entirely new feeling toward God and an entirely new feeling about sin.

We realize that sin means harming others. Christ died to help others. How then can we go on hurting others, or hating others, or getting the best of others? The spirit of hurtfulness reached its climax in killing Christ. When we take that in we give ourselves whole-heartedly to the spirit of helpfulness. To really do that and to do it in the name of Christ, to do it because we love him and remember that he died to make that change in our lives, is to be cleansed from sin. Then all the beautiful "cleansing" passages—in Isaiah and Ezekiel and Zechariah, in Romans and Corinthians and Colossians and Hebrews and John—are filled with a new light. If we look long enough at that cross of Jesus, if we bow low enough before it, we shall find it changing our hearts utterly, making us the enemies of sin and the friends of God.

LEADERSHIP TRAINING CLASS

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

The Sunday School Secretary

I. Required books on the Sunday school to be taken up in the class.

One of the following: The Graded Sunday School (Meyer); The Efficient Sunday School (Cope); The Sunday School at Work (Faris); The Organized Sunday School (Axtell); Grading the Sunday School (Axtell).

II. Specialization books on the work of the Sunday school secretary:

Sunday School Records, Reports and Recognitions (Fox); Modern Methods in Sunday School Work (Mead); chapter on work of the secretary in The Superintendent and His Work (Brown).

III. Method Material.

The secretary's work is vastly more than counting the number of officers, teachers and scholars present and reporting the facts to the superintendent or school. He sustains very vital relations to every part of the school machinery. A good secretary can double the efficiency of the superintendent. By his courtesy and good cheer and his grasp of his work he can be a school builder.

His work involves four relationships.

1. His Relationship to the Scholar.

(a) He puts the first touch upon the new scholar's life. The scholar is the new customer to be welcomed, atmosphered and turned into an advertising agent for the school. A handshake, a word of cordial welcome, a smile, will go far in dissipating the feeling of strangeness. A welcome letter should be sent the scholar during the week after admission.

(b) The record of the scholar, preferably in card form, in line with present-day methods, should include the scholar's previous Sunday school, names of parents, church relationship, birthday, age, and public school grade, or business relationship. On the reverse of this entry card, record should be made of the scholar's yearly attendance and progress in the school, school honors attained, and discharge through removal or death.

(c) The absent scholar should be followed up by an absentee secretary or by the regular secretary by use of follow-up system. Some schools send an absentee postcard to the scholar upon one Sunday's absence. The second week the teacher or the visiting committee calls. The third week's absence is referred to the superintendent who calls or writes. No scholar should be discharged from the records without a good reason being given on the cancellation card, this reason to be given an O. K. by the superintendent as sufficient.

(d) The Scholar's Birthday.

It is quite the custom now for secretaries to keep a birthday card index of the scholars and to send, over the signature of the superintendent, a birthday letter or card, or both. This is one of the very best methods of promoting the scholar's attachment to the school.

(e) If the scholar dies the name may be entered upon an "In Memoriam" roll to be kept displayed. If the scholar removes, a card of introduction to the school near the new home will be of value.

2. The Secretary's Relationship to the Teacher.

(a) He should send a letter notifying the teacher of election, welcoming to the school fellowship, and should give instructions regarding method of school marking and date of teachers' meetings. He should post the superintendent as to the teacher's birthday, so that the superintendent can personally remember the teacher by a birthday letter.

(b) The teacher should receive upon election a complete list of scholars' names and addresses so that proper visitation of the scholars may be made.

(c) The secretary will conserve the teacher's best work by gathering up the class records and offering at a time and in a way that will not disturb the teaching work.

3. The Secretary's Relationship to the Home.

(a) When a new scholar is received a letter to the parents may be sent noting the reception and inviting the parents to co-operate through teaching the memory work required, by joining one of the Bible classes or the Home Department.

(b) The scholar's entry card will show whether the parents are church members and where. If church members at a distance the secretary should give the name to the pastor. If not church members, the secretary can do a fine service by sending the parents the name and address of the teacher of the men's or women's class, or to some adult member of the school living near the newcomers so that they may be properly welcomed.

(c) The parents should be invited by card to all special day functions of the school.

4. The Secretary's Relationship to the School.

(a) The secretary should post the weekly school record as to attendance, Bible-bringing, perfect class attendance, etc., on blackboard or registry board. Calling the roll of the teachers in the school session is an obsolete plan.

(b) Notification of teachers' monthly meeting should be given. The secretary's report at such a meeting should contain some live statistical facts as to school progress, class attendance improvement, new scholars, cancellations, and class organization.

(c) Where the school can afford it or the expense can be cared for by advertisements, the secretary may edit a monthly school paper giving reports of interesting work in classes or departments, school events and plans. The secretary should also inform the local press of these facts.

(d) The secretary may register the school visitors, where a special committee is not appointed for this purpose, and send a card of welcome to such visitors.

(e) Record systems differ widely according to the size of the school. Any system should include weekly, quarterly and yearly summary of class and school statistics, covering attendance. offering, new and discharged scholars, Bible record, banner or star classes, deaths, visitors.

The class records are kept in an increasing number of schools in card form, one card for each scholar. In case of removal or discharge, the card can be filed away. These cards frequently provide for facts other than attendance, such as Bible study or memorization, church attendance, "on time" attendance, etc.

IV. Practice Work.

The scholar in training for secretary should assist the school secretary for a month, and visit another school and report concerning the secretarial plan of that school, with criticisms.

V. His Thesis.

Let him write out a proper follow-up plan for school absentees, or a proper secretarial plan for the local school, or an adequate plan for securing and holding the scholar.

VI. His Training Certificate.

His training certificate should bear a secretarial seal when this work has been completed.

Russians were obliged to drop the offensive here, and the Austrians quickly and to a very large degree successfully assumed it. They have driven the Russians well to the north, and are still pressing them hard, though in the last week the Russians have been making a stronger resistance. Still the Austrians have continued to gain.

Hungary is completely cleared of the adventurous Russian columns which penetrated it, and in the crown lands of Bukowina the Austrians have more than held their own.

The Austrians claim to have over 90,000 Russian prisoners, which, added to the 150,000 or so known to be in German hands, make a total of 250,000 Russians or thereabouts in the hands of the enemy. The feeding of such a number must be considerable of a problem.

The Czar is again going to visit his army and to stay a considerable time at the front. Except King George, all the chiefs of the waring states have visited their troops at the line of battle.

The Turkish campaign opened after some indecision as to whether or not war was really on between Turkey and the Allies. This indecision was brought about by the fact that a split existed in the Turkish cabinet, one faction being for peace, the other for war. The peace faction gained momentarily the upper hand, and attempted to arrange matters, but finally the war faction became masters of the political situation and refused to meet the terms laid down by the Allies, and war definitely ensued.

Great Britain immediately annexed Cyprus, and an allied fleet began the bombardment of the Dardanelles, and succeeded, it is said, in reducing two or three of its defending forts to silence.

This is not, however, of any very great importance, as the real defense of the Dardanelles is not so much its forts as to its narrowness, which permits it to be completely protected by submarine mines of all types. Of course these are in position; so obvious a necessity would not have been overlooked, as Turkey has known for a considerable time that in all probability she would soon be at war.

As long as the Dardanelles are closed, the allied fleet cannot come to the relief of the Russian Black Sea fleet. This last fleet, a collection of very old vessels, so old as to be practically useless, is the only means Russia has to protect her large and important commerce on the Black Sea, and particularly the Black Sea coast towns and cities. It is very improbable that it can compete with the Turkish fleet, which is all in the Black Sea, one vessel alone of which, the Goeben, would be able to annihilate it. Therefore it is safe to say that the Russian fleet will probably remain under the guns of Odessa or Sebastopol.

This course leaves the Black Sea largely at the mercy of the Turks, who are, it is said, now bombarding Batum. Batum is a very important town, more important than its population would indicate, and is the center of the great trade in Russian oil.

On land the Russian and Turkish forces are said to have met at the Armenian border and the resultant battle is said to have been won by the Russians.

The Turkish plan of campaign undoubtedly includes the cutting of the Suez Canal and an attack on Egypt.

How long it will take fully to develop the plans is a matter of conjecture, as is also the quality of the attacks. It would seem as though it would be the part of wisdom for the Turks to concentrate all their forces on one object; they are not strong enough to accomplish two or three simultaneously.

This campaign has so recently begun that there are no developments of importance yet, which is not at all surprising. The United States has landed a force of marines at Smyrna in Asia Minor to protect its interests.

Italy's entrance into the war seems to be considered almost a certainty in London. Lloyd's underwriters are charging heavy premiums to insure against Italy's taking hostile action against one or another of the combatants till the end of the month.

What Bulgaria and Rumania intend doing is the real question. These, with Greece, form the really uncertain and interesting factors for the moment.

The Japanese attack on Kiauchau is succeeding. The defending forts are nearly reduced and everything points to the capture of the town within a few days. A sortie made by the garrison during the week resulted in a repulse with a heavy loss. [According to late reports this German stronghold in China has fallen.—EDITOR.]

The dread disease, tetanus, or lockjaw, has broken out among the troops both in the Eastern and Western campaigns, particularly among the cavalry. Horses contract and spread this malady with great rapidity, not only among animals, but also among humans.

The cholera outbreak among the Austrian troops seems to have been gotten largely under control, but no doubt much of the ease with which this has been mastered must be attributed to the arrival of cold weather.

Turkey's entry into the war has had the very unfortunate effect of largely rendering abortive the peace negotiations of which I have spoken several times, and which had some slight chance of being carried forward successfully. Switzerland and Holland were both lending their aid and influence to the originator and both these countries, though small, have considerable influence.

This will probably be the hardest winter that Europe has ever known, and the customary greeting of "Merry Christmas" will lose its meaning this year everywhere on that distracted and unhappy continent. Every land may feel the effects of the war more and more.

A REFORMED CONVICT'S TESTIMONY

W. A. K., Huntington, West Va., writes to this paper a letter which discloses some of the good work that is being done by the lately organized Prisoners' Relief Society. In his letter he says: "I have been informed by Mr. E. E. Dudding that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is responsible for the existence of the Prisoner's Relief Society, of Huntington, W. Va. I was sent to the penitentiary at Moundsville and served my time. When I was released I was not able to work; the confinement broke me down. I was advised to see the Prisoners' Relief Society, which I did. They furnished me employment and gave me a chance. I was discouraged beyond measure; the fact is, I was desperate and it is hard to tell what would have happened if they had not helped me. I was for years a baggage agent on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, before the evil spirit tempted me and I did wrong. I have gone back to the church and Christ, all because of the helping hand of the Prisoners' Relief Society. They are doing a great work and I hope that God may spare me, that I may help them with their work of benevolence. I want to thank every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD organization for the great work you are doing through the society, which helped me back to manhood."

. . A man can dodge the right kind of preaching by staying away from it, but he cannot dodge the right kind of practice that way. It will come to him.

"SAVORY" Roaster

This Roaster is self-basting and self-browning, requiring no moisture other than the meat's own juices. You just prepare the fowl, put it in the oven, allow it to roast 15 minutes to the pound and you need give it no further attention until done. None of the delicious, fragrant flavor is lost, as the lid is practically air-tight and the steam bastes the turkey constantly. With meat the process makes a first-class roast from even a second choice cut. Has a smooth oval bottom, easy to keep clean. Her Life Spent for Others

MRS. ALMIRA PRINDLE, who passed away recently in New York, was known all over the country as "Mother Prindle." This familiar appellation was a loving tribute of the unfortunate girls who, through her kindly influence as matron of the Crittenden Rescue Home in Bleecker Street, New York, found their way back to God and a righteous life.

In her early years she was something of an invalid, but as she grew stronger in health she applied herhelf heart and soul to the work of rescuing the fallen. The Newark Home in Ohio and the Anchorage in Chicago are monuments to her untiring love and devotion to this cause. She was born of Quaker parents in Starksboro, Vt.; was brought up in a pious home and felt herself called of God to bring the Gospel message to girls who, through ignorance or misfortune, had chosen the path of sin.

"Mother Prindle" was a pioneer in this difficult field. She traveled much and at many public gatherings held during the last forty years her services were in request on the platform, because of her gentle presence, wise counsel, wide experience and Christian spirit. She was associated with the Crittenden Rescue Homes in New York, Boston, Minneapolis, Philadelphia, Watertown, Mass., and Little Rock, Ark., besides bearing the main burden of work in establishing those mentioned above.

She had a singularly sweet personality, which attracted people of high and low degree, inviting both their confidence and their love. After thirty years of unselfish effort, devoted to the rescue of fallen girls, she still found time to consider the ways and woes of the homeless boys of our great metropolis. When she threw in her lot with the friendless boys she went at the invitation of Superintendent H. C. Eva to live in the unpretentious quarters of the Boys' Home in Harlem, and there, for seven laborious years, she gave of her energies, counsel and prayers to win some of the thousands of outcast boys who come into the Home back to the ways of truth, and righteousness, and God. (REV.) E. G. UNDERHILL.

In Pulpit Forty Years

MR. MAURICE D. EDWARDS is the first and only pastor the Dayton Avenue Presbyterian Church in St. Paul, Minn., has ever had. And it is his first and only charge. He is also the oldest pastor in point of continuous service in the Minnesota Synod. Forty years ago on October 21 he was ordained to the ministry and on that anniversary this year the veteran pastor and his wife were guests of honor at a celebration in his church.

The Dayton Avenue church was only two months old and he only twenty-seven years old when he came to St. Paul in the spring of 1874 to become shepherd of the flock. That same spring he graduated from Auburn Seminary and preached his first sermon as pastor on June 15, to a membership of twenty-three persons.

His church grew rapidly. In 1885 the old building was replaced by the present edifice at a cost of $50,000; in 1912 the equipment was enlarged by the addition of a commodious and beautiful chapel, at a cost of $35,000. The parish now numbers about 275 families. In 1877 Dr. Edwards married Miss Loise Dean. Their only son, Rev. Dean Edwards, is pastor of a church in Seneca Falls, N. Y. Only six of the charter members of the church remain. S. T. WILLIS, LL.D.

HAROLD BELL WRIGHT'S

New Novel is

A Real Love Story

Delightfully Wholesome, Stirring in Action and Sweet with Sentiment for Christmas Giving.

The Genuine Charm

of the story is its style, color, conception and fancies. Its heart histories and soul tragedies are gripping with interest from start to finish. Its setting in Southern California is refreshing and romantic.

The Christmas Book of the Year

"Well, what do you want? What are you doing here?"

Beautiful and Appropriate for any Man or Woman or Boy or Girl

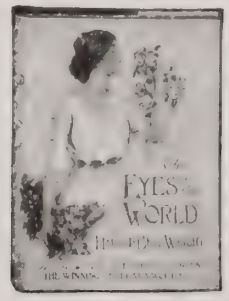
THE EYES OF THE WORLD

Illustrations in Colors by F. Graham Cootes

Cloth 12mo $1.35 Net

Nearly 1,000,000 Copies Already Sold

A Real Love Story with bigger plot and more action, deeper mystery and greater love, sweeter sentiment and stronger passions than any novel the author has yet written.



Harold Bell Wright has told this delightful romance so convincingly and has so clearly defined the underlying purpose of the story that it is stamped with the truthfulness of a chapter out of real life.

Philadelphia North American—In the novelist's "Their Yesterdays," the immediate predecessor of the present work, the mere duty and joy of living and loving was the underlying motive and theme. But in "The Eyes of the World," in addition to an intricate and finely wrought love story, the narrative conveys not only heart history, but sturdy censure of baser ideals in literature and art.

Kansas City Star—"The Eyes of the World" is powerfully written. It deserves a high place, whether you take it for its literary value or its moral lesson. Beyond a doubt the author has written a book that will rank with "The Shepherd of the Hills" and "The Winning of Barbara Worth."

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A ——, of New York City, writes: "I wish you all to know that God has heard and answered our united prayers. He has wonderfully helped me in this time of deepest sorrow, and has opened the way for me to have my own dear home once more, and has added great spiritual blessing." C. J. writes from Leivasy, W. Va.: "The young lady for whom we asked prayers is restored to health. Praise God. We daily pray for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the Mission." Mrs. J. C. J. writes from Washington State: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for the healing of what seemed to be a cancer. I give all the credit to my blessed Lord."

Mr. and Mrs. O. E. E. write from Tappen, N. D.: "Some time ago we asked prayers for our little girl, who had been very low for a long time and was given up by doctor and nurse to die. She has improved wonderfully and we cannot but feel that the dear Lord has heard and answered the prayers in her behalf. Her eyesight has not yet been restored and we most earnestly ask for the special prayer of the league for the complete restoration of her sight."

Those whose friends are suffering from mental illness will be encouraged by this letter, which comes from a Reader in the upper part of New York State: "A few months ago I wrote you from the State Hospital in ——, stating my case very plainly, and asking the Prayer League to pray very earnestly for me. I received a good letter and so much help from the league that I am coming to you again. I left the hospital in June and came down here for the summer. My health has been quite good most of the time, except for fainting spells, which lately are becoming more frequent, and which is one reason why I am coming again to you for help, for I realize that in my case there is but one physician who can heal me." This friend goes on to ask earnestly for special spiritual blessing and for relief from burdens. E. L. R. asks special prayers for her mother, who is greatly distressed, mentally and spiritually. She has been ill for a year, feels that the Lord has forsaken her, and is extremely nervous and restless, weeping much of the time. The daughter adds: "Pray that she may be restored to health so she can help me again as she used to. I am seventeen years of age, and hardly know what to do."

C. A. H., of Jewell City, Kan., writes to thank God for answer to prayer for healing; Mrs. V. W., for answer to prayers for her husband and son; C. S., for answers to many prayers, particularly for improved health and financial help; Mrs. J. M. H., that one of four nephews, for whom she has asked prayer, has shown interest in spiritual things by taking his little son to Sunday school; M. M., Williamsport, Pa., Mrs. M. A. P., Washington, D. C.; A. S., Lexington, Ga., and CHRISTIAN HERALD Reader, St. Paul, Minn., acknowledge answer to many prayers; C. V. B., Dover, N. J., and C. J., Savona, N. Y., acknowledge answer to special prayers.

A Reader asks prayer for a revival in all the churches on the community of Hendricks, Ill.; Mrs. C. C., for a revival at Grande River, Col.; Miss L. C., that certain troubles in a church at Carnegie, Okla., may be removed and that the church may be revived spiritually and financially; Mrs. S. S., for restoration of the Holy Spirit among the church and Sunday-school at Yeddo, Ind.; Miss D. E., for a great awakening in the church at Carnegie, Okla., and that many souls will be converted; A Reader, that the church at Lexington, Ill., may have a revival spirit; Mrs. L. C., for a revival at Littleton, Col.; E. B. McK., for the Holy Spirit's coming upon a church at Muscatine, Okla.; Mrs. A., that mother, a Presbyterian, formerly, may receive a call; Mrs. E. A., that a Spirit-filled minister may be sent to a church at Yeddo, Ind.; V. B., that a Spirit-filled minister may be sent to a weak church at Muscatine, Iowa.

Mrs. B. C. asks prayer that her husband's mind may be restored; J. B., "my wife"; Mrs. G. M. N., and M. H. Z., "brother"; C. M. G., for complete mental restoration; Mrs. E. C. G., A Reader and M. H. Z., that minds may be strengthened; Mrs. H. O. and E. L. M. H., ask prayer that sight may be restored; Mrs. A. D. F., that husband's sight may be restored; M. E. J., a sister's; Miss K., a friend's; M. E. N., that a friend's eyes may be healed; E. J. C., for restoration of failing sight. Mrs. A. C., Teacher, Mrs. M. A. M., J. B., E. L. M. H., A. E. M., M. E. J., ask prayers for restoration of hearing for themselves or friends; Mrs. M. E. H., that means used for the restoration of hearing may be successful. C. L. A., Mrs. J. D. M., Mrs. W. R. M., Mrs. H. H. L., ask prayer that their sons may be saved from the liquor habit. S. C., two sons; A Mother, her oldest son; Mrs. E. M. F., her husband; C. J. S., a father; C. S., L. L. N., brothers; A Sister, three brothers and their sons; E. J. C., son-in-law; R. B., a cousin and two neighbors; Mrs. P. H., a nephew.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons:

Mrs. A. S. P.; V. W.; Mrs. E. C. H.; Mrs. J. C. J.; Mrs. E. E.; Mrs. M. E. H.; Mrs. W. H. B.; Mrs. H. J. E.; G. N. S.; Mrs. M. F. E. (that three sons may be saved); Mrs. E. D. B.; E. L. M. H.; Mrs. T. B.; Mrs. J. V.; A. M. L.; Mrs. J. D. M.; Mrs. H. H. L.; S. C. (two sons); Mrs. B.

Florida Grapefruit is the Fruit Indispensable

Few persons who have eaten ripe Florida grapefruit for breakfast care to begin the day without one. Many a tired brain worker finds an ample breakfast in a grapefruit. As an appetizer, in a salad or dessert, grapefruit is no less appropriate and delightful at luncheon and dinner. There are scores of ways in which this delicious fruit may be served—some of them will appeal to every member of the family.

This is a non-profit making, co-operative body of progressive Florida fruit growers, formed FLORIDA CITRUS EXCHANGE for the mutual benefit of consumers and producers. The members ship only tree-ripened fruit and the mark of the Exchange is a guarantee of quality. Most fruit dealers handle Florida Citrus Exchange fruit in season—yours will supply you with it if you insist.

Drink Florida Orange Juice

Florida oranges are miniature golden reservoirs filled at the Fountain of Youth. They are juicy, sweet and flavored beyond comparison. You will get the choicest of all oranges when you buy in boxes shipped by the Florida Citrus Exchange.

How to Use Citrus Fruits

Good citrus fruits are alike food and drink. Used freely they help to maintain and restore health. Booklet giving many ways of serving Florida grapefruit for four cents in stamps. Florida Citrus Exchange, 025 Citizens' Bank Building, Tampa, Florida.

Only Ripe Grapefruit Are Good

The food tonic values of grapefruit are fully developed only when it ripens on the trees.

Sometimes the fruit is picked before fully ripened and rushed into market. Avoid this immature, unripe grapefruit—it will disappoint you. When you buy, look for the mark—in red—on boxes and wrappers of

A New Handbook for Bible Readers

555 DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Ever had a question about the right and wrong of something you wanted to do come up in your mind? Ever find yourself unable to say just what the Bible teaches on some point? What is conscience: do you know? Has a man two natures? Does God send disease? Could Jesus sin? Is misfortune a judgment of God?

You can answer part of the above questions; can you answer them all—according to the Scriptures?

For twenty-four years THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been conducting a chair in Biblical questions. Thousands of intelligent questions, dealing with every phase of Christian living and Biblical difficulty, have been answered by experts after thorough research. These answers are sound in theology and have helped myriads over hard places.

Over half a thousand of these questions and answers have been gathered into a single book. It is a handbook the user will greatly value and love. It will be one of the most used of all Bible helps.

DOCTOR KNEW

Had Tried It Himself

The doctor who has tried Postum knows that it is an easy, certain, and pleasant way out of the coffee habit and all of the ills following and he prescribes it for his patients as did a physician of Prospertown, N. J.

One of his patients says:

"During the summer just past I suffered terribly with a heavy feeling at the pit of my stomach and dizzy feelings in my head and then a blindness would come over my eyes so I would have to sit down. I would get so nervous I could hardly control my feelings.

"Finally I spoke to our family physician about it and he asked if I drank much coffee and mother told him that I did. He told me to immediately stop drinking coffee and drink Postum in its place, as he and his family had used Postum and found it a powerful rebuilder and delicious food-drink.

"I hesitated for a time, disliking the idea of having to give up my coffee, but finally I got a package and found it to be all the doctor said.

"Since drinking Postum in place of coffee my dizziness, blindness and nervousness are all gone, my bowels are regular and I am again well and strong. That is a short statement of what Postum has done for me."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

—sold by Grocers.

WHAT 15c WILL DO

The little matter of 15c in stamps will bring you the Pathfinder for 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's Capital, for the Nation; a paper that gives all the news of the world and that tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 22d year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is at last. Send only 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in New Friends. Why I Am a Christian

I AM a Christian: First—though not finally—from motives of instinctive self-preservation. The voice of my soul answered back to the voice of the Bible that I had sinned, and deserved punishment, which is the necessary and inevitable consequence of sin. I came to Christ, accepted the salvation he so freely offered me and took upon me his name, Christ-ian, that I might be saved and safe.

I am a Christian: Second—though not finally—from motives of personal happiness. I want and need the purpose in life which being a follower of Christ gives me. Nothing short of this supplies true meaning to life, gives it dignity and satisfies its desires. Life is a farce—nay, more, it is a mockery—without the motives which Christianity supplies.

I am a Christian: Third and finally—because of the tremendous motive of giving help to others. A personal salvation and happiness, which is not directly connected with service, is unworthy of the name of Christianity. Humanity around me needs the uplifting and inspiring which I myself have received through the knowledge of Christ. And every instinct of humanity, not to say Christianity, urges me on to give to others that which has made life full of meaning and satisfaction to myself.

LUCY RIDER MEYER.

Among the Workers

—REV. THOMAS J. STEVENSON, D.D., has been elected field secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance of the United States. The Alliance is an organization representing fifteen of the largest Christian denominations in the United States in the department of Sabbath observance.

—DURING THE PAST YEAR the W. C. T. U. of New York State has made the largest membership gains in the history of the organization. It now numbers 36,727. Ithaca, N. Y., has the largest local union in the United States, the enrolment being 754.

—ON MANY OF THE WARSHIPS of all the nations now engaged in the needless war for racial and commercial supremacy there are those among the crews who wear the Christian Endeavor emblem. Also among the crews on the battleships of neutral nations are those who belong or have belonged to a Floating Christian Endeavor Society. What the heavy armored steel plates are to the boilers, magazines, and delicate mechanisms of a big warship, Christian Endeavor is to the character of the members of the floating societies of Christian Endeavor. One marine on an American battleship who was a member of a Floating Christian Endeavor Society said, "I know what the great temptations are in a soldier's, sailor's, or marine's life; but they can keep away from them if they look to God for help."

—THERE ARE A few heroic souls in this country engaged in evangelistic work among their own race, the Jews. It is a work that requires unusual self-surrender and zeal. Those who originate missions for the Jews as a rule are Jews themselves, converted to Christianity and impelled from within to seek to bring their friends and neighbors to a like state of mind and heart. Their reward at the start is social ostracism and neighborhood abuse. Through such a course Rev. Leopold Cohn, once a rabbi in Europe, has established the Williamsburg Mission to the Jews, in Brooklyn, N. Y., which now occupies its own edifice, called Beth Sar Shalom (The House of the Prince of Peace). Speakers from Evangelical churches often address audiences of 200 there, and invariably have close attention and usually must answer many earnestly put questions about the Way. This mission has its sewing class, its dispensary and other helpful features, and publishes a monthly bulletin.

—ANOTHER SUCCESSFUL mission to the Jews, now in its fifteenth year, is conducted by Rev. and Mrs. Maurice Ruben in Pittsburg, Pa. Mr. Ruben was formerly a business man who drifted away from Judaism into religious indifference, was led in a remarkable way to examine the New Testament, accepted Christ as his Saviour, determined to give up business and devote his life to evangelistic work among his own race and accordingly began by study to fit himself for this ministry. The obstacles thrown in his path included even commitment to an insane asylum. But overcoming all hindrances, he succeeded in his purpose to establish a mission to the Jews of Pittsburg, and now the New Covenant Mission has its training school as well as Gospel Hall, and conducts ten departments of helpfulness. The work has the hearty friendship of the Christian ministry of the city, and reaches multitudes of the Jewish race.

Does Your Figure Please You?

Your dressmaker can never make a gown look well on you unless you have a good figure and unless you carry it well

I want to make you realize that your figure and health are almost entirely in your own hands, and that by following my simple, hygienic directions in the privacy of your own room that your whole being vibrates health. I have helped 65,000 of the most refined, intellectual women of America to regain health and good figures; and have taught them how to keep well. Why not you? You are busy, but you can devote a few minutes a day, in the privacy of your own room, to following scientific, hygienic principles of health prescribed to your particular needs.

You Can Be So Well

I have reduced the weight of over 32,000 women and increased the weight of as many more. In my work for reduction or building flesh, I strengthen every vital function so that you are full of life and energy.

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent, and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense. Fully one-third of my pupils are sent to me by those who have worked with me.

I wish you could stand with me at my window for a few minutes and, as the women pass, realize with me how many need better figures, better health. They could have them too, with just a little daily effort which is easy—not as hard as what they are enduring.

The best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils—the medical magazines advertise my work. Some one in your town knows me. Ask your friends about my work. I am at my desk daily from 8 to 5.

No Drugs—No Medicines

I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that instead of medicine I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercises for nerves and muscles controlling them, bringing a good circulation of warm blood to them, which I purify by teaching correct breathing. I relieve such ailments as

Indigestion	Sleeplessness	Catarrh	Suffering in
Constipation	Nervousness	Headaches	Pregnancy
Anaemia	Torpid Liver	Weakness	Rheumatism

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement for greater culture, refinement and beauty in woman. Sit down and write me NOW. Don't wait you may forget it. I have had a wonderful experience and I should like to tell you about it.

FIRE!

Six out of seven fire insurance companies either fail or retire. Every big conflagration—like Boston, Chicago, Baltimore and San Francisco—takes its toll of the companies. Even the ordinary routine of meeting daily obligations is too great for many to withstand.

The Hartford Fire Insurance Company pays losses at the rate of more than $3,000 every hour of the working day and has paid $170,000,000 to its policy holders since it was founded in 1810. It meets all honest claims fairly and promptly.

The Hartford agent in your town will put you in touch with expert fire insurance service. He will justify the confidence you place in him when you tell him you want the absolute protection of the Hartford.

THAT'S HEAVEN

A GROUP OF OCTOBER'S MONT-LAWN CHILDREN

"IT is a beautiful place," said the visitor with a reminiscent gleam in her pleasant eyes; "it is beautiful with its flowers and trees and mountains and the river below."

"Where is it?" asked an eager little voice, and as we looked down we saw a pale little face—very like the faces of the other hundred children who were on their way to the country.

"Why, honey," the visiting lady explained, "I was talking about Mont-Lawn, the place that you are going to!"

"Mont-Lawn," the child paused, almost unable to grasp the significance, "Mont-Lawn? Why, Miss, I thought it was heaven you were talkin' about."

Usually the Home has closed early in September, for in September, though the weather is often warm and troublesome, the schools open, and the autumn begins, and—well, Children's Fresh Air Homes always do close in September. Precedent is a remarkable thing!

This year, however, the supply (of children) was overwhelmingly huge and the demand (for Children's Homes) was so keen we kept Mont-Lawn open through October. We did not break into the children's school life, either, for the Home kept open to accommodate only the small ones under the proper school age, and little girls and boys not strong enough for school.

When I was a tiny girl, I had a great ambition that I thought of by day and dreamed of by night. I wanted a pony with long, flowing mane and tail, a gentle little creature that would eat apples and sugar from my hand. I wanted a tiny wagon to hitch him to, and a tiny jingly saddle to put on his back.

When Christmas time came I wrote a letter to Santa Claus about it, and when birthdays swept around I begged for it, but somehow it never came. Now, some day, I imagine that I will have enough money to buy a pony, with all the beautiful trappings that go with him, but on that "some day" I imagine that I shall want something else, that my pony dream will be a thing of the past, for what could a grown-up do with a pony? But though I no longer want one, I shall always remember my longing for one as a child. That is the way that a great many little victims of the city long for the country. And some of them, many of them, never see the blue sky and the mountains and the flowers that they hunger for. Perhaps, many years after, they will have enough money to go to the country, even to live in the country, but by that time the rosy rainbow color will have faded from the dream and it will be a reality that is nice, but no longer greatly desired.

I was walking along the street one day, when I heard a tapping sound behind me, and turning saw a small boy on crutches. I saw a poor little twisted leg and a heavy, clumsy stick, and as my gaze traveled upward, saw a patched pair of knickers and a torn sweater; but it was the face that held my attention, for it was a remarkable face to be on a crippled boy.

Once, a few years ago, I fell on a rock and hurt my leg. It was not serious at first, but as the time wore on the doctor informed me that I had water on the knee, and that I would be obliged to sit in a chair for some months without moving any more than necessary. I am afraid that my face was rather drawn and haggard and woe-begone in a short time.

The little crippled boy of the East Side had probably been lame for years, for his leg was shrunken and his crutch was worn and shiny.

But the face that looked out bravely on the world was a pleasant thing to see. Pale it was, of course, but the smile that lingered about the wide mouth was sweet, and the eyes above a freckled nose were not unhappy.

The country in autumn is a God-given place. Mountains that were green and gray-blue take on the colors of fairyland, and the fruits that swing on the trees are ripe and wonderful to eat. There are piles of leaves to play in on sunny afternoons, and masses of flowers to gather as the October sky sends down a benediction of love, and hope, and strength to the little children of the city streets, who have been left to wander alone through a fog of hopelessness.

When the sky is blue and shining,
And the sun is full of light,
When the autumn leaves are falling
From the trees from morn till night;
When you see the childish faces
Growing rosy red and bright,
That's heaven!

When the crippled ones are laughing
(And their minds are free from pain);
When the babies roll together
In the autumn's golden grain;
Then you hear the angels singing,
And their voices sweet explain,
"That's heaven!"

"Pollyanna" Comes Next Week!

Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter

She Returns to play the "Glad Game" in

The Christian Herald

JUST two years ago this month "Pollyanna" made her debut in the pages of The Christian Herald, where for a whole season she played the Glad Game to fascinated audiences every week. When the story was ended and the curtain dropped over the game and its player, a great sigh of regret for vanishing "Pollyanna" went up all over this continent.

Now the great secret is out—"Pollyanna" is to appear again! The opening chapters of "The Return of Pollyanna," by Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter, will be printed in our Thanksgiving issue.

When Mrs. Porter wrote her first story of "Pollyanna," she created an absolutely new type. Under the inspiration of "Pollyanna," who was the sunniest of optimists, people everywhere began to play the Glad Game—the game that brings contentment wherever it is played. The new serial—by the same author, of course—is even more delightful than the first.

Mrs. Porter writes from her home in Cambridge, Mass., in a letter to The Christian Herald: "I am sure I do not need to tell you how glad I am to get the story into your hands at last. I have taken a world of pains with it. I begin the new story with Pollyanna still a girl; but she is in Boston, amid a brand-new environment and among new incidents and new experiences. This has enabled me to introduce naturally the new characters who are to figure so largely in her young womanhood and her love story, with which the latter half of the tale deals. I shall hope to hear that your readers like the story."

They will do more than like Pollyanna; they will love her, just as they loved her when she was the young embodiment of the spirit of right-minded childhood. Now she is coming back to us, more grown-up and more lovable. And we invite not only the readers of The Christian Herald, but all the friends they wish to bring with them, to join in playing the Glad Game under Pollyanna's own leadership.

We should like to see a thousand Pollyanna Clubs organized throughout the land to practice the Glad Game. It is entirely social and altruistic, and has no commercial side. They will be charmed with it from the very start.

In order to give "Pollyanna" the rousing welcome she deserves, we invite our readers to notify all of their friends that the first instalment of "The Return of Pollyanna" will appear in the November 25 issue of The Christian Herald.

Form "Pollyanna Clubs"

The way to form a Pollyanna Club effectively is to send in your name and address and the names and addresses of those who wish to join your club, and membership cards will be issued. At the same time you will get in touch with the real Pollyanna by subscribing for The Christian Herald, and thus learn from her own life just how the Glad Game is played. To do this, send in your subscription, $1.50, new or renewal, to The Christian Herald, which you will find the all-round best investment of the year.

The Financial Side of Tithing

By Thomas Kane

ARE there not practical, financial and business reasons for the fact that tithing pays the tither in temporal prosperity? We all understand and are influenced by illustrations more than by arguments. Also, we remember them longer. Is not the following an almost exact illustration of the relation we occupy toward our heavenly Father in the matter of what we call our worldly possessions?

Suppose my banker lends me $5,000 on condition that I pay him every year ten per cent. of all the profits I make by the use of it. Not ten per cent. of the capital, which would be $500, but ten per cent. of the profits, whether they be little or much. If I made $500 I would owe my banker $50. If I made $1,000 I would owe him $100. If he should lend me $10,000 and I made $2,000 by the use of it I would owe him $200.

Suppose my banker had a large number of people at work for him, people I knew or knew of, and that I also knew how faithfully they served him. Suppose these people are dependent for their support, their daily bread, upon the wages they receive from the banker or through his agents. Suppose that besides these workers for the banker there are many sick people, poor people and people in distress in all of whose welfare and happiness he is deeply interested.

Suppose my banker tells me that, while he continues to lend me the principal, I need not pay the ten per cent. of the profits I make on the loan directly to him at the bank, but give it to the people I know or know of, who are at work for him, not forgetting to give a liberal portion to poor, sick or distressed people who need help. Suppose he tells me to use my own best judgment in giving the money I owe to him where I think it will do the most good.

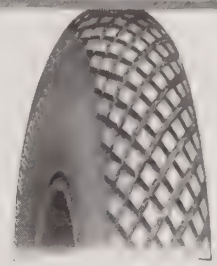
Suppose further that he requires that I keep an account of what I give to these different people, and to the causes in which he is interested, so as to be sure that I am paying the ten per cent. I owe to him from year to year.

Suppose my banker learns that I thus wisely use the ten per cent., his share of the profits I make on the capital he furnishes me; is it not reasonable to suppose that he would be willing to lend me more capital on the same terms?

Now, is there anything unreasonable or hard to understand in this illustration? Does it not almost exactly illustrate God's method of dealing with us in his law of the tithe? If it does, is there anything surprising, anything unnatural, in the amply demonstrated fact that tithing pays the tither in temporal prosperity? Would it not be unnatural if the results were otherwise?

Again I ask, is not the above illustration fair? Does not God furnish us with all the capital we have, be it brains, or money, or physical strength, in short, with everything by the use of which we can make money? All he asks is that we recognize in a practical way his ownership of our working capital, whatever it may be, by contributing ten per cent. of whatever we make by the use of it to the world's betterment; in other words, to the building up of Christ's kingdom in the earth, using our best judgment as faithful stewards in the selection of objects where our gifts will do the most good.

The illustration is equally pertinent if, instead of using my individual judgment in selecting the objects and persons to whom I give my banker's share of the profits, I join with others to whom he has loaned working capital on the same terms and after taking counsel together, we agree to combine what we owe and give it to such persons and objects as, in our united judgment, would most please our banker. This is precisely what we do in the churches of which we are members.

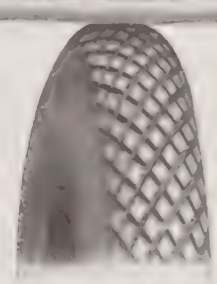


Goodyear Tires

Bear Every Day About

One Thousand Miles of Motor Cars

Hundreds of Thousands are Daily Protected by Their Safety, Sturdiness and Strength



These are the Victors

Bear in mind that Goodyear tires are victors in the long, long fight for favor. They outsell any other.

Men have used millions of them, on all sorts of roads, under all conditions—on hundreds of thousands of cars. And their verdict is—as shown by adoption—that Goodyears are the best tires made.

In These Ways Best

No-Rim-Cut tires are more than quality tires. They directly combat—in exclusive ways—the four greatest causes of tire trouble.

They can't be rim-cut. That is due to an exclusive Goodyear feature.

They save blow-outs—all the countless blow-outs caused by wrinkled fabric. That is due to our exclusive "On-Air" cure.

They combat loose treads by a patent method employed by no one else.

And they have our exclusive All-Weather tread—the tough, double-thick anti-skid. This tread runs as smoothly as a plain tread, yet it grasps wet roads with deep, sharp, resistless grips.

29% More Hups Driven Through the Winter Months

The beautiful new Hupmobile sedan top adds the finishing touch to the superiority of the Hup for cold weather use.

We have always known that a majority of Hup owners kept their cars in commission all the year round.

But until we gathered the facts and figures from 150 leading points, we did not know that the winter use of Hups exceeded the use of other cars by 29 per cent.

And now the new sedan top renders the Hupmobile more than ever the winter car of the American family.

CHARGE OF THE SCOTS GREYS AT WATERLOO.

WELLINGTON held this regiment of cavalry in reserve at the Battle of Waterloo, awaiting the supreme moment when an overwhelming charge might turn the tide of battle. The instant the French lines wavered the order was given to charge and the Scots Greys Cavalry hurled themselves against the French like a thunderbolt. This same regiment is now in active service on the same battlefield where their forefathers fought a hundred years ago. The celebrated picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, the original of which was purchased by Queen Victoria, and is now owned by King George of England, illustrates but ONE event of all the THOUSANDS which make up the history of every nation, empire, principality or power in the world-famed publication

The European War

The great monarchies of Europe are now engaged in the greatest tragedy of human history. If you would know the underlying causes which have led up to this great conflict, the deep racial antipathies, the mutual jealousies, the commercial rivalries, the sting of past defeats, the vaulting ambitions for world Empire, then you should place Ridpath's History of the World in your home.

Ridpath's is the ONE GREAT HISTORY, the one Authentic History to which you can turn and enlighten yourself on these past events. It is endorsed by the scholarship of the world and by the great American people as the greatest History of the World ever written.

Nine Beautiful Royal Octavo Volumes

It contains portraits of Socrates, Cæsar, Napoleon, Shakespeare and other great characters in history; also specimen pages showing the beautiful style in which the work is written.

4000 double column pages 2000 superb illustrations

All the Heroes of History

Ridpath throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century — the most colossal world-figure of his time!

Six Thousand Years of History

Ridpath takes the reader back to the beginning of history, four thousand years before the time of Christ, when man was little more than a savage, without clothes save the skins of beasts, without shelter save in caves and overhanging rocks, and traces his career down the long highway of time, through the rise and fall of empires, until he reaches the present civilization. It is an inspiring story, and Dr. Ridpath has told it better than it has ever been told before.

The Progress of the Ages

To read history is to become acquainted with the tremendous evolution of the human race, from its infancy and childhood to its youth and maturity.

A knowledge of history is the most wholesome influence in the civilized life of man. It makes men wiser and better. It makes them greater. It gives them nobility of character and temperance of life and manner; an aspect of dignity and ease; a temper of self-possession and repose. History is the one great book out of which mankind may learn the story of the past, with its profound lessons and warnings; the story of the present, with its conflicts and its wars; and the prophecy of the future, with its promises and hopes. And the one history which has been endorsed by the scholarship of the world, and by more than 250,000 purchasers as the best ever written, is Ridpath's History of the World.

A Personal Letter

DEAR FRIEND:

Although I do not know when your subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD expires, I am writing to you as a member of our Family Circle, every one of whom I regard as a personal friend. It is a great privilege for an Editor to keep in touch with his readers, and the letters you send us are a constant source of encouragement and inspiration.

Now, the New Year is at hand. We have been planning big things for 1915—things that will make THE CHRISTIAN HERALD more than ever a welcome guest in your home. We want YOU with us during the whole of the coming year, for we would not want to miss a single familiar face from our Family Circle.

First and foremost, let us begin by saying that our good friend, Dr. J. H. Jowett, the spiritual charm of whose pen has so often delighted us all, will be with us again during the coming year. Dr. Jowett will lead the "Meditations" regularly every week. With him will be associated Dr. F. B. Meyer, Dr. Clayton Sedgwick Cooper and the Rev. Edwin W. Caswell, all men of high spirituality. It is our purpose to make the "Meditations" more than ever a flowing fountain of refreshment and invigoration to all of our readers, and a means of helping them over the difficult and rough places of daily life.

Then there is sweet "Pollyanna Whittier", who makes her bow again and meets and greets our Family Circle in this issue. She has come with us for a good long visit, and will play the "Glad Game" in a way that will be a constant delight to all who read Eleanor Porter's charming story, which begins on another page. It's a wonderful story, but you hardly need any introduction to Miss "Pollyanna," who will keep open house with us and entertain us until the spring flowers bloom again.

The war in Europe, which has loomed up so vast as to obscure all other wars, will be treated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by able, unbiased writers, who will give graphic and truthful accounts of events as they take place. Special attention will, of course, be given to the great Relief Movement in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are taking a very active part. We look for many letters and photographs concerning this grand work of international benevolence.

It goes without saying that all the standard features of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be continued next year. Nothing will be spared to make it the most complete and satisfying presentation of all that is worthy of record in the religious and secular world, and especially in our own land.

Let me close by inviting your attention to our new Book Premiums, which you will find set forth in detail in this issue. There is a variety suited to every taste, and we especially commend them to readers who are about to renew their subscriptions. Your home folks will enjoy reading them in the long winter evenings.

May we not have from YOU personally, who read this letter, the gratifying assurance that you will be with us during the coming year? We are all looking forward to 1915 as giving promise of being the most notable in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The big stream of renewals comes in this month and the next. You can lighten our work, gladden our hearts and do a real service by sending in yours NOW, after you have read this letter from

Yours cordially,

Geo. H. Sandison

and out came the first five books. Then you went on to the authorship of the books on Jewish history and the prophecies, and out they came, down to Malachi. You closed the course by dealing with the New Testament in such a way that I had to rip that out too, so that now pastor, there's nothing left but the boards, so what am I to do with the Bible? What have you to give me in its place, now that there's nothing left of it?" The minister was conscience-stricken when he saw the result of his destructive higher critical discourses. He made up his mind, then and there, never again to attack the Bible. One such lesson on the result of his folly was enough. Not a few of our modern theologians are of this class. They are shaking the faith of simple souls by creating distrust in the Bible, and they are utterly incapable of giving anything in its place. No soul was ever turned to Christ or guided heavenward by such sermons.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. C. A. S., Redlands, Calif. Canada is a part of the British Empire and owes it allegiance, but it has a parliament of its own and makes its own laws. The governor-general is appointed by Great Britain, but the parliament is elected by the people.

A. P. C., Beeville, Texas. "Baptizing for the dead" (1 Cor. 15. 29) is a difficult passage, regarding which there are various interpretations. One is that it may have meant to take the place of the dead saints and continue their work; another, that such a baptism was a solemn dedication to follow the martyred dead even to death. Tregelles claims that the passage means that "we are baptized merely in the name of—"for the sake of (or out of regard to) the dead; that is, Christ and the prophets who testified of him."

J. V. B., Rotterdam, Holland, writes, apropos of the war in Europe: "I believe that war will cease only when this world passes away and new comes. It is good to pray for the restoration of peace; but so long as this world exists, wars will visit us from time to time." There is no promise in Scripture that war will cease from the earth during the present dispensation; on the contrary, we are distinctly told that there will be "wars and rumors of wars, nation rising against nation and kingdom against kingdom," until the time comes when God himself shall put an end to human strife. The doctrine of the millennium and the thousand years of peace, which many Christians interpret literally, deals with this great transformation. It is the duty of Christians meanwhile to both pray and work for international peace. The attitude should mark the distinction between the Christian and the unbeliever.

McD., Philadelphia, Pa. Your letter deals with the case of two men, once friends, now estranged. In spite of the fact that B has repulsed A's friendly overtures, A should not be discouraged. B may feel mistrustful in regard to the quarrel as a case where, while he may be willing to forgive, he would rather have no further intimacy with A. Now, that is precisely the spirit of the world to nurse the memory of a wrong. Instead of A writing to or calling on B, it might be well for him to get a mutual friend to try to arrange a reconciliation. Such an ambassador, possessing the and being acceptable to both parties, would have a hearing at least, and would be very likely to succeed. Broken confidences do not heal quickly with some people, and it takes time to convince them of the sincerity of any professions that are made in such cases. Therefore A would have to be patient, and try, by his manner and actions, to do what he can to convince B of his sincerity.

CHAPTER I

DELLA SPEAKS HER MIND

DELLA WETHERBY tripped up the somewhat imposing steps of her sister's Commonwealth Avenue home and pressed an energetic finger against the electric-bell button. From the tip of her jaunty hat to the toe of her low-heeled shoe she radiated health, capability and alert decision.

"Good morning, Mary! Is my sister in?"

"Y-yes, ma'am, Mrs. Carew is in," hesitated the girl; "but—she gave orders she'd see no one."

"Did she? Well, I'm no one," smiled Miss Wetherby, "so she'll see me. Don't worry—I'll take the blame," she nodded, in answer to the frightened remonstrance in the girl's eyes. "Where is she—in the sitting room?"

"Y-yes, ma'am; but—that is, she—"

Miss Wetherby, however, was already halfway up the broad stairway, and with a despairing backward glance the maid turned away.

In the hall above, Della Wetherby unhesitatingly walked toward a half-open door and knocked.

"Well, Mary," answered a "dear-me-what-now" voice. "Haven't I—oh, Della!" The voice grew suddenly warm with love and surprise. "You dear girl, where did you come from?"

"Yes, it's Della," smiled that young woman, blithely, already halfway across the room. "I've come from an over-Sunday at the beach with two of the other nurses, and I'm on my way back to the Sanatorium now. That is, I'm here now, but I shan't be long. I stepped in for—this," she finished, giving the owner of the "dear-me-what-now" voice a hearty kiss.

Mrs. Carew frowned and drew back a little coldly. The slight touch of joy and animation that had come into her face fled, leaving only a dispirited fretfulness that was plainly very much at home there.

"Oh, of course! I might have known," she said. "You never stay—here."

"Here!" Della Wetherby laughed merrily and threw up her hands; then, abruptly, her voice and manner changed. She regarded her sister with grave, tender eyes. "Ruth, dear, I couldn't—I just couldn't live in this house. You know I couldn't," she finished gently.

Mrs. Carew stirred irritably.

"I'm sure I don't see why not," she fenced.

Della Wetherby shook her head.

"Yes, you do, dear. You know I'm entirely out of sympathy with it all: the gloom, the lack of aim, the insistence on misery and bitterness."

"But I am miserable and bitter."

"You ought not to be."

"Why not? What have I to make me otherwise?"

Della Wetherby gave an impatient gesture.

"Ruth, look here," she challenged. "You're thirty-three years old. You have good health—or would have if you treated yourself properly—and you certainly have an abundance of time and a superabundance of money. Surely anybody would say you ought to find something to do this glorious morning besides sitting moped up in this tomb-like house with instructions to the maid that you'll see no one."

"But I don't want to see anybody."

"Then I'd make myself want to."

Mrs. Carew sighed wearily and turned away her head.

"Oh, Della, why won't you ever understand? I'm not like you. I can't—forget."

A swift pain crossed the younger woman's face.

"You mean—Jamie, I suppose. I don't forget—that, dear. I couldn't, of course. But moping won't help us—find him."

"As if I hadn't tried to find him for eight long years—and by something besides moping," flashed Mrs. Carew, indignantly, with a sob in her voice.

"GOOD MORNING, MARY! IS MY SISTER IN?"

"Of course you have, dear," soothed the other quickly; "and we shall keep on hunting, both of us, till we do find him—or die. But this sort of thing doesn't help."

"But I don't want to do—anything else," murmured Ruth Carew, drearily.

For a moment there was silence. The younger woman sat regarding her sister with troubled, disapproving eyes.

"Ruth," she said at last, with a touch of exasperation, "forgive me, but—are you always going to be like this? You're widowed, I'll admit; but your married life lasted only a year, and your husband was much older than yourself. You were little more than a child at the time, and that one short year can't seem much more than a dream now. Surely that ought not to embitter your whole life!"

"No, oh, no," murmured Mrs. Carew, still drearily.

"Then are you going to be always like this?"

"Well, of course, if I could find Jamie—"

"Yes, yes, I know; but, Ruth, dear, isn't there anything but Jamie—to make you any happy?"

"There doesn't seem to be, that I can think of," sighed Mrs. Carew, indifferently.

"Ruth!" ejaculated her sister, stung into something very like anger. Then suddenly she laughed. "Oh, Ruth, Ruth, I'd like to give you a dose of Pollyanna. I don't know any one who needs it more!"

Mrs. Carew stiffened a little.

"Well, what pollyanna may be I don't know; but whatever it is, I don't want it," she retorted sharply, nettled in her turn. "This isn't your beloved Sanatorium, and I'm not your patient to be dosed and bossed, please remember."

Della Wetherby's eyes danced, but her lips remained unsmiling.

"Pollyanna isn't a medicine, my dear," she said demurely, "though I have heard some people call her a tonic. Pollyanna is a little girl."

"A child? Well, how should I know?" retorted the other, still aggrieved. "You have your 'belladonna,' so I'm sure I don't see why not 'pollyanna.' Besides, you're always recommending something for me to take, and you distinctly said 'dose'—and dose usually means medicine, of a sort."

"Well, Pollyanna is a medicine—of a sort," smiled Della. "Anyway, the Sanatorium doctors all declare that she's better than any medicine they can give. She's a little girl, Ruth, twelve or thirteen years old, who was at the Sanatorium all last summer and most of the winter. I didn't see her but a month or two, for she left soon after I arrived. But that was long enough for me to come fully under her spell. Besides, the whole Sanatorium is still talking Pollyanna and playing her game."

"Game?"

"Yes," nodded Della, with a curious smile. "Her 'glad game.' I'll never forget my first introduction to it. One feature of her treatment was particularly disagreeable and even painful. It came every Tuesday morning, and very soon after my arrival it fell to my lot to give it to her. I was dreading it, for I knew from past experience with other children what to expect: fretfulness and tears, if nothing worse. To my unbounded amazement she greeted me with a smile and said she was glad to see me; and, if you'll believe it, there was never so much as a whimper from her lips through the whole ordeal, though I knew I was hurting her cruelly.

"I fancy I must have said something that showed my surprise, for she explained earnestly: 'Oh, yes, I used to feel that way, too, and I did dread it so, till I happened to think 'twas just like Nancy's wash days, and I could be gladdest of all on Tuesdays, 'cause there wouldn't be another one for a whole week.'"

"Why, how extraordinary!" frowned Mrs. Carew, not quite comprehending. "But I'm sure I don't see any game to that."

"No, I didn't, till later. Then she told me. It seems she was the motherless daughter of a poor minister in the West, and was brought up by the Ladies' Aid Society and missionary barrels. When she was a tiny girl she wanted a doll and confidently expected it in the next barrel; but there turned out to be nothing but a pair of little crutches.

"The child cried, of course, and it was then that her father taught her the game of hunting for something to be glad about, in everything that happened; and he said she could begin right then by being glad that she didn't need the crutches. That was the beginning. Pollyanna said it was a lovely game, and she'd been playing it ever since, and that the harder it was to find the glad part, the more fun it was, only when it was too awful hard, like she had found it sometimes."

"Why, how extraordinary!" murmured Mrs. Carew, still not entirely comprehending.

"You'd think so—if you could see the results of that game in the Sanatorium," nodded Della; "and Dr. Ames says he hears that she's revolutionized the whole town where she came from just the same way. He knows Dr. Chilton very well—the man that married Pollyanna's aunt. And, by the way, I believe that marriage was one of her ministrations. She patched up an old lovers' quarrel between them.

"You see, two years ago or more, Pollyanna's father died, and the little girl was sent East to this aunt. In October she was hurt by an automobile and was told she could never walk again. In April Dr. Chilton sent her to the Sanatorium and she was there till last March—almost a year. She went home practically cured. You should have seen the child! There was just one cloud to mar her happiness: that she couldn't walk all the way there. As near as I can gather, the whole town turned out to meet her with brass bands and banners.

"But you can't tell about Pollyanna. One has to see her. And that's why I say I wish you could have a dose of Pollyanna. It would do you a world of good."

Mrs. Carew lifted her chin a little.

"Really, indeed, I must say I beg to differ with you," she returned coldly. "I don't care to be 'revolutionized,' and I have no lovers' quarrel to be patched up; and if there is anything that would be insufferable to me it would be a little Miss Prim with a long face preaching to me how much I had to be thankful for. I never could bear—" But a ringing laugh interrupted her.

"Oh, Ruth, Ruth," choked her sister, gleefully, "Miss Prim, indeed—Pollyanna! Oh, oh, if only you could see that child now! But there, I might have known. I said one couldn't tell about Pollyanna. And of course you won't be apt to see her. But—Miss Prim, indeed!" And off she went into another gale of laughter. Almost at once, however, she sobered and gazed at her sister with the old troubled look in her eyes.

"Seriously, dear, can't anything be done?" she pleaded. "You ought not to waste your life like this. Won't you try to get out a little more and meet people?"

"Why should I, when I don't want to? I'm tired of—people. You know society always bored me."

"Then why not try some sort of work—charity?"

Mrs. Carew gave an impatient gesture.

"Della, dear, we've been all over this before. I do give money—lots of it, and that's enough. In fact, I'm not sure but it's too much. I don't believe in pauperizing people."

"But if you'd give a little of yourself, dear," ventured Della gently. "If you could only get interested in something outside of your own life it would help so much, and—"

"Now, Della, dear," interrupted the elder sister, restively, "I love you and I love to have you come here, but I simply cannot endure being preached to. It's all very well for you to turn yourself into an angel of mercy and give cups of cold water, and bandage up broken heads and all that. Perhaps you can forget Jamie that way, but I couldn't. It would only make me think of him all the more, wondering if we had any one to give him water and bandage up his head. Besides, the whole thing would be very distasteful to me—mixing with all sorts and kinds of people like that."

"Did you ever try it?"

"Why, no, of course not!" Mrs. Carew's voice was scornfully indignant.

"Then how can you know—till you do try?" asked the young nurse, rising to her feet a little wearily. "But I must go, dear. I'm to meet the girls at the South Station. Our train goes at twelve-thirty. I'm sorry if I've made you cross with me," she finished, as she kissed her sister good-by.

"I'm not cross with you, Della," sighed Mrs. Carew; "but if you only would understand!"

One minute later Della Wetherby made her way through the silent, gloomy halls and out to the street.

"One week in that house would kill me," she shuddered. "I don't believe even Pollyanna herself could as much as make a dent in the gloom! And the only thing she could be glad for there would be that she didn't have to stay."

That this avowed disbelief in Pollyanna's ability to bring about a change for the better in Mrs. Carew's home was not Della Wetherby's real opinion, however, was quickly proved, for no sooner had the nurse reached the Sanatorium than she learned something that sent her flying back over the fifty-mile journey to Boston the very next day.

So exactly as before did she find circumstances at her sister's home that it seemed almost as if Mrs. Carew had not moved since she left her.

"Ruth," she burst out eagerly, after answering her sister's surprised greeting, "I just had to come, and you must, this once, yield to me and let me have my way. Listen! You can have that little Pollyanna here, I think, if you will."

"But I won't," returned Mrs. Carew with chilly promptness.

Della Wetherby did not seem to have heard. She plunged on excitedly.

"When I got back yesterday I found that Dr. Ames had had a letter from Dr. Chilton, the one who married Pollyanna's aunt, you know. Well, it seems, in it he said he was going to Germany for the winter for a special course and was going to take his wife with him, if he could persuade her that Pollyanna would be all right in some boarding school here meantime. But Mrs. Chilton didn't want to leave Pollyanna in just a school, and so he was afraid she wouldn't go. And now, Ruth, there's our chance. I want you to take Pollyanna this winter and let her go to some school around here."

"What an absurd idea, Della! As if I wanted a child here to bother with!"

"She won't bother a bit. She must be nearly or quite thirteen by this time, and she's the most capable little thing you ever saw."

"I don't like 'capable' children," retorted Mrs. Carew perversely—but she laughed, and because she did laugh her sister took sudden courage and redoubled her efforts.

Perhaps it was the suddenness of the appeal, or the novelty of it. Perhaps it was because the story of Pollyanna had somehow touched Ruth Carew's heart. Perhaps it was only her unwillingness to refuse her sister's impassioned plea. Whatever it was that finally turned the scale, when Della Wetherby took her hurried leave half an hour later she carried with her Ruth Carew's promise to receive Pollyanna into her home.

"But just remember," Mrs. Carew warned her at parting, "just remember that the minute that child begins to preach to me and to tell me to count my mercies, back she goes to you, and you may do what you please with her. I won't keep her!"

"I'll remember—but I'm not worrying any," nodded the younger woman in farewell. To herself she whispered, as she hurried away from the house: "Half my job is done. Now for the other half—to get Pollyanna to come. But she's just got to come. I'll write that letter so they can't help letting her come!"

CHAPTER II

Some Old Friends

IN BELDINGSVILLE that August day Mrs. Chilton waited until Pollyanna had gone to bed before she spoke to her husband about the letter that had come in the morning mail. For that matter, she would have to wait, anyway, for crowded office hours and the doctor's two long drives over the hills had left no time for domestic conferences.

It was about half past nine, indeed, when the doctor entered his wife's sitting room. His tired face lighted at sight of her, but at once a perplexed questioning came to his eyes.

"Why, Polly, dear, what is it?" he asked, concernedly.

"Well, it's a letter—though I didn't mean you should find out by just looking at me."

"Then you mustn't look so I can," he smiled. "But what is it?"

Mrs. Chilton hesitated, pursed her lips, then picked up a letter near her.

"I'll read it to you," she said. "It's from a Miss Della Wetherby at Dr. Ames's Sanatorium."

"All right. Let's have it," said the man, throwing himself at full length onto the couch near his wife's chair.

"My dear Mrs. Chilton," the letter began: "Just six times I have commenced a letter to you, and torn it up; so now I have decided not to 'commence' at all, but just tell you what I want at once. I want Pollyanna. May I have her?

"I met you and your husband last March when you came on to take Pollyanna home, but I presume you don't remember me. I am asking Dr. Ames (who does know me very well) to write your husband, so that you may (I hope) not fear to trust your little niece to us.

"I understand that you would go to Germany with your husband but for leaving Pollyanna, and so I am making so bold as to ask you to let us take her. Indeed, I am begging you to let us have her, dear Mrs. Chilton. And now let me tell you why.

"My sister, Mrs. Carew, is a lonely, broken-hearted, discontented, unhappy woman. She lives in a world of gloom, into which no sunshine penetrates. Now I believe that if anything on earth can bring the sunshine into her life it is your niece, Pollyanna. Won't you let her try? I wish I could tell you what she has done for the Sanatorium here, but nobody could tell. You would have to see it. I long ago discovered that you can't tell about Pollyanna. The minute you try to, she sounds priggish and preachy, and—impossible. Yet you and I know she is anything but that. You just have to bring Pollyanna on to the scene and let her speak for herself. And so I want to take her to my sister—and let her speak for herself. She would attend school, of course, but meanwhile, I truly believe, she would be healing the wound in my sister's heart.

"I don't know how to end this letter. I believe it's harder than it was to begin it. I'm afraid I don't want to end it at all. I just want to keep talking and talking, for fear, if I stop, it'll give you a chance to say 'no.' And so, if you are tempted to say that dreadful word, won't you please consider that—that I'm still talking, and telling you how much we want and need Pollyanna? Hopefully yours,

"Della Wetherby."

"There!" ejaculated Mrs. Chilton, as she laid the letter down. "Did you ever read such a remarkable letter or hear of a more preposterous, absurd request?"

"Well, I'm not so sure," smiled the doctor. "I don't think it's absurd to want Pollyanna."

"But—but the way she puts it—'healing the wound' in her sister's heart, and all that. One would think the child was some sort of—of medicine!"

The doctor laughed outright and raised his eyebrows.

"Well, I'm not so sure but she is, Polly. I always said I wished I could prescribe her and buy her as I would a box of pills; and Charlie Ames says they always made it a point at the Sanatorium to give their patients a dose of Pollyanna as soon as possible after their arrival during the whole year she was there."

"'Dose,' indeed!" scorned Mrs. Chilton.

"Then—you don't think you'll let her go?"

"Go? Why, of course not! Do you think I'd let that child go to perfect strangers like that?—and such strangers! Why, Thomas, I should expect that that nurse would have her all bottled and labeled with full directions on the outside how to take her by the time I'd get back from Germany."

Again the doctor threw back his head and laughed heartily, but only for a moment. His face changed perceptibly as he reached into his pocket for a letter.

"I heard from Dr. Ames myself this morning," he said, with an odd something in his voice that brought a puzzled frown to his wife's brow. "Suppose I read you my letter now."

"Dear Tom," he began, "Miss Della Wetherby has asked me to give her and her sister a 'character,' which I am very glad to do. I have known the Wetherby girls from babyhood. They come from a fine old family and are thoroughbred gentlewomen.

"There were three sisters, Doris, Ruth and Della. Doris married a man named John Kent, much against the family's wishes. Kent came from good stock, but was not much himself, I guess, and was certainly a very eccentric, disagreeable man to deal with. He was bitterly angry at the Wetherbys' attitude toward him, and there was little communication between the families until the baby came. The Wetherbys worshiped the little boy James—'Jamie,' as they called him. Doris, the mother, died when the boy was four years old, and the Wetherbys were making every effort to get the father to give the child entirely up to them, when suddenly Kent disappeared, taking the boy with him. He has never been heard from since, though a world-wide search has been made.

"The loss practically killed old Mr. and Mrs. Wetherby. They both died soon after. Ruth was already married and widowed. Her husband was a man named Carew, very wealthy and much older than herself. He lived but a year or so after their marriage and left her with a young son, who also died within a year.

"From the time little Jamie disappeared, Ruth and Della seemed to have but one object in life, and that was to find him. They have spent money like water, and have all but moved heaven and earth, but without avail. In time Della took up nursing. She is doing splendid work, and has become the cheerful, efficient, sane woman that she was meant to be, though still never forgetting her lost nephew, and never leaving unfollowed any possible clue that might lead to his discovery.

"But with Mrs. Carew it is quite different. After losing her own boy she seemed to concentrate all her thwarted mother-love on her sister's son. As you can imagine, she was frantic when he disappeared. That was eight years ago—for her, eight long years of misery, gloom and bitterness. Everything that money can buy, of course, is at her command; but nothing pleases her, nothing interests her. Della feels that the time has come when she must be gotten out of herself at all hazards, and Della believes that your wife's sunny little niece, Pollyanna, possesses the magic key that will unlock the door to a new existence for her. Such being the case, I hope you will see your way clear to granting her request. And may I add that I, too, personally, would appreciate the favor, for Ruth Carew and her sister are very old, dear friends of my wife and myself, and what touches them touches us. As ever yours."

The letter finished, there was a long silence, so long a silence that the doctor uttered a quiet "Well, Polly?"

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE career of the Emden has been ended and fittingly in battle. Never in history has any man-of-war run any such audacious and successful career, or accomplished so much in so short a time.

She has been compared with the Alabama, but this comparison is hardly appropriate. There were ports supposedly neutral but in reality in full sympathy with her cause, which were open to the Alabama for re-equipment and refreshment. On the other hand, the Emden was a man-of-war of a combatant nation, operating in hostile waters with no ports open to her, and depending on her own ingenuity and fertility of resource for her necessary supplies.

She played the game fairly and honorably, as even the chief organ of her opponents, the London Times, has been fair enough to testify, and was finally, after three months' activities, driven into a corner by a more powerful antagonist and put hors de combat.

Her name will live long and illustriously in naval annals, and be at once an example and an inspiration.

The end came at one of the Cocos Islands in the Indian Ocean, about half-way between Ceylon and Freemantle. A wireless station is located there, and on her approaching the islands she was recognized and an alarm sent out which reached the Australian cruiser Sydney on the look-out for her.

The Emden landed some boat crews, who destroyed the wireless, levied and were collecting provisions, when the Sydney came up. A battle ensued which lasted an hour, when the heavier guns of the Sydney telling upon the Emden, the latter broke into flames and was beached, her race run. Of her crew about 200 were killed and the balance, including her captain, made prisoners of war. These prisoners were all accorded the honors of war by special order of the British admiralty, courtesy which does honor to the admiralty as well as to the prisoners.

Germany now has at large on the ocean only the Karlsruhe and the fleet which recently sunk the Monmouth and Good Hope off the Chilean coast. These probably will soon be either captured or sunk, as the odds are so overwhelmingly against hem.

The British torpedo gunboat Niger fell a victim at Deal Harbor to a very daring and audacious attack by a German submarine. The vessel was destroyed, but there was no loss of life. In one sense the sinking of the Niger is not of the slightest importance. The sunken gunboat was old, small and of no efficiency, and hence as a naval unit disregardable. But it must be rather alarming to think that a submarine can penetrate into an English coast harbor.

On the Belgian end of the western line of battle the fighting during the week has been even fiercer and more intense than last week, and, except for the capture of what was once the village of Dixmude by the Germans, without any important change in the positions.

The toll of human lives was paid all the week just the same. It is a conservative estimate that on this western end of the line 3,000 men each day are losing their lives. The difficulty is in bringing home what this means. Thirty or forty people killed in a railroad accident we vaguely understand. In a small town a man killed by a runaway, a ten days' topic of conversation, is understandable, but 3,000 men in one day, and these the pick of the population as regards age and strength—this is beyond us!

GERMAN PRISONERS BEING MARCHED INTO TOWN UNDER GUARD

The East Indian troops Great Britain brought over are fighting on this western end of the battle line and reports from English sources would seem to indicate that they are not proving as effective as they were expected to be, but ascribe this to the fact that they fight under the great disadvantage of not understanding either English or French.

The Germans, too, are probably making a fierce drive at them, as they are very indignant that these and the other native troops—the Turcos, the Spahis, the Senegalese, etc.—should have been put into the battle-line against whites. Many survivors of the Civil War will remember how indignant both the South and England were when the North first commenced to use colored troops.

How fierce this drive is is made manifest by the officers' casualty list among these troops, issued by the London military authorities for November 9 and 10, which shows a total loss of sixty-five in two days.

On the rest of the battle line, from Lille all the way to Belfort, the fighting has been intermittent and, except around Verdun, just enough for each side to be sure that the enemy is occupying his former positions.

Around Verdun the fighting is much fiercer; the Germans continue their efforts to obtain positions which will enable them to put heavy artillery in proper sites from which to bombard that fortress, and the French are making equally heroic efforts to expel them from the positions they have already seized. No appreciable change is noticeable, though here, too, the losses have been very heavy.

The French offensive against Metz and Alsace, of which so much has been said recently, does not, as yet, appear to have developed.

The German total losses up to October 20 are officially announced at approximately 509,000. Of these probably 110,000 are dead. Germany is reported short of ether and chloroform, which will greatly add to the sufferings of the wounded. Gasoline is also said to be running very low.

Great Britain estimates her losses to date at 57,000, which is about 30 per cent. of her average field army to date. This does not include the losses of the East Indian troops, which are a separate entity.

In the Austro-Servian campaign, Austria has largely reinforced her troops and has not only succeeded in forced her way into Servia, but has forced both the Servian and Montenegrin troops entirely outside her own territory. The advance into Servia is from the western border, and to the present writing has made fair progress.

The Russo-Turkish campaign has been rather slow the whole of the past week. The Russians claim, and with apparent truth, that the Turkish fleet was damaged to a considerable degree in its early operations, and that in consequence it has been unable to take the sea lately; certain it is that it has not done so. On land the Turks claim to have advanced into Egypt and to have captured an unimportant fort at El Arish, but this claim is denied by the English and the denial seems probable.

On the border of Armenia the Turks and Russians have mone than once been in contact, both sides claiming victory, but in this particular campaign we must assume that nothing is true until both sides admit the same thing. Russian bulletins are notoriously untrustworthy and Turkish bulletins are of the same general character.

There has been some more rather severe fighting in South Africa between the Boer rebels and the loyal forces, which is reported to have resulted in a victory for the latter. According to the report the fight took place at Sandfontein, South Africa.

The situation in South Africa is perhaps more serious than we know, for amnesty has been offered to all rebels by the government, which, while not a sign of weakness, does, to a certain extent, indicate that the enemy is of some importance.

Neither Bulgaria, Rumania nor Italy give any sign of life.

In the Eastern campaign both Germany and Austria have met with serious reverses. The Russians have penetrated into German territory in East Prussia, and their advance guards have crossed the frontier and occupied Johannisberg, Lyck and other intermediate places, thus gaining control of the railway which skirts the frontier on the German side. This is a very difficult country to fight in owing to its extremely boggy nature, and the first snows having fallen here and also in Russian Poland, the situation grows worse and the difficulties of transporting men, artillery and provisions are greatly increased.

In Russian Poland the reverse to the German arms has been even more serious. The Russians have driven the German center back from the gates of Warsaw to the German frontier. Cavalry patrols of Cossacks have here even entered German territory, spreading terror far and wide among the inhabitants. The German loss in this retreat is estimated at something like twenty thousand men.

In Galicia the Russians are also gaining, and the Austrians have fallen back to Tarnow, their position of two months ago to the west, and as far as the Carpathian Mountains on the south. The Russians have again begun the siege of the fortress of Przemysl in this district, which earlier Austrian victories forced them to abandon.

The report that Japanese troops are on the way to Europe by the Siberian Railroad may, I think, be dismissed as being in the same category with the fables about a Russian army having appeared in Belgium in September.

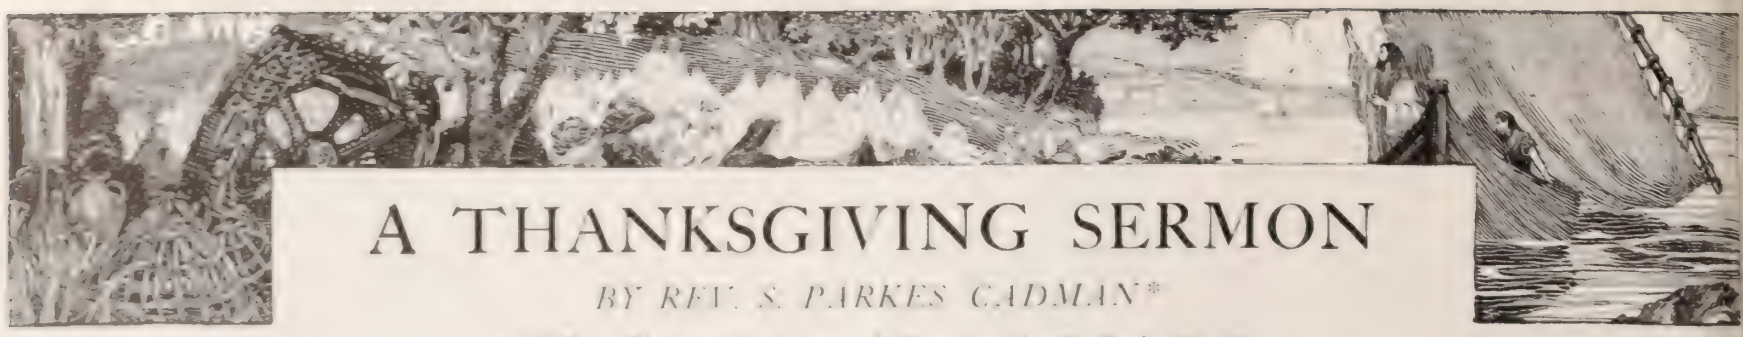
VOLUNTEERS FLOCKING TO WAR OFFICE, CONSTANTINOPLE

GERMAN SAILORS STOCKING CONSTANTINOPLE EMBASSY WITH WATER



A THANKSGIVING SERMON

*BY REV. S. PARKES CADMAN

TEXT: "The wrath of man shall praise thee." Psalm 76: 10

THE sacred poet is absorbed in the terrible vision of God's judgments on the foes of his people. The text is the summary of the theme. God magnifies his wisdom and mercy through his dealings with those who oppose his will. The finite and puny wrath of man is less than nothing when the Everlasting One girds himself with the residues of his anger. The lofty spirit of princes is bowed down; their hosts are scattered, their might is broken, their camp is uprooted, the noise of their unequal strife is hushed. After the storm of divine vengeance has swept over them, we see them, as it were, upon a vast field of the dead, pale and still, dreamlessly sleeping their long slumber. So perish all the enemies of God!

But we do not often allow ourselves to dwell on these solemn and terrible conceptions of the Deity. They have been relegated to disuse and many have been anxious to banish them forever. Before that can be done, however, we must inquire what relation the God portrayed by the psalmist bears toward the affairs of earth. The question is not optional, it is imperative, thrust upon us by the horrid events which give a melancholy distinction to the Thanksgiving Day of 1914. A carnival of bloodshed appals us. Armaments that have broken the back of labor are now being used to crush out the life of the laborer; the miner who dug the ore, the smith who molded and fashioned it into steel, the chemist who combined elements into dynamite, are now being blown to pieces by the work of their own hands. With their fall, all things come to the earth. Christianity is challenged, not on its missionary frontiers, but at its historic centers, and in communities which have professed its tenets for fifteen hundred years.

Among the victims who are taken off, whose lives are blotted out of common existence, apparently without cause or reason, are the very crowns and flowers of youth, talent, intellect and possible achievement. Those splendid burning spirits which might have enlightened our darkness and purified our aims are now as much crimson clay. Gospel and poet, shorter under the bloody soil, or cremated to avoid pestilence among the survivors. Such is war in this year of grace! Our fathers spent the silence; those nations bore the potential Beethovens, Pasteurs, Tolstoys—guardian angels of a future era, who might have given us atonement from our gross and scurvious fog our bitter social problems. Neither the hell of mediævalism nor that of Milton imagined such abomination and woe. The apocalypses of the seers of Revelation are now fulfilled in our ears. "And when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth living creature saying, Come. And I saw, and behold, a pale horse: and he that sat upon him, his name was Death; and Hades followed with him. And there was given unto them authority over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with famine, and with death. . . . And I saw underneath the altar the souls of those that had been slain . . . and they cried with a great voice, How long, O Master, the holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on those that dwell on the earth?"

The Infinitude of God

WHAT then is the answer to the question already asked? Is this human life of ours too obscure and paltry for God to notice, or too strong and defiant for him to control? Let it be clearly understood that the Forenames these psalms reveal is marked by a Judgment of mystery. Their authors were illuminated by inspiration, and in its light they saw the permanent on which rested the seat of supreme authority, but they did not see the throne itself. Nothing came of God's manifold and various efforts save the declaration: "Thy judgments are far above out of sight." "Clouds and darkness are round about him." How does the world correspond with our own experience? Can we find any truer, subtler terms than these? Language in every century, in our own, learning has revealed it, culture has refined it, literature, philosophy have given it terse and elegant forms; above all the revelation of Jesus Christ has shown us the Father. Yet even our maturity and comparative perfection is only too thankful to borrow the sublime strains of Hebrew song. The most vital consciousness we feel, the highest knowledge we can obtain, the ghastly events we contemplate with reluctance, combine to emphasize that God is incomprehensible, that his judgments are a mighty deep. And if, at the first, this would seem to threaten faith, reflection convinces us that any other view is untenable. A Supreme Being who could be measured and understood, whose ways were patent and his purposes capable of exact forecast, would cease to be the object of our worship, and would gradually sink into moral neglect and contempt. All his reasons would lie upon the surface. Knowing to the last jot and tittle what he would say and do, we should take our own course, fit in our plans with his where we pleased, and depart from the providential line when it seemed good to us to do so.

But God cannot be anticipated; he does not allow us to know what a day or an hour will bring forth. Just as the consummate strategist conceals his movements from the enemy and strikes his blow where it is least expected, so in the scope of that tomorrow which is strictly reserved by the Almighty, ambitions are turned back, controversies are settled, disappointments are inflicted and consolations are administered; all upon a basis which has not been communicated to finite intelligence.

Here we must take our stand, as did Moses before the unconsumed bush, and discover that our boasted liberty is nothing more than the freedom to choose to whom we will surrender that liberty. The soul's education in spiritual truth begins with the acknowledgment of its ignorance, its dependence and its realization of those limitations within which it must of necessity move, since we cannot advance a solitary step beyond a certain point. We are compelled to trust a greater love, a greater power, a greater wisdom, than man, individually or collectively, will ever possess. Thus faith grows, and with it peace and confidence, not because we know God, but because we believe and obey him. We have no information beyond the hour, and even this we constantly misinterpret and misapply. But to be sure, in spite of these things, that he who is for us is more than all that can be against us, is to be solid at the center, sound at the core. Life becomes chastened, the spirit puts on a beautiful modesty, the character is distinguished for fortitude. Under gray skies, and blown upon by cold and cruel winds, so long as we can say: "This is the Lord's doing, it is marvelous in our eyes," we can keep alight within the lamps of sacrifice, of service, of patience and thanksgiving. Diminish its radiance and you shut out the distilleries of nature. The same God who allows men that capacity for volition which can be bent on wickedness and war, makes their wrath to praise him.

The Nearness of God

THE moral perplexity of Providence is sometimes as baffling as its intellectual mystery. We can tolerate the riddles of the brain, but when conscience and righteousness are outraged, we almost cease to worship. "My feet were almost gone; my steps had well-nigh slipped. I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. For there are no bands in their death; but their strength is firm. They are not in trouble as other men. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment." But are cruelty and oppression patronized of heaven, and mercy and justice discouraged? Asaph had but to enter the sanctuary to understand the end of the tyrant and the spoiler. Then he took up the harp of life again and smote the chords with might, until the ungodly and their prosperity passed in a moment and went to their own place. Providence was sovereign and final, putting down one, setting up another, the poor were raised from the dust, the needy out of the dunghill; the planet was handled with imperial wisdom; the foam of fury died out in pallid weakness; the ascription pealed forth, "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of the isles be glad thereof."

We gather on Thanksgiving Day that we may comfort one another with these words. We come to Him who knows our frame, who remembers that we are dust, that we may be healed and invigorated returning to our several homes rejoicing in the God of our salvation. Our laudation and gratitude take more vivid forms because of the encompassing gloom. The rays of the lighthouse are not visible on summer days at sea, but when the hurricane is hurtling through the darkness those rays warn us of the fatal shore and show the safe passage to the harbor. Moreover, we cannot amend the truth these psalms contain, but we can live anew by them. They tell us that God has not to leave his everlasting seat. He is already and always here. "The Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge." He has not to be summoned from afar, as was Baal when the priests cried for his assistance while other occupations prevented him or peradventure he was on a distant journey and beyond their frenzied appeal. Nigh at hand; not afar off; very present help in trouble, is he whom we worship. The living fact of his immediacy breathes through all the ages and cannot be extinguished by the inventions of unbelief.

The Wrath of Man

THE history of religion shows that its Author is exalted by the wrath of man. Faith rests upon immovable foundations; it employs agencies that human reason cannot trace; it operates in regions that defy assaults of hate and persecution. The wrath of man keeps holy day for the church. Saints are purified and wavering believers are made steadfast by the violence of the evil-minded. Devotion, zeal and fortitude are quickened by the flames of martyrdom. The Hebrews were never more spiritually glorious than when they languished in captivity. Christians were spurred to a more diligent performance of their duty by the spectacle of the world in arms against them. God sometimes uses the devil's shoulders for a vantage point. When affairs are hopelessly ravelled, he disentangles them, disposes them for good and subordinates to his purposes the things that threaten the honor of his name. Subtle schemes and forcible attempts against the church have been made tributary to her excellence. Anger may be blown up into wrath, and like Nebuchadnezzar's furnace, seven times heated accentuated to the highest degree, but such is human rage is its own Nemesis. Pharaoh fumed and fretted, but could do nothing against the chosen people. The dispersion of the church of the New Testament spread the Gospel throughout the Roman Empire. Domitian and Nero, by their ruthless undertakings, rendered signal service to St. Paul's mission to the Gentiles. The Lollards, crushed at home, arose elsewhere, and in Bohemia the doctrines of Wycliffe assumed under Huss the dignity of a national religion. The Huguenots enriched Europe and America after France had been impoverished by their rejection. The Covenanters were the rock on which the Stuart dynasty split. The pilgrim Fathers, who established this festival, corrected the balance of ecclesiastical power between two continents.

In these historic events we see how the spirit of the saints and the being of the kingdom were upheld by the divine presence, notwithstanding all that their enemies could plot against them. In the day of the church's prosperity true believers and double-minded hypocrites were mingled together like the wheat and chaff on the threshing floor. But heaven allowed the fierce gales of wrath to be put through them that they might be separated. In times of peace and patronage the sheep of Christ scatter, but when the dogs of persecution are let loose upon them, they run together and there is one flock and one Shepherd. Like some sweet smelling herbs, the more the Gospel is trampled on the sweeter its aroma, the readier its spread.

Again, in the world at large, the genius of wickedness has never finally outwitted the genius of heaven's delivering relief. That Power, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness, may apparently be slow as the glacier sliding down the Alpine slopes, but like the glacier it grinds every opposition to powder. The prediction that the officers of the ideal state shall be peace, and its

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, November 29. John 7: 28, 29. "Ye both know me, and ye know whence I am: and I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. But I know him: for I am from him, and he hath sent me." These words were uttered by our Lord with a loud voice in the temple. He had listened to the murmurings of another party who were disputing his divine origin and mission. These people compared what they knew of the human origin of Jesus with what Jewish traditions and their scribes had taught them concerning the coming of the Messiah. The most grotesque views prevailed among the Jews about this cherished event in the history of the elect nation. Taking some of the old prophecies in a literal sense and misunderstanding others, the Jews believed that the Messiah in a gorgeous spectacle would descend out of heaven and enter the temple, there to receive his Messianic coronation and inaugurate his theocratic government of the world. What the old prophets had said about the origin of the Messiah seems to have almost entirely dropped out of the Messianic calculations of the Jews at the time of Christ. The Lord admits that they possess a knowledge of his birth and personality. His parents and relatives too were known to them. But their knowledge even of these facts, if they had measured them against prophecy, ought to have led them to the conviction that he was not an ordinary human being. For his conception and birth were wonderful. His advent into the flesh was not, as in the case of a mere human being, the starting-point of his existence, but only an incident. He came as one that was "sent." God gave his only-begotten Son when Christ was born in Bethlehem. Thus our Lord repudiates those false views which have made their appearance in all ages, viz., that he is nothing but an ordinary man.

MONDAY, November 30. John 7: 28, 29. "I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. But I know him, for I am from him, and he hath sent me." The text of the foregoing meditation deserves to be looked into once more. It shows the sad results of the teaching of the Jewish scribes among the common people. Christ tells them that, as a consequence of their superstitions and of their following the traditions of the elders, they had lost God. In his entire earthly life, from the manger in Bethlehem hitherto, God had been revealed to them. God is the great moving cause in Christ's coming on earth and in all his activity. "He that sent me is true." This means: God is the real Sender in this instance. Jesus is the Son of God. And God has inaugurated the great mission of mercy for the reclamation of the fallen race of Adam, which began when God was manifest in the flesh, when Christ was born of a woman, and made under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. All who believe only in a human Jesus have no Redeemer, and no true knowledge of God. To know Jesus aright, one must believe that he is from God and that God has sent him to take away the sins of the world.

TUESDAY, December 1. John 7; 33, 34. "Yet a little while am I with you, and then I go unto him that sent me. Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me: and where I am, thither ye cannot come." These words are vibrating with the pathos of grief and sadness, and should be so read. A shocking thing has happened in the midst of this gladsome festival: the Jewish authorities have sent officers to arrest Jesus. It is not plain from the text whether their business was fully revealed to the multitude, but Jesus had observed the movement. Before friend and foe he speaks these words, which start perplexed inquiries among the bystanders. The vista of the way of sorrows opens up to his mind's eye. Only six months more, and all will be over. He is going—going out of all the labor and travail of soul that has filled his life; going home to the Father, with the conviction that he has completed the Father's errand to the Father's prodigal children. But these children, a great many of them, want to hurry him out of this world. He came unto his own, and his own not only did not receive him but were even loath to tolerate his presence. He is already hearing their frenzied shouts: "Away with him!" Days will come when this nation, so highly favored by Jehovah, will seek in despair for the Messiah they expect and whom they desire Christ to be. They will be disappointed. The glory which they are seeking will never come to them, and the glory they might have had, and which every true Israelite received from Jesus, they have forfeited by their stubbornness. He is going from them, out of shame here to the glory which he had when he was with the Father. Thither he takes every one who accepts him as his Redeemer. Thither no one can come who denies his divine Sonship and his redeeming work.

WEDNESDAY, December 2. John 7: 37. "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink." The feast of tabernacles was a memorial of the desert wanderings of the Israelites under Moses. The booths, or tabernacles, made of green boughs, symbolized the tents or temporary shelters which the fathers had erected on their journey to the Promised Land. The feast was now closing in a blaze of glory. The water-ceremony, symbolizing the water from the smitten rock, had taken place: a priest had brought water from the Pool of Siloam and poured it out into a silver vessel in the temple court. The "Great Hosanna" had been sung. In the pause that followed, Jesus "stood and cried" the above words to the holy convocation. He had assumed a solemn attitude and his voice rang out clear and strong. He proclaimed himself the real crown and glory of this festival. All the ancient types in Israel's history and worship found their antitype in him. He had been with the fathers on their journey to Canaan. They "did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was Christ." Jesus the Saviour is the rock riven in this desert land for sinners. His Gospel of the forgiveness of sins refreshes the famished soul and stills every longing of the human heart. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters," Isaiah had cried. Here the Lord, who had told the Samaritan woman about the water of life that he could give, invites men to himself. He is the great Restorer of all who are faint and weary. He restoreth their souls; he leadeth them beside the still waters for his name's sake. His name is Jesus, the Helper, the Saviour.

THURSDAY, December 3. John 7: 38. "He that believeth in me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." Coming to Christ and drinking, our Lord now tells us, means believing. Striking terms, like these which the Scriptures use as synonyms for believing, indicate that believing is a real act of the heart which, having been quickened out of the death of sin, is now filled with the strength of a new life, has found a new object of its affections, and new appetites which must be satisfied. Having been restored to life at the heavenly fountain of the word of Jesus, the believer, in turn, becomes a fountain to others. His faith worketh by love. He is glad to share with others the wisdom, the comfort, the strength that have been imparted to him. A true active Christian in any community is like a cool spring by the wayside at which thirsty travelers may freely refresh themselves. His word of cheer, his wise counsel, his active assistance, generously and joyfully bestowed, work miracles of grace among his fellow men. Chrysostom said: "One may perceive what is meant, if he will consider the wisdom of Stephen, the tongue of Peter, the vehemence of Paul; how nothing withstood them—not the anger of multitudes, nor the uprising of tyrants, nor plots of devils, nor daily deaths—but, as rivers borne along with loud, rushing sound, they went on their way." Incidentally we may note in this connection with what reverence Christ cites Scripture, and how he bows to the authority of the written word of God. His use of the Scriptures should be a warning to all who handle the holy Book irreverently.

FRIDAY, December 4. John 8: 7. "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." The enemies of our Lord have concocted another scheme to discredit him with the people: as he is sitting in the temple teaching the people, they thrust into his presence an adulteress, and ask him to say what shall be done with her. The punishment settled on this offense in the Old Testament was death by stoning. The Lord's questioners knew that, and there was no need of their asking their question. But the Roman Government had reserved to itself the carrying out of a death penalty among the Jews. The questioners knew this fact also. They wished to entrap our Lord into saying something injurious to himself. Jesus for a while appears not to hear them. He stoops and writes on the ground. But they insist on a reply, and he rises and speaks the words of our text. Our Lord's answer does not palliate the woman's offense nor mitigate the punishment due her. He refuses to interfere with the authority of the law or to sanction such interference on the part of others. His questioners knew that if they had stoned the woman, they would have been guilty of the crime of lynching. They could only plead their moral indignation as an explanation of their violence, as lynchers usually do. On that ground our Lord meets them. Let moral indignation, like charity, begin at home. Jesus does not deny that sinners may and must punish sinners by due process of law, and that all who are in authority must render a just verdict on sin and guilt. But in the relations of man to man, the consciousness of each man's personal guilt must act as a check upon passion, and moral indignation must not be a cloak for crime.

SATURDAY, December 5. John 8: 10, 11. "Woman, where are those thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee? Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more." Our Lord's answer had taken his enemies in their own craftiness. They were caught in the trap they had set for him. They slunk away, smitten in conscience at the unmistakable charge which the calm reply of Jesus hurled against them. Not one remained. When our Lord rises again from his stooping posture, there are the people whom he had been teaching when he was interrupted, and in the center of the ring, the hapless creature who had been haled before him, crushed with a sense of burning shame. Augustine has aptly characterized the two central figures in this scene, when he says: Here miseria faces misericordia. Misery meets Mercy; wretchedness crouches before Pity. Our Lord's action in this instance has not infrequently been given a vicious interpretation. It is not that he treated adultery as a peccadillo, that he blandly condoned a flagrant offense against modesty, that he fostered loose morals. No, he tells her that she has sinned. He only refuses to do what her accusers had wanted him to do: give her over to mob-law. In that sense he does not condemn her. And now he administers an earnest warning: "Let your vile doings stop here. Let this be the last offense. Rise a new woman." His words must have rung with tender pity as he said to the terror-stricken, trembling woman: "Go, and sin no more," and sent her away reclaimed to a clean life.

exactors righteousness, is not void. It is nearer fulfilment now than in the hour and power of the Plantagenet, the Stuart, the Valois or the Bourbon. And there shall come a day when the tyrants of this epoch will be nothing more than a smudge on the distant horizon of the past. The heavenly Father has inevitably defeated the purposes of iniquity and made them contribute to his exaltation among the heathen. He sees fit to slacken the bridle of his providence; but human effort, whether for good or evil, has its appointed boundaries. So long as the wrath of man brings revenue to the development of final good it is permitted; after that, it is restrained.

These considerations are offered in the hope that they may alleviate the distress so many keenly feel over this cruel and conscienceless war, waged with unparalleled ferocity, and attended by a loss so manifold and widespread as to stagger apprehension. Since the race has had a sensible being few catastrophes have fallen on it which make a more active demand upon faith and hope. Yet there is no infidelity more contagious and degenerating than that which tempts us to disbelieve the text, or to hold that evil, if not indeed triumphant over good, at any rate shares with it the rule of human affairs. Let us be transformed and renewed in our minds by the teachings of holy Scripture, corroborated as they are in a wealth of experience which gives us ground for rational courage. The sword of heaven, while slow to smite, will not be sheathed until its warfare is accomplished. It does not always linger. A little space of time and what changes are wrought! The Lord cuts off the spirit of those who delight in battle; he confounds their plots against the security of the innocent. In this faith let us keep our Thanksgiving feast today. We may be neutral, but God is not neutral. His judgment will be just and it will also be executed. The citizens of a republic whose very breath is due to the trust of its founders in the living God of all righteousness can find their consolation and their rock in this glorious Scripture. And from that rock they will stretch out the hand of brotherhood to all of any nation who are victims of desolation.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

Thanksgiving

WE HAD, a few weeks ago, a day of prayer for peace in Europe. The appointment of that day was made by President Wilson in response to a plea from many people and organizations who felt that Christian America must do something to express its grief at the war and its yearning that peace should return. During the intervening weeks we have been tempted to grow callous about the war. Tales of heaps of dead and trainloads of wounded and crowds of homeless women and children do not stir us to horror and pity as at first. And now—in the face of all this, shall we have an old-fashioned Thanksgiving, rejoicing because we are alive and in abundance while others are in the depths of despair and agony?

There should be no less Thanksgiving Day more prayer than usually accompanies its festivities. Fear? Yes, we shall fear, modestly, with our dear ones, looking into the loved faces with tear-dimmed eyes, thanking God from the depths of our souls that they are not shelterless or bereft. And with the feasting and the singing and the conversation there will be earnest praying—that God will show us, one by one, and as a nation, how to be just, how to be generous, how to be good, how to be wise—how to be strong to show the world a way of life that shall mean peace and hope, opportunity and comfort and love—for all mankind.

We close with three quotations from two Presidents of the United States. All three have appeared before in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but they must be grouped together here to add a note of authoritative exhortation to these words. George Washington said: "My first wish is to see the whole world at peace and the inhabitants of it as one band of brothers, striving which should contribute most to the happiness of mankind." Woodrow Wilson spoke on Flag Day at the beginning of this summer "of the right of one nation to serve the nations of the world," and declared that our flag must be held "too great to be debased by selfishness." And in his recent proclamation, calling the inhabitants of the nation to this day of Thanksgiving, he declared: "Never before have the people of the United States been so situated for their own advantage or the advantage of their neighbors, or so equipped to serve themselves and mankind."

Here is something indeed to be thankful for. Not so much that we have been kept in peace while the other nations are at strife, not so much that provision has been made for our need while others are suffering want; but that our peace and our plenty give us the power not only to send the necessities of life to those who are sore in want, but that we may have an opportunity of helping the other nations of the world to find a way to true peace and true brotherhood which shall make glad again the bleeding heart of Christ.

Feeling With Dynamite

WHILE the political parties are still searching for some stray fragments of consolation in the late election, there is one outcome which, though not generally recognized, is significant to those who have been attentive observers of politics lately. In several States the Catholic cry of the religious question a factor in their unprecedented avowals that they expected to win through an appeal to Catholic prejudice. As an illustration of this fact the Evening Herald of Boston (November 3 issue) relates in very plain language how this policy affected the result. An exchange of that city is alleged to have said, during a speech at the banquet of an Irish Catholic organization, that the State of Massachusetts "is largely Catholic and this element ought to control business, the schools and politics." When the votes were counted it was found, to the astonishment of the political managers, that this utterance had cost the loss of five places on the State ticket, and more besides all down the line. Those who were responsible for injecting the religious question into politics in the Old Bay State now realize that they were dealing with a higher explosive than dynamite.

Massachusetts was not the only State in which the religious question was dragged into the campaign. It was a factor in New York and Illinois, and in each case the attempt dropped down to defeat. In fact it was designed to aid. Commenting on the subject, our contemporary, The Churchman of New York, in its issue of November 7, says:

> It was easily to be guessed by any observer of politics that the candidacy of the party which makes a political issue of its Roman Catholic Church, have had a large influence in bringing into the realm of sectarian feeling. The [illegible] of the Roman Catholic religious press are often inspired to utterances more remote from reasoned or conciliatory statements or debate. In a free country freedom of speech is a privilege for all, but it also has its responsibilities. It is hardly surprising that the extraordinary language used by Roman Catholics in their antagonism to the public schools should be made to test its apparent validation. Rhetoric is a good servant but a poor master. Allowing for the attachment of the masses of the people of the country to the public school system, for which they have made so many sacrifices, the surprising thing is not that there is some small, inconsiderable revolt against the efforts of clerical journals and ecclesiastical wire-pullers to overturn its existence, but rather that a more decided movement has not come into being to make evident where the majority of American citizens stand on this important question. One of the best methods of arousing sectarianism in politics is to realize that no form of ecclesiastical propaganda will be tolerated in this republic.

It is with the Catholic press, prelates and politicians that the responsibility lies for dragging religion into politics. It began with the boastful proclamation of the plan to "make America Catholic," which raised a storm of protest all over the country. It was continued in their violent attacks on the public schools, and it has again been rebuked, this time at the polls. It would probably be too much to expect that they will profit by the lesson. The Churchman points the moral of the whole situation when it declares, in words that deserve to be remembered, that "no form of ecclesiastical propaganda will be tolerated in this republic."

A Crisis in Missions

THAT foreign missionary work is facing a real crisis, in consequence of the war, is becoming increasingly evident. Reports from India, Africa, Egypt, Armenia, Syria, Persia and other countries directly affected, disclose the fact that the missionaries are facing new and serious difficulties and that in many places they are living under precarious conditions. In India there is a very considerable number of workers whose regular appropriations from the Home Board have apparently failed since the beginning of the war, and who are compelled to appeal for aid elsewhere. Just what conditions are among the missions in Armenia, with Turkey now an active belligerent, can perhaps better be imagined than described. In Palestine mission work of all kinds is suspended. Even the remote islands of the Southern Pacific have felt the blight in the temporary paralysis of missionary effort. China—the one great Asiatic neutral—has a flood, a famine and a revolution all its own and is therefore on an equality of misery with the others.

This is a time for the churches of Christian America to do what lies in their power by helping these faithful workers to meet this wholly unforeseen crisis which has come to missions generally. It would be little less than a calamity if the work to any great extent should come to a standstill; yet it is by no means improbable that many of the workers will be temporarily withdrawn. Indeed, we learn that in certain fields spiritual, medical and industrial work is now virtually suspended, and may not be resumed until the end of the war.

Our National Defenses

HISTORY has its warnings for nations and governments, and the epoch making age in which we are now living is full of lessons of tremendous import. It would be useless to deny that a very marked change in public sentiment on the question of adequate armament for defense has taken place here since the outbreak of the European War. Even the leaders of the peace movement are beginning to view the question from a new standpoint, and to admit that there may be sound reason after all in the principle that adequate defense is an essential safeguard, if not the only one, in the present stage of the world's progress.

There is little danger that the administration, governed as it is by considerations that look to peace and justice in all its relations, will be stampeded by the efforts made in and out of Congress to force any very considerable increase of our present armament. Sensational statements to that effect should be discredited. We may build two battleships yearly, following the present administration program, or we may even do more; but it is not probable that there will be any material increase in the personnel of either branch of national defense. We may look for an increase in the number of submarines, aeroplanes and other auxiliaries, as well as the adoption of measures looking to greater efficiency and more modern equipment generally.

This does not, however, imply that we have discovered in the present situation any valid reason why this government should seriously contemplate such changes and improvements in our defensive system as would lead us to enter the ruinous competition in huge armaments. We have seen how these failed to conduce to peace in Europe, but rather aided in precipitating the war. It has been very clearly shown that a nation armed to the teeth is the nation which most readily finds provocation to war. We are at peace with the whole world, and, with God's help, should strive so to remain. Let our defenses be adequate to our needs and no more. Maintaining friendly relations with other Powers, and standing honorably by our international obligations, we must keep steadily in view the great basic truth that "righteousness exalteth a nation," and is the best of safeguards.

Our Relief Cargo on the Way

IT WILL be welcome news to those who have so generously contributed to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Widows and Orphans War Relief Fund to read the "deferred" cablegram from Mr. Theodore Waters, from London, which appears on another page. As you read these lines, you have the gratifying assurance that this cargo of six hundred tons of wholesome, life-giving food is now being distributed in Belgium, the scene of greatest need, and exclusively to the "Silent Sufferers"—the widows and orphans. The distribution is under the auspices of our ambassador, Hon. Brand Whitlock, and Governor Von der Goltz and the German authorities in Belgium have accorded ample facilities for the work, so that it may proceed satisfactorily and uninterruptedly. There are many thousands of homeless and destitute in and around Antwerp, the widows and orphans among whom are doubtless now receiving aid from the CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. This first cargo costs $40,000, which has been paid out of the fund contributions. Arrangements will be made for other cargoes to follow at short intervals. Those who have not yet contributed to the fund should lose no time in becoming personally identified with this great work of international benevolence, by sending their contributions without delay.

Comment by the Way

—ACCORDING to the NOVEMBER estimate of the Department of Agriculture, the corn crop will reach a total of 2,705,692,000 bushels, which at the prevailing high prices caused by the war would represent a value of $1,885,867,374. Some crop that! Equal to more than three times the value of our wheat, and two and a half times the aggregate of our oats. Corn is easily the King of American cereals.

—"BABY-SAVING DAY" is a Boston idea conceived in the kindly spirit of helping to decrease infant mortality by teaching to mothers and nurses essential truths concerning child-training in infancy. Poor little, helpless mite, the baby is the great future factor of the nation. Yet so little do we now safeguard the babies that authorities assert that of the total mortality in the first year of childhood, the greater number die during the first month.

—A WOMAN MEDICAL MISSIONARY stationed at Ambala, India, writes to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions: "Two hundred and seventy of the medical missionaries have offered their services to the viceroy to take up the work of civil surgeons in addition to their own, if such surgeons need to go into war service. The great Indian ladies are organizing societies for relief of the wounded and distressed. They also join the English societies for the same purpose. Several of us hope to join soon. The whole place is an array of uniforms and grim war ships, but no spark of gayety. For days the fact that the viceroy's son was wounded was kept secret. His daughter, a young girl, is with him. The response to the government to men and money has been marvelous. Great Rajpoot chiefs have come with their state troops to the front in the army of 70,000 English and natives living in India."

Our Thanksgiving Cover

BLUE skies and true skies with autumn's haze below them;
Haystacks steep and yellow in the sunlight's golden glow;
Pumpkins lying wreathed in vines that creep away to show them;
Crimson leaves upon the bough and apples down below.

Light air and bright air with joy and laughter ringing;
Pipes of Pan and gipsy calls that tingle on the breeze;
Brooks that dance above the stones—a million anthems singing;
Flocks of birds that flutter South among the highest trees.

Small prayers and all prayers that fly to God, the Master;
Harvest-time within our souls and peace within our land;
Eyes filled with happy tears and hearts that heed the Master;
Benedictions from the Lord and bounty from his hand.

American Discovery of Aeroplane

THE aeroplane has become such an enormously significant fact that several nations have been contesting for the honor of its discovery. The question has, within the last few days, been settled forever in favor of the Wright brothers as the discoverers of the heavier-than-air flying machines, by the award of $75,000 by the English Government for the use of their ideas in the construction of new war aeroplanes. The Wright patents had been sustained in the courts of the United States and of France, and this action of the British Government leaves America the undisputed honor of having given to the world aerial navigation. Some think that the Wrights should have given to the world free the use of their discovery, but they had a perfect right to whatever financial reward it would justly bring to them. In the history of the world those who have made discoveries of greatest benefit to mankind have been poor men, who have remained poor all their lives. The rich men who have financed the projects have generally taken possession of the patents and left the geniuses that made the inventions in poverty. One exception to the rule was Edison, the poor train boy and telegraph operator, who always managed to keep a majority of the stock of the companies financing his inventions. Another exception is the Wright brothers, who were wise enough to reap their share of the reward of the great discovery. One of the brothers was translated at the very beginning of his fame and wealth, the other remains. In the award of the British Government to the Wright brothers there has been obedience to this apostolic injunction: "Render therefore to all their dues, tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom; honor to whom honor." (Rom. 13: 7.)

Died of Broken Heart

MOSES CANTOR, a rabbi, who had a religious school in Brooklyn, told his young pupils the other day that he was feeling very bad. He had received a letter from his wife in Russia, telling him that his eldest son and namesake, who was only twenty-one, had been killed in battle in Russian Poland. He showed the children a picture of the boy and was telling them what a beautiful character he was and how good he was to his parents and brothers and sisters, when he sank into a chair, exclaiming that he was dying. The cries of the children of the school brought in neighbors, who sent to the hospital for a physician and an ambulance, but when they arrived the surgeon pronounced the rabbi dead, saying that he had died of a broken heart. The mind has such an effect on the body. The body is especially susceptible to the presence of the affections. Extreme joy or sorrow often kills the body. Removal of loved ones so often breaks down the health and life. Women loving their husbands or husbands their wives, parents parting with children or children with parents, often fade and pine away and die. The love of parent for the child, of father for the son, which is stronger than life itself, is thus expressed by the patriarch: "My son shall not go down with you; if mischief befall him by the way in which ye go, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave." (Gen. 42: 38.)

Cattle Epidemic Worst Ever Known

THE hoof and mouth cattle disease, now afflicting the country, is far worse than any former case. This is the sixth epidemic of the kind. So contagious is the disease that if it is discovered in one animal the rest of the herd are about sure to have it. While the mortality is not high, the animals that recover are useless and have to be killed. Veterinary surgeons agree that the only way to combat the disease is to stop all movement of all stock and materials that have been exposed to danger, and to kill off without delay all herds in which the disease has gained a foothold. The animals killed are buried in a covering of lime and the owners are reimbursed for the loss. The disease attacks sheep and swine as well as cattle. The stockyards of the quarantined States are closed and Federal and State authorities are inspecting, diagnosing, quarantining and killing, and it is to be hoped that the fearful disease will be stopped soon. Whoever was to blame for letting the blight get such a start, nobody must be to blame in failure to use heroic efforts to end it. They had cattle diseases in olden times. The murrain was a contagious kind of pneumonia that often destroyed the herd. There is this mention made of it in the punishment of the Egyptians: "There shall be a very grievous murrain. And the Lord did that thing on the morrow, and all the cattle of Egypt died." (Ex. 9: 3, 6.)

OLD-FASHIONED THANKSGIVING DINNER

FROM the very beginning the homecoming and the dinner have been an important feature of the American Thanksgiving Day. The gathering of father, mother, brother, sister, grandchildren and loved ones about the table and the turkey to enjoy and renew a consecrated family love as well as to express gratitude to the Giver of all good, is one of the most beautiful pictures of our American life. There are always invisible guests at the Thanksgiving dinner. Sometimes there are vacant chairs placed at the table for those who always are with the living in memory and love. We are grateful for our record harvests, for our health, prosperity and peace. We have especial cause of gratitude for the loyalty and love of our Christian homes on which the nation stands secure. The Thanksgiving dinner suggests generous gifts to those who are destitute, a realm of perpetual thanksgiving, and home gatherings never to be broken. The Jews had their annual day of national thanksgiving at the close of the harvest. "Give thanks unto the Lord, call upon his name, make known his deeds among the people." (I Chron. 16: 8)

Mikado Aids Christian Hospital

EMPEROR YOSHIHITO has donated 50,000 yen ($25,000) toward the foundation of St. Luke's International Hospital at Tokyo, which will be conducted by the Protestant Episcopal mission. The announcement of the imperial gift to a Christian institution, which is without precedent, was made by Count Okuma, premier, at a luncheon given on November 9, attended by fifty of Tokyo's most prominent persons. Count Okuma said the emperor was desirous of solidifying international understanding. The emperor's father was the founder of the new Japan, bringing his nation from absolutism into liberty and into widest influence in modern times. The son, in continuing the old emperor's policies of enlightenment, shows good judgment. Whether the Mikado was conscious of the fact or not, he acted under the impulse of the spirit of our Christ, and will some day realize the truth of Christ's expression about the issues of the last day, that acts of love done to his children are done to him and that they will be rewarded as such. "And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." (Matt. 25: 40.)

Great Britain Annexes Cyprus

ON November 5 England formally announced that she had annexed the island of Cyprus to her possessions. The concussion of the war loosened the frail hold Turkey had upon the island and left it to fall easily into the hands of England. Though nominally owned by Turkey, Cyprus has been practically a British possession for years. In 1878 the British occupied the island under the provision of the celebrated Turkish convention to keep possession till such a time as Russia should return to Turkey Batum, Kars and Erzerum. England has been paying the Porte $464,000 a year as rent. The island has been ruled by an English high commission, and in the interest of British trade. The island is 140 miles long by 60 miles wide. It is very valuable and has played an important part in the history of the world. It has been owned in turn by the Egyptians, the Persians, the Greeks and the Romans. For centuries Cyprus has been marched over by Moslems and Christians, staining the soil with blood and succeeding each other in authority. It is likely that the Moslem has had his hand on this historic country for the last time. Copper mining of the past reached its climax in Cyprus under the Phœnicians and Romans. The word copper is derived from the name of the island. Paul and Barnabas, sent of the Holy Ghost on the mission to the Gentiles, went to the island of Cyprus, where they preached the Gospel of Christ, which the Roman adopted as the basis of his individual character and national life. "So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed unto Seleucia; and from thence they sailed to Cyprus." (Acts 13: 4.)

Swiss Independence Day

DISTINGUISHED representatives from the home government, and Americans born in Switzerland, united the other night in New York in the celebration of the six hundred and twenty-second anniversary of the independence of Switzerland. The earliest inhabitants of Switzerland were the Celtic Helvetii and the Rhætii, who were partly subdued by Julius Caesar and completely conquered by Augustus Cæsar. In 1848 it became a federal state and in 1874 it enlarged its life and liberty, imitating our American republic. There is said to be more trade per capita in Switzerland than in any other European country. The inhabitants are industrious, thrifty, educated, moral and religious. Switzerland, with its national happiness, and thrift, and Christian faith, and courage, verifies the truth of this statement: "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." (John 8: 36.)

Mothers or Police?

FIVE million dollars in one year is the income that pensioned mothers in nineteen States will receive this year, under the system of which Judge Henry Neil is the father. This system is simple: A mother's business is to take care of her own children in her own home. If the husband and father dies, is ill or deserts and leaves the wife and children dependent, they still must have three meals a day, shelter, clothing, schooling, and hope of progress. The old way was to force the mother to go out to do work for the children of some other mother. Her own children were placed in asylums, poorhouses and other institutions. Now money formerly paid to asylums, hospitals, jails and other institutions goes to the mother as a pension. It is a beautiful thing to help distressed mothers maintain their homes. It is contrary to the very law of our nature to separate a mother and her children. God loves the family. "A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation." (Ps. 68: 5.)

HOME EDUCATION FOR CHILDREN

IN May, 1913, the Home Education Division of the United States Bureau of Education was established by Commissioner P. P. Claxton. Experience had shown that such a division was necessary and desirable, and Miss Ellen C. Lombard was later made chief of the division. Miss Lombard was then superintendent of practice in the Wheelock Kindergarten Training School of Boston.

The object of the division was stated to be "to help parents in regard to the care of home education of their children with reference to health, games and plays, early mental development, and formation of moral habits, to interest boys and girls who have left school and are still at home by directing their home reading and study to further their education."

The National Congress of Mothers agreed to assist the new bureau in a work which it had itself been conducting since 1897. The great need for this branch of education had been demonstrated, and the Bureau of Education in the establishment of the Home Education Division recognized the desire of over 100,000 mothers that education in child nurture and homemaking should be available to every parent.

The Home Education Division carried out the plan successfully inaugurated by the National Congress of Mothers, to reach home through the organization of Parent Teacher Associations in schools, for child study, for co-operation of parents and teachers, and for study of conditions affecting children in the community.

In this connection Miss Lombard says:

"In furtherance of this plan, a letter was sent to county school superintendents in every school district in town, village or open country up to 2,500 inhabitants, asking for the names of two women in each school who would be interested to co-operate with the Home Education Division in calling the parents together to organize for the above objects. The names of 23,930 women were received before September 15, 1913, the date the Home Education Division was actually opened.

"The first work was to send letters to these women, explaining the nature of the work and asking their co-operation. All printed instructions concerning this were supplied by and sent out at the expense of the National Congress of Mothers. Favorable and enthusiastic responses were received in hundreds of letters." As a result many parent teacher associations have been organized.

The division has collated information in regard to lantern slides of an educational nature, which are available for use in parent teacher associations, and lists are now ready to send out to any who are interested. Requests have come from mothers in every State. The division aims to reach rural and isolated communities where conditions are as shown in the following extracts from letters received by the division:

"Send all the information you can to these mothers. We are 15 miles from a doctor. So many women die." "Many women in this district live 50 to 100 miles from a physician." "We are 40 miles from town and need help for ourselves and our children." "We are 28 miles from the nearest post office. We need help."

In their letters, the mothers ask for help in choosing literature, in reading courses for themselves, and for their children who have no access to public libraries and very little social life.

Other mothers ask for bulletins on home matters; literature for a population of Swedes, Cornish, Germans, Dutch and Irish; bulletins on homemaking and child nurture; material for home study for girls and boys; literature on moral training; on minerals, mining, dry farming, care of stock and homestead matters; books suitable to children who have completed the common school course; literature on the beautifying of the school within and without; reading matter on plays and games; suggestions for organizing sewing and cooking classes; suggestions for interesting boys in gardening and farm work; literature for information necessary for the formation of a parent teacher association.

In cases of urgent need a few books on home matters, child training, etc., loaned from the bureau's library to mothers in remote communities, have been used by the entire community. In States where traveling libraries are established, parents who need help are recommended to get in touch with them.

A letter and blank form were sent to 1,539 women in various States, asking them to send the names of mothers having children under three years of age, and of prospective mothers in their school district. In answer the names of 10,500 mothers have been sent to the division, and each one has since received either a bulletin on The Care of the Baby, published by the Public Health Service, or The Care of the Baby in Hot Weather, published by the National Congress of Mothers.

The reading course, which has been prepared for parents with the co-operation of specialists in these matters, includes books on child development; marriage and the sex problem; child nature; parenthood; ethical and moral training; home economics; the boy and girl problem; wholesome fiction, cookery and domestic science.

Pamphlets on games and plays for children in the home and on decoration of home and school are being prepared. One of these, and probably the first to be issued by the division, will be entitled Amusements in the Home. This will contain a general introduction on the function of play, education of the child through play, suggestions to mothers in regard to the kind of play that can be carried on in the home. The games to be suggested will be for the mental, physical and moral development of the child.

The work aims to reach parents who want to develop their children along clean, healthy and right-thinking lines, and the opinion is expressed by those who have observed the progress made that the work has come to stay, and only needs the interest and co-operation of the good people of the country to become a fixed and permanent instrumentality for genuine uplift work.

RELIEF WORK IS UNDER WAY IN BELGIUM

AT LAST we can give you the glowing satisfaction of knowing that your gifts for the innocent victims of the war are actually doing the good you intended. In no other calamity calling for material aid from the world at large has there been so much to overcome in reaching the sufferers. The conditions imposed by the circumstances of war have given way for the safe passage of relief supplies to non-combatants only after the utmost effort by diplomatic representatives of this and other countries. And now, as regards Belgium, the American Commission for Relief in Belgium, located in London, has been enabled to open a way right into the midst of the suffering.

Mr. Waters, secretary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was prompt to seize the first opportunity to purchase and send into Belgium a cargo of food supplies, which he accompanies, to be distributed under the auspices of the American ambassador to Belgium, Mr. Brand Whitlock. All possible precautions are being taken to insure these supplies reaching the widows and orphans only. We hope to have early reports from Mr. Waters direct from the scene of suffering.

ABOUT 800,000 starving Belgians have taken refuge in Holland; four times as many as have gone to England, and a number equal to one-quarter the entire population of Holland. If these poor people could have fled in families their suffering would be less. But that is not the case. A correspondent of the Globe (London) writes of seeing the refugees standing gazing at trees on the roadside. When he went near he found that on the tree tips of paper were nailed, which read as follows: "Pierre ——, your wife passed this way; she will wait for you at Rozendaal"; a mile farther the same message was repeated on another tree. So the refugees wander from tree to tree, seeking news of their loved ones. This writer saw a father carrying an infant and leading two more children, all crying, and hurrying from tree to tree in hopes of good news.

Miss Walsh, a worker for the International Women's Committee, from whom we have heard before, writes from Vanghent, near the Belgian frontier: "At a village named Axel I passed an old hut, formerly used as a potato cellar, with no window, on the shores of the canal; and in that dark, damp place sat a woman, all alone, holding a day-old baby. It was bitter cold. The refugees overrun the barns, take down unfinished buildings to build huts with, sleep in factories, now that the rains make the fields impossible. Now that they can no longer sleep on the ground and out of doors, difficulties are more pressing. Holland has only its own food supply assured for the winter. If it can give them a tin pannikin of soup daily that is all it can do."

Another writer in an English paper tells of seeing a load of refugees landing at Braydunes. They had embarked at Ostend in a fishing smack, carrying their pots and pans and even the family rabbits. They were without money or clothing. There were in one family two old grandfathers, a young mother and not less than six children under seven. They had eaten nothing since starting but raw beets and fish that the crew gave them.

In another case 2,263 were crowded into an old collier. Some of these were rich, some poor; there was standing room only; all were packed like sardines between decks, with coal dust over everything. During the night room was made for the women with young children to sit down. This trip had lasted fourteen hours and the travelers were without food.

One woman, Marie Stroekins, fled from Arras with her babe three months old. Her husband was in the army, her home burned, the fields picked dry of potatoes and beets. For three days she walked, carrying the infant, till, arriving at Ostend, she hid in a steam dredger which was putting off at Dover. Two days and a night she stayed on the dredger. Then at Dover she transferred herself to a boat used for transporting horses, bound for Southampton, on which she stayed twenty-four hours longer. When she arrived at Southampton it was learned that all the food they had had since leaving Ostend was one quart of milk for the baby.

Later Marie Stroeckins was found dead in a refugee camp with her child asleep beside her. There was a note which said she had just learned that her husband had been killed. She said, in effect, "My hope in life has gone, I cannot struggle any more. If I go it will be one less to care for."

LAST week the Relief Fund amounted to $48,270.79. At noon of Friday, November 13, it had reached $57,834.88. Of this gratifying total $40,000 is now actually at work among the sufferers. A second cargo of foodstuffs, with perhaps new blankets and shawls, will go either from our own shores, or from England after purchase there, immediately it can be arranged and paid for.

We are hopeful that our readers will make Thanksgiving Day the occasion for a great outpouring of gifts for these unhappy people. The generosity of Christians should be an outstanding feature in the relief work in which many organizations are engaged. We would remind you that winter with all its terrors is upon the destitute in Europe. The cries of the widow and fatherless should be answered by the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. Ship after ship should leave our shores, in the name of our Christian people, loaded with the necessities of life for this particularly pitiable class of the war's victims. Let this great cry of suffering be answered in the midst of your thanksgiving.

A GOOD WORD

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received the following cablegram:

Western Union
Deferred Cablegram

LONDON, Nov. 12, 1914.

Christian Herald, New York:

Steamer Jan Block sailed Saturday, carrying Christian Herald relief cargo of 600 tons of flour, rice and peas to Belgium. I accompany same. This food will be distributed by ticket system to widows and orphans only, under auspices of Ambassador Whitlock. I will send photographs of loading, unloading, etc., and full reports by letter.

(Signed) THEODORE WATERS.

This first shipment by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of relief supplies was made possible by the remittance of $40,000 from the Fund. Mr. Waters will personally supervise the arrangements for distribution, and assurances have been given by the German Government that all necessary facilities will be granted. Other cargoes of foodstuffs for the Widows and Orphans of the war, not only in Belgium but in other countries, will be arranged for as rapidly as the Fund permits.

The Christian Herald Almanac for 1915

FROM the very first issue of The Christian Herald Almanac, its popularity has surpassed our expectations. Every year is an improvement on the last, and The Christian Herald Almanac for 1915, now ready for delivery, will excel its predecessors in interest and real value to general readers everywhere.

In multitudes of American homes, The Christian Herald Almanac has already become a fixed habit—they simply cannot keep house without it. They like it because "it is so different," and contains many distinctive features that give it a special value.

Its Great Variety

In addition to all the standard Almanac features, which include the monthly calendar, moon's phases, events of the year, etc., it gives a great deal of valuable information which people in town and country will welcome. It tells what the various departments of the government stand ready to do for the farmer, the rural householder and the city dweller. It gives a resume of the leading events of the great war, from the beginning up to November 1.

Religious Department

In the presentation of religious statistics it is without a rival. Here, every denomination is shown in its present strength and condition, and all the great movements in the churches of every creed throughout the land are set forth, without preference or distinction. It has a department of Hard Bible Questions, gems from the best pulpit utterances of our own day, a Home Efficiency department which housewives will especially value, a Health Department that will tell you just how to proceed in an emergency, and it has a host of other things that you want to know and which you will be glad to find in our Almanac. In these days, when every housewife should study domestic economy, the Almanac will be a special help in the kitchen, and the suggestions it contains will be the means of saving many a dollar in food selections and purchases.

Briefly, The Christian Herald Almanac is a handy compact Manual of the precise information you need from day to day in your home life, at your office, or store, or wherever you are employed. It deals with such a wide variety of subjects that you will be pleasantly surprised, and there is a combination "Contents and Index" which makes it easy to find just what you want without loss of time. The book has a hole punched through the upper left hand corner so that you may hang it in any convenient place in the house or office where it will be within reach.

100 Pages of Facts and Figures. The Almanac will be sent prepaid if you will add 10c to your subscription, new or renewal

The Girl with a Dominant Keynote!

The "Do-Something" Book

JANICE DAY

By HELEN BEECHER LONG

THIS is easily a leader among the Books of the Season, and will be an inspiration to the Young Womanhood of America. Janice is a real girl, all alive and with a glorious determination to "do things."—And she does them with astonishing success and still more surprising results.

After reading the book right through, this is what Mr. Nathaniel C. Fowler of Boston wrote of the heroine:

"Janice Day is one of the purest, sweetest, most natural characters allowed to live within the covers of a book. I never resided in Polktown. I do not know where it is; but, if I had lived there a dozen years, I shouldn't know it better than I do today.

"The author has taken a real girl, not an exaggerated type of femininity, placed her in a real country town, and made her do real things.

"The book is an inspiration and no one can read it, whether he is as old as I am or young as Janice, without having some of the good stick to him, and without feeling that there is a lot of good in this bad world of ours, which would rather rise to the surface than stay under ground."

Ever meet a girl with a keynote, that kept sounding all through everything she did? That's Janice Day—or her twin. Full of fine resolve, high-minded but a fascinating and altogether delightful companion. They "walk with angels" who meet such women; yet for all that, Janice is a real flesh-and-blood young person, so very much alive, you will confess after you have felt the thrill of the book, that one finds himself looking at her surroundings through her eyes, and he is sluggish indeed if he doesn't see and do something he would otherwise have overlooked.

We won't attempt to tell you here just what surprising times Janice had on Uncle Jason's farm, nor how she adventured among Mexican outlaws and tripped quite unconsciously into the limelight as a real heroine. You must travel along with this entertaining young person yourself, if you really wish to know her and how she came out in the end. And when you've been through it all, we wish you would write us saying, very frankly, just what you think of Janice. We don't expect that any two verdicts will precisely coincide; for our up-to-date, clear-eyed, right-hearted American girl with a mission is liable to have as many contrasting points of character as there are facets in the biggest diamond and to be quite as mysterious as the Sphinx. But there's nothing mysterious about Janice. She is simply a sweet and attractive American girl, an introduction to whom is a sure antidote for laziness and who inspires one with a new zest for living.

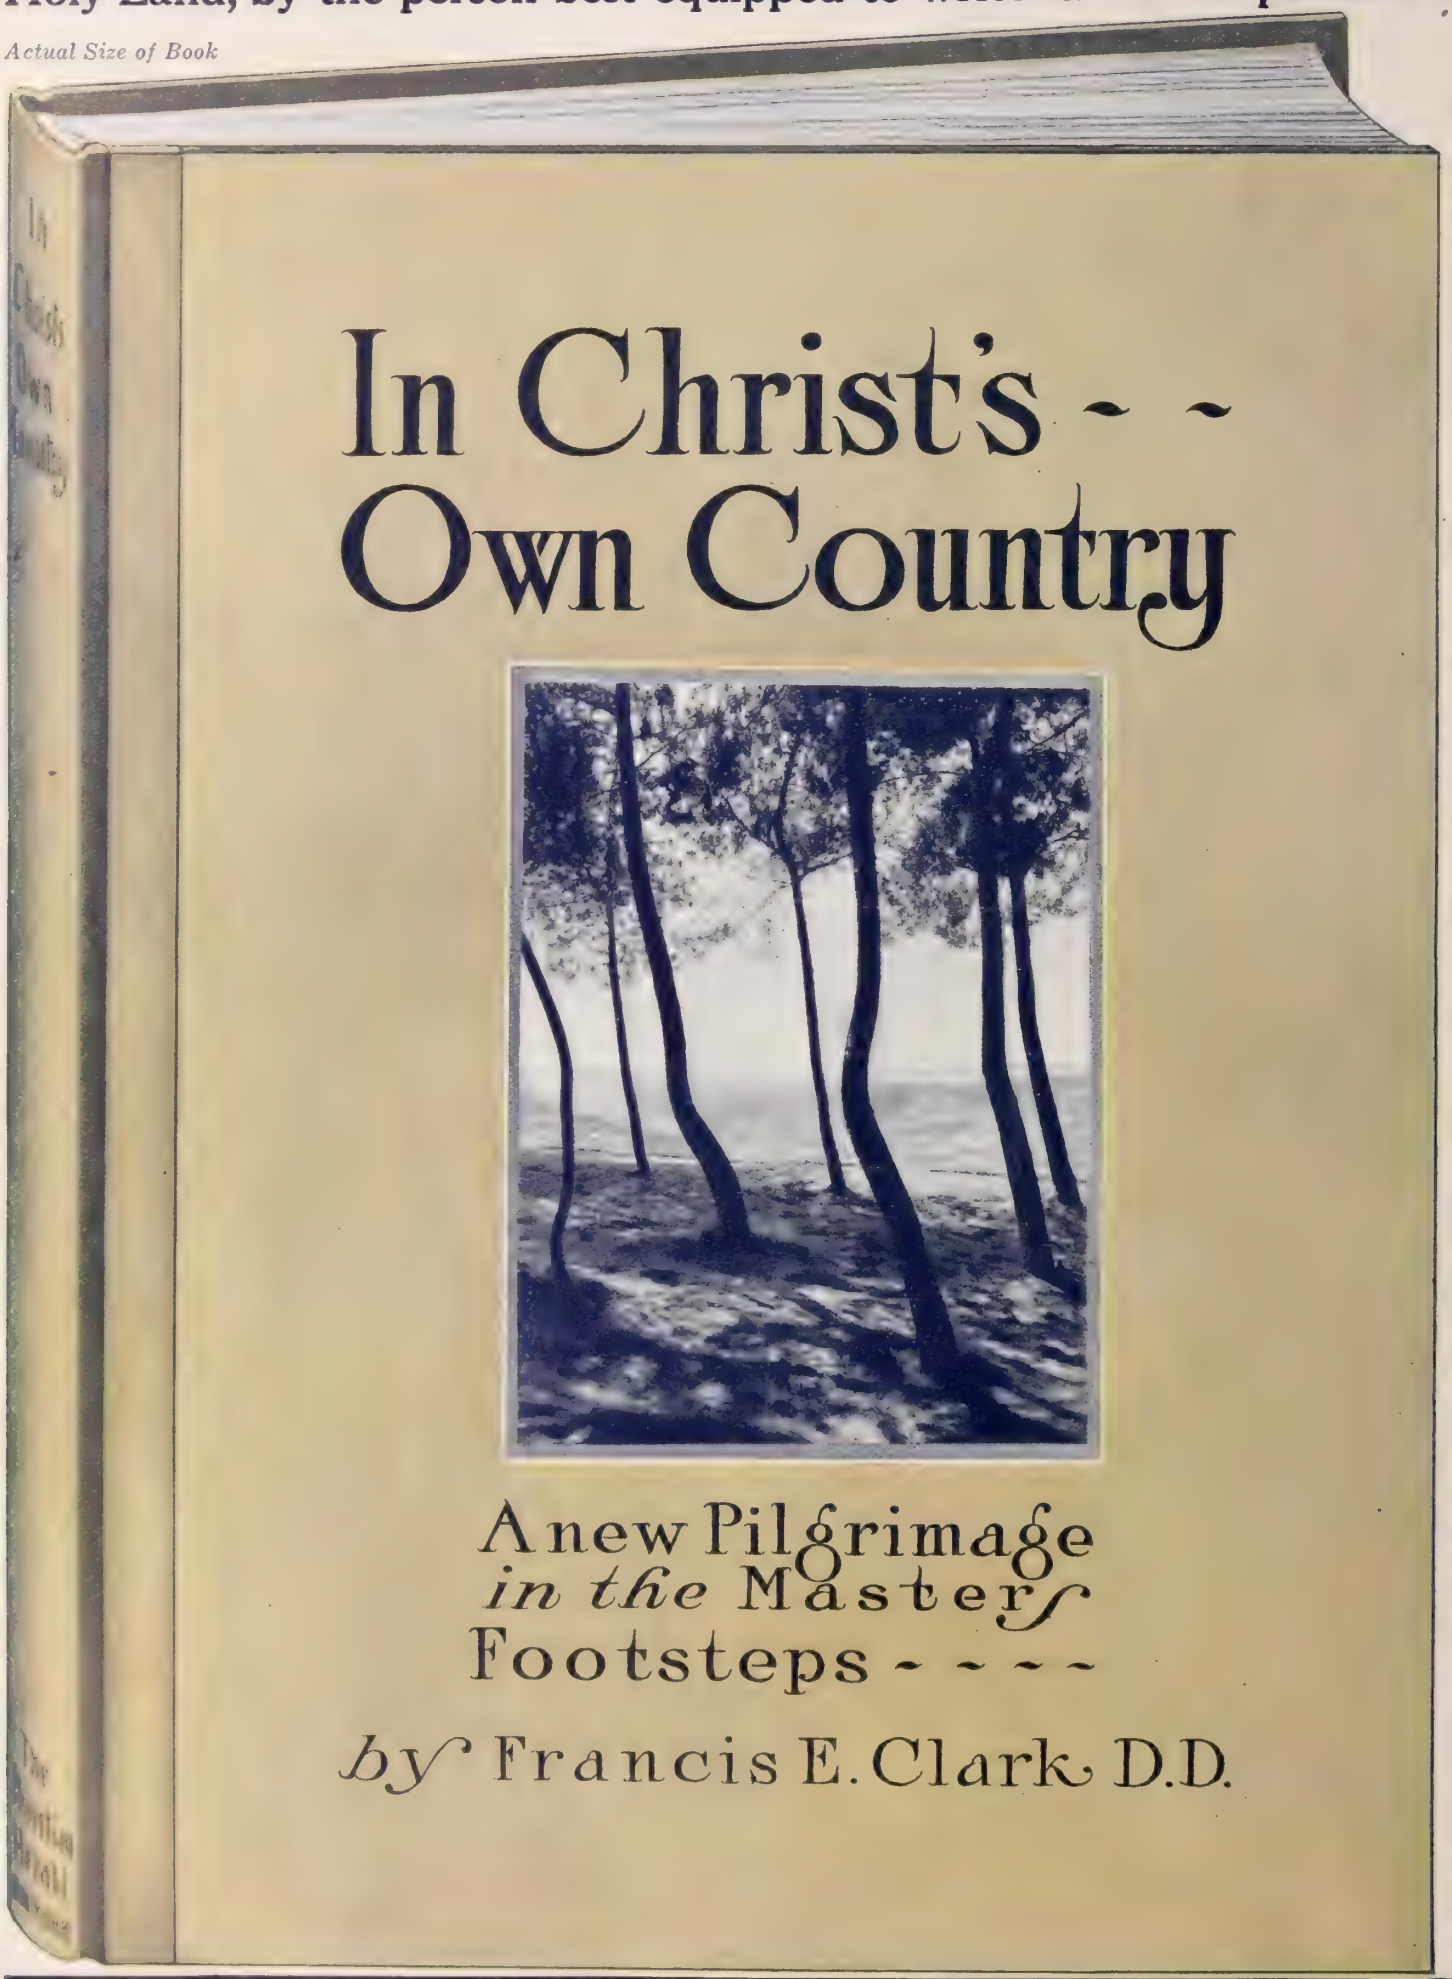
In Christ's Own Country

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D., President of the World's Christian Endeavor Union

This is one of the very latest and best illustrated of authentic books of travel in the Holy Land, by the person best equipped to write it. In his preface Dr. Clark says:

Actual Size of Book



"It is my desire in this volume to be eyes and ears and feet for my readers. . . . We will view together not only the holy spots which thousands of travelers, at the expense of thousands of dollars, have traveled thousands of miles to see, but we will occasionally stop to look at the people in their shops, in the coffee houses, in their homes and at their bench."

WITH CHRIST IN THOUGHT

Dr. Clark not only takes us to the land of Christ, but brings Christ back to it. He wipes away both time and distance, and brings us side by side with the Master.

With Him we walk the ways that He walked, see the scenes as He saw them, and mingle with the people with whom He mingled.

We are truly with Christ in His own Country

WITH CHRIST IN SPIRIT

Equal to Dr. Clark's great power of description is his rare power of spiritual interpretation. He brings us side by side with Christ both in sense and spirit.

We seem not only to feel His presence and to hear Him speak; we thrill at His touch, and our minds and souls open wide to His message. We seem to see the miracles done with our own eyes. The parables come with new and deeper meaning.

Divisions of the Book

The Gateway of the Holy Land
Jesus, the Joy of the Whole Earth
Nazareth, His Boyhood Home
Around the Sea of Galilee
In the North Country
The Little Town of Bethlehem
On the Way to Nazareth
Beyond the Jordan
The Walk Beside the Lake
In and Around Ancient Shechem
From Jericho to Jerusalem

Dr. Clark's book is the next best thing to a personal pilgrimage to Palestine.

There are fifty-three fine photographic illustrations, taken by Mrs. Clark, who accompanied her husband on this journey through Palestine. They bring to the mind what the text brings to the heart. There are also several superb four-color, full-page photographs (size of plate 5¼ by 7 inches), which will be greatly appreciated.

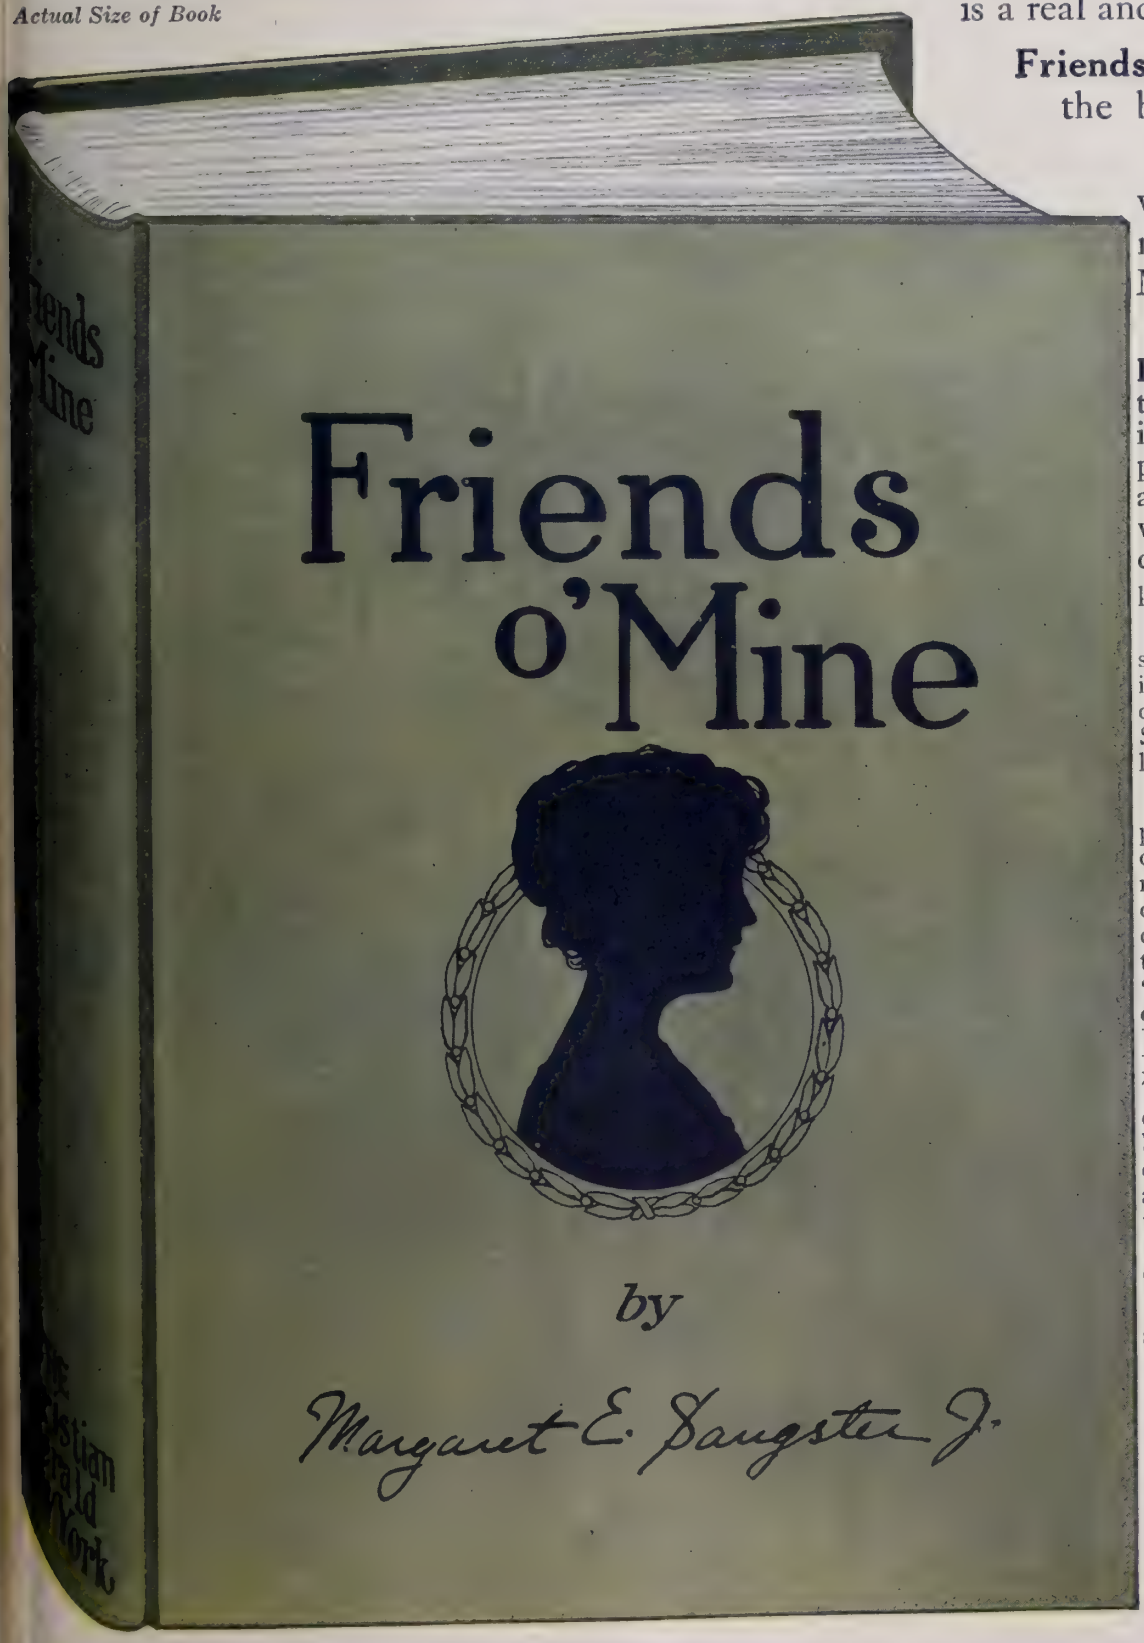
FRIENDS O' MINE

A Book of Poems and Stories

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

PEOPLE like a poet who sings as a bird sings—just for the love of it. Fears have been expressed that this divine gift might be dying out in the busy, noisy life of these modern days. But here and there the note is heard, the note that springs free, full of melody, full of real gladness, or real wistfulness, or real courage—the note of a true poet's song. The poems of Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., are like that. But there is far more than beauty and courage in these new songs. There is a real and deep sympathy.

Actual Size of Book



Friends o' Mine tells the story of the book.

It would be hard to find a young woman in America upon whom so many people look as a friend as Miss Sangster.

Her weekly messages in The Christian Herald are filled with kindly and helpful thoughts, and now and again in her writings there slips in, half unconsciously, the phrase, "Friends o' Mine." Her poems and articles are friendly songs and talks with people who, either through personal correspondence or through reading her published work, have come to love her.

There is a peculiar charm, a gracefulness and sweetness in her lyrics, showing that she has inherited, to a very large extent, the literary gifts of her distinguished relative, the late Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, who was for many years the most widely loved poet in the American home circle.

Friends o' Mine includes love poems, stirring poems on the war, on religion, on the home life, on the holiday season, and on a large variety of miscellaneous subjects, the whole constituting a delightful collection of about seventy-five poems, covering a wide range of subjects. Some of the titles are "The Ballade of the Sleeping Princess," "The Firelight and You," "The Question," "Lad o' Mine," "The King and the Beggar," "The Unreturning," "The Ballad of Happiness," "Betty's Bonnet," "The Terror of the Sea," "My World." Then there are war songs—songs full of the clash of battle and of heartbreak for the sufferings of the battlefield and for the homes which war has plundered. It would be hard to find in all literature a finer climax than that of the three last lines of the three stanzas of "The War God." "Dreams—Is It?" and "Machree" are among the charming dialect poems of the volume.

Then there are love-songs, and pastel sketches, and pieces like "The Blue Bowl," "The Gypsy Spirit," which bring the reader face to face with life and its problems and its promises of rich blessing. Some of the short stories in her book have won high praise from the critics. One leading editor, well known in magazine circles, declared that she had written "the best short story he had seen in a year." "The Onlooker," "The Punishment," and "Heredity," which, with many others, appear for the first time in the present volume, will be read with keen appreciation .

$1.85 We will send you, postpaid, a copy of "FRIENDS O' MINE" and The Christian Herald for one full year for only $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, a copy of "FRIENDS O' MINE" as a reward for sending in their own renewal and one new yearly subscription to The Christian Herald, together with $3.00. $1.85

A New Book of Reference for Bible Readers of All Denominations

EVER had a question about the right and wrong of something you wanted to do come up in your mind? Ever find yourself unable to say just what the Bible teaches on some point? Ever had some little, seemingly easy question about some subject in the Bible trip you up and humiliate you before others, because you could not rightly answer it?

Here are some of the questions thoroughly treated in this remarkable volume:

What is the call to the ministry?
Has a man two natures?
Is misfortune a judgment of God?
Is it right to ask for definite blessings?
When and why was the Sabbath changed?
Is being tempted a sin?

Is trouble sent as a punishment?
Can one be saved without knowing it?
What is transubstantiation?
Is wealth an evil or a blessing?
What is Christian conduct?
Is confession a Christian duty?

What is conscience?
Does God send disease?
How can I get rid of doubt?
Is falsehood ever justifiable?
Can the church heal by faith today?
Should a Christian marry a non-Christian?

Are we punished for sins while yet on earth?
What is the "unpardonable sin"?
Is sinlessness possible?
What and where is the Kingdom of God?
What was the "forbidden fruit"?
What was the "gift of tongues"?

Who were the "spirits in prison"?
Did Christ sing any hymns?
What is known concerning the "tree of life"?
What was Jesus' first sermon?
Could Jesus sin?
What prayer did Christ offer at the Last Supper?

Was the Ascension in human form?
What language did Christ use on earth?
Was Christ omniscient in the flesh?
Who was the little child that Jesus blessed?
What does "making friends of Mammon" mean?
What is the "new birth"?

And over five hundred other equally important questions.

You can answer part of the above questions; can you answer them all—according to the Scriptures?

This book is the result of research covering a period of twenty-four years. Its theology is thoroughly sound, being along the lines followed by the ablest living orthodox expositors. For twenty-four years, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been conducting a chair in Biblical questions. Thousands of intelligent inquiries, addressed to this chair, have covered practically every phase of Christian living and Biblical difficulty. These answers have helped myriads over hard places. This book is a unique addition to Biblical literature. It will be found a handbook that the user will greatly value and love. We believe this book may become one of the most used of all Bible helps. Published in attractive and durable style.

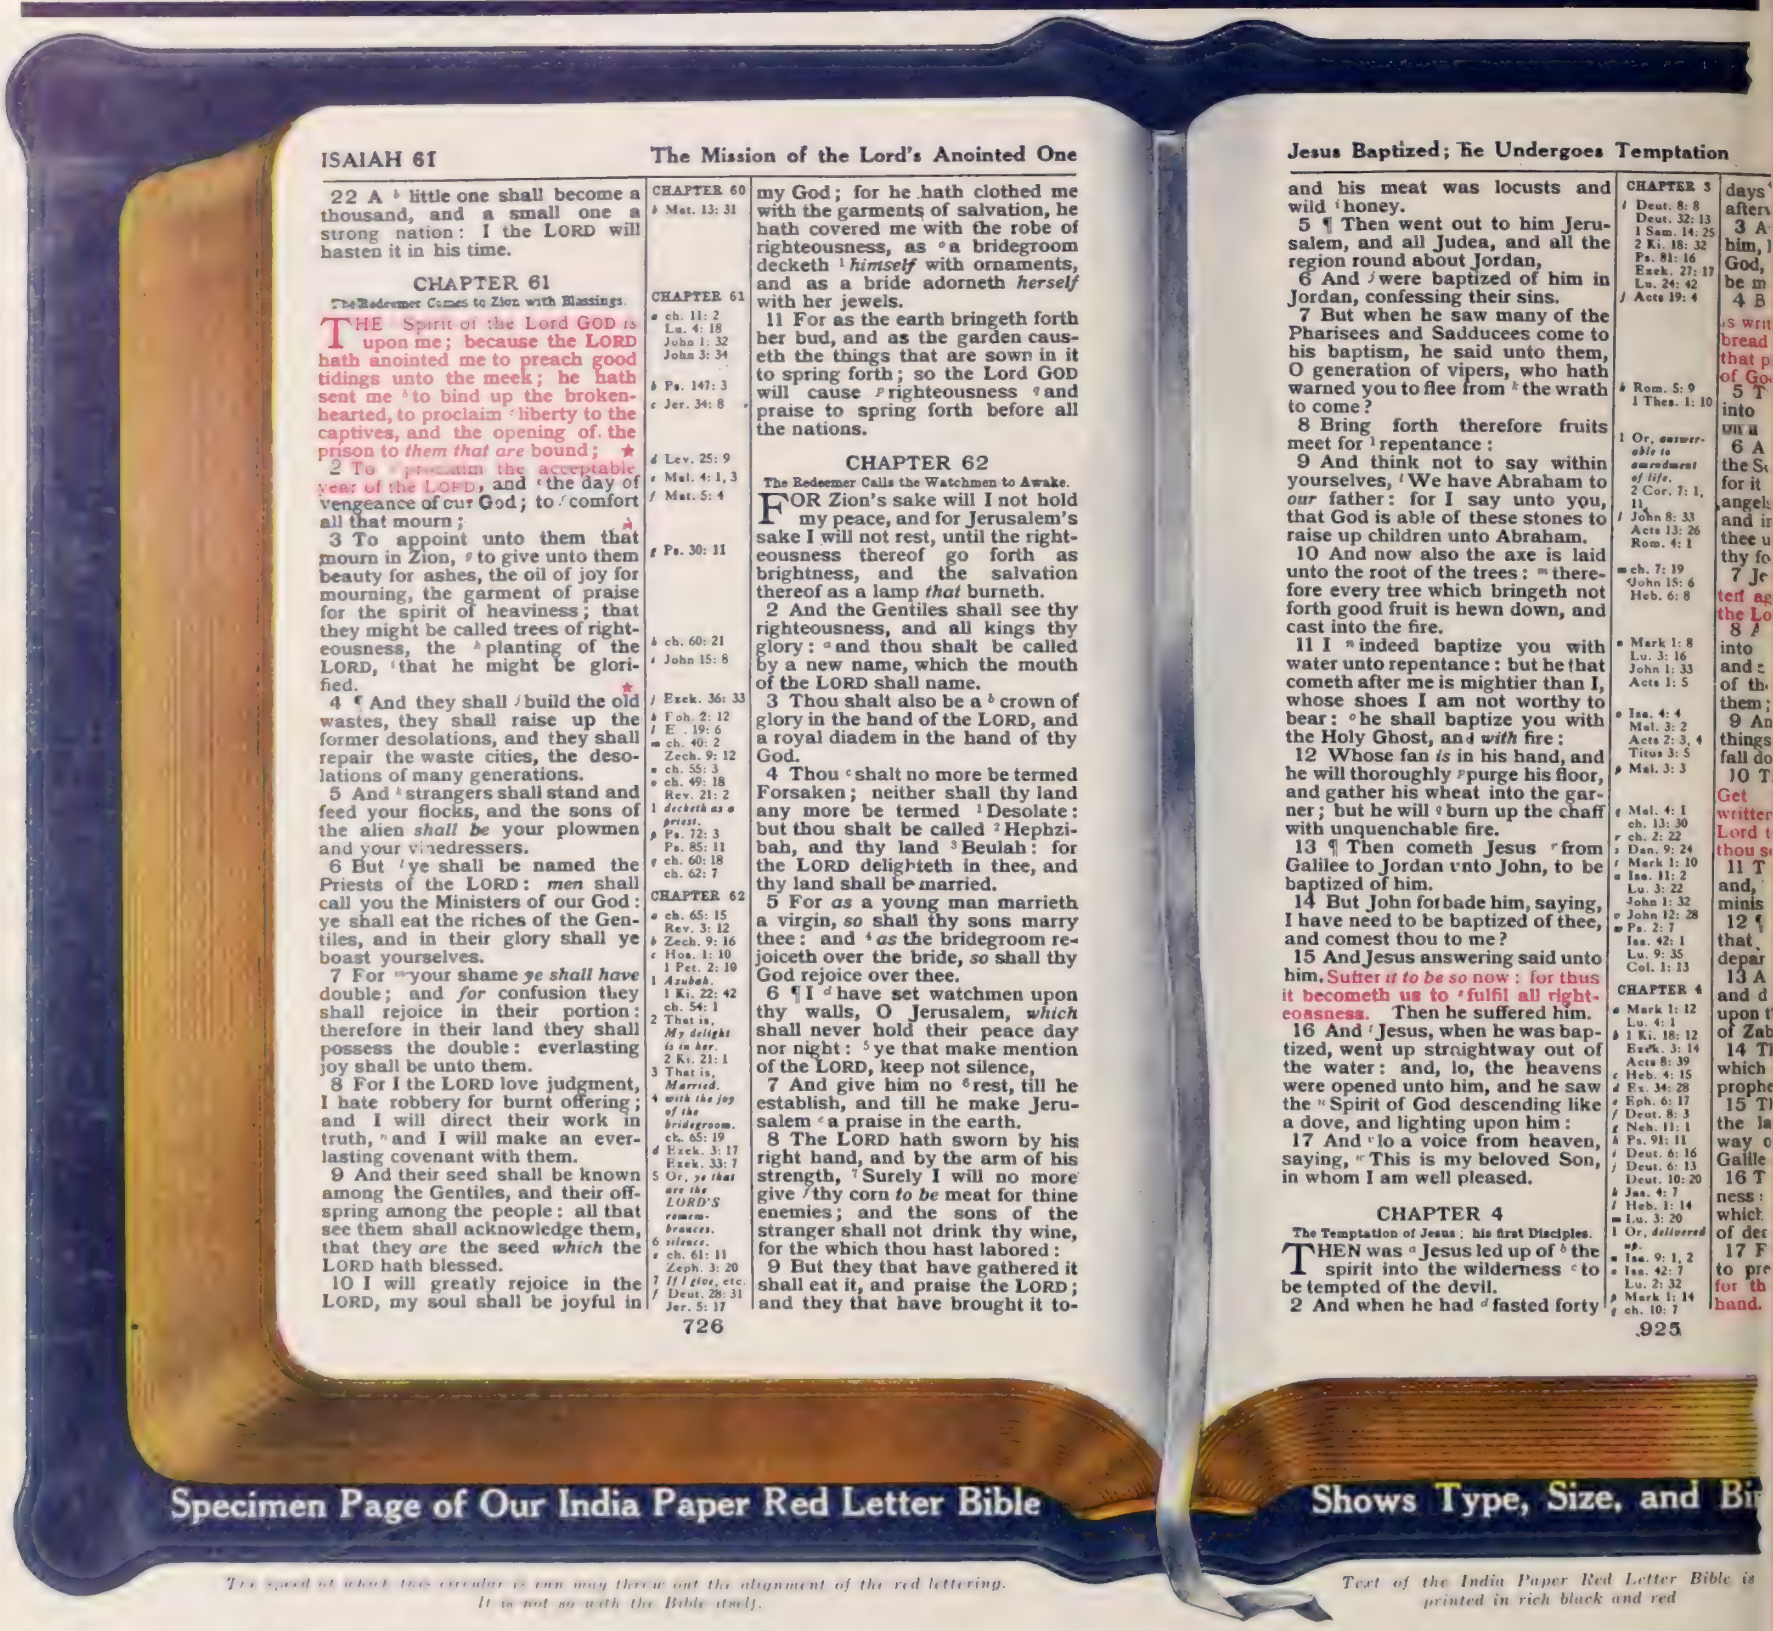
Only India Paper Red Letter Bible in the World



22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn;

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified.

4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzi-bah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,

7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-

Our Red Letter Bibles and Testaments

Our Red Letter Bible

ONLY GENUINE EDITION

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the omission of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

1 In the Old Testament, the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.

2 In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.

3 A Red Star ★ immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

A HOMELESS LOUVAIN FAMILY TAGGED FOR ENGLAND

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

EVERYBODY A REBEL IN MEXICO. [illegible] tary convention which has attempted to exercise executive functions has failed to establish in office its chosen president, General Gutierrez; and neither General Carranza, who is the nearest approach [illegible] be a rebel by the military convention), nor General Villa, [illegible] convention, has been able to [illegible] Villa and his followers. Both rival generals are said to be well supported by troops, and equally determined on the elimination of each other from the politics of Mexico.

NO LONGER LIKE ABRAHAM LINCOLN. On November 12 a delegation from the National Independence Equal Rights League was received by the President in the White House, and through their spokesman, William Monroe Trotter, a negro, urged the President to [illegible] the segregation of white and negro clerk service employees in government departments, charging the present administration with having introduced segregation which, the protest said, had not been necessary for fifty years during which the two races had worked together in amity. The President explained the present policy as designed to promote the comfort of both classes by reducing friction, and declared it his steadfast wish to [illegible] development. The spokesman of the party took the President to task personally, informing him for one thing that whereas two years ago he was thought to be a second Abraham Lincoln, the [illegible] of the country that it would be difficult for them to support him in a second campaign for the presidency. The President finally closed the interview with the assurance that he would always be glad to accept a delegation from the Equal Rights League provided it was represented by [illegible] than Mr. Trotter.

MAYORS ON THEIR ANNUAL JUNKET. The cities of the United States [illegible] a step forward as a result of the annual conference of mayors in Philadelphia, the middle of November, after [illegible] as bodyguards of aldermen and other public officials from many of the large cities. Practical [illegible] were taken up for discussion during the sessions.

ARMY AND NAVY GAME AT THE CAPITOL. The annual reports of the Army and Navy Departments, according to advance notices in the press, will ask for no extraordinary expenditures, but will bring to the attention of Congress the advisability of adopting a new policy of national defense by land and sea, extending over a number of years. Two new battleships will be recommended and a number of submarines asked for. An increase in the number of men in the navy and in the regular army will be advocated. In this connection, it is interesting to note that a sixteen-inch naval gun, the largest and most powerful yet designed, has been made for the United States navy at the Washington Navy Yard, and is now being tested as the possible type of gun for the main batteries of our dreadnoughts, which [illegible] be much larger than the fourteen-inch rifle.

WAR SESSION IN PARLIAMENT BEGINS. King George opened Parliament on November 11 with a speech from the throne in which it was stated that the vigorous prosecution of the war to a victorious issue is the one business of the government at present. Political questions are not expected to be raised. Upward of [illegible] members of the House of Commons were absent in connection with the war, a considerable number being at the front. A cable [illegible] of November 12 declares that the government intends to raise a billion dollars or even more as a [illegible] per cent. of four per cent., and an additional quarter of a penny in increasing the income tax to sixty cents on the pound sterling.

ARRANGEMENTS ELSEWHERE PREVENT ACCEPTANCE. When, on or about March 15 next, the President, accompanied by an [illegible] of vessels of the navy, formally opens the Panama Canal, the ships of the rest of the world will be conspicuous by their absence unless they manage to [illegible] engagements canceled. The [illegible] have already been abandoned. Though it [illegible] come to Europe in sufficient time [illegible] a great naval demonstration would yet be made as the [illegible] through the canal and along the coast to San Francisco.

OUR COLLEGE PROFESSORS IN CONVENTION. The [illegible] at Wilmington, Del., on November 10 for a special one session, a great number of [illegible] are expected. The occasion had prepared various forms of entertainment for the [illegible] notable speakers addressed the meetings on subjects having to do with that profession. Most [illegible] declared to be the subject of all-absorbing [illegible] the [illegible] problem [illegible] at the same time.

LOST [illegible] The Department of Agriculture [illegible] that the valley farmers of America have lost [illegible] through [illegible] Europe, the [illegible] being [illegible] of [illegible] of peace.

THE AIMS OF LABOR. At the convention of the American Federation of Labor, which opened in Philadelphia November 16, resolutions were introduced looking to the participation of labor as a [illegible] in the peace conference which ultimately must settle the differences of the war. [illegible] to insist on the prior unconditional acceptance of the President's three-year truce plan in Colorado, [illegible] the taking over of the mines by the [illegible] to the establishment of State labor bureaus in the interests of the [illegible] to the formation of a world federation opposed to war, and to other innovations and betterments in political, social and industrial affairs to the number of [illegible] a parade of 50,000 working men and women, divided into trade groups and kept in step by seventy-five [illegible] in connection.

PACKING TOYS FOR THE JASON

BOMB OUTRAGE IN NEW YORK. An attempt was made to wreck the million-dollar courthouse in the Bronx and at the same time kill County Judge Louis D. Gibbs on November 11, supposedly by a gang of "white slavers," in order to get revenge for the sentencing to long terms in State Prison of seven of the vicious crew. A bomb of unusual force was exploded at the base of the entrance pillars, wrecking the bronze doors and the pillars, smashing a great many windows in the courthouse and neighboring buildings, and throwing most of the hundreds of persons who were in the courthouse to the floor. No serious injuries were reported. A panic seized the occupants of surrounding houses, and police reserves were called out. No arrests have been made as yet.

CONGRESSMEN'S EARS BURN. The National American Woman Suffrage Association in convention at Nashville, Tenn., November 12, frankly discussed the congressmen who had failed them in their recent efforts to secure national legislation in favor of female suffrage, and enjoyed a stormy debate over the wisdom of the publication, during the recent campaign, of a blacklist containing the names of the unpopular statesmen. No verbatim report of what was said for and against the national legislators who did not measure up to woman suffrage expectations was given out.

INTERESTING IF TRUE. This country has reached the bottom of the industrial decline, and is now on the verge of the greatest prosperity it has ever known, according to a Chicago banker in attendance at the annual convention in Philadelphia of the Investment Bankers' Association of America.

UNCLE SAM PLAYS SANTA CLAUS. A great many people have been interested for weeks in filling the United States naval collier Jason with Christmas gifts for the war orphans of Europe, children in particular having been asked to take part in this beneficence. The ship was loaded at New York, and is said to have taken on six million gifts. To unload the trains of freight cars which brought the toys and dolls and other things from the different points of collection, nearly 200 soldiers and sailors and many women of the Red Cross and from Governor's Island, besides the regular staff of the terminal, were pressed into service. Packages were received up to the last moment by every method of transportation. These gifts go to Belgium, France, Germany, Austria and wherever the senders wish. The "Christmas Ship" is expected to deliver its unique cargo in ample time for Christmas distribution.

IF AT FIRST YOU DON'T SUCCEED, ETC. Lassen Peak, Calif., has doubtless adopted this old favorite for its ideal, for despite its long succession of unsuccessful attempts to erupt last summer, this volcano, which should realize that it is extinct, is again sending great columns of smoke high in the air from four of its craters, and sifting volcanic ash over a wide area.

HAS CHICAGO MISLAID ITS BIBLE? A Chicago newspaper is responsible for the statement that immorality in that city is to be combated by science; the city council has hit on this effective but hitherto unguessed method for ridding society of evil. A "morals commission" is to "study all phases of immorality and find ways and means of curing them. It shall investigate causes and devise methods of prevention, etc." Neither the grammar nor the scheme is convincing. It is said the police consider this an invasion of their prerogatives. The churches are not reported.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH EXTENDS SUFFRAGE. At the New York Diocesan Convention held November 11 it was decided to admit women of the church to the parish meetings and permit them to take part in the deliberations and to vote on parochial affairs. The text of the convention was "efficiency."

MODESTY ANNOYS TAX-COLLECTORS. The Treasury Department is as sure as it is born that there are a number of persons in this country who are too modest to admit that they have incomes large enough to be entered on the records of the income tax bureau. To ferret out all such diffident persons and persuade them to own up is a task which the department has set for itself in high hopes that a considerable part of the expected returns from the income tax may yet be saved from the oblivion in which it now rests.

ADVANTAGE OF LIVING NEAR A LAKE. A social survey bureau in Chicago states that in one block there live 1,596 persons (in 357 families) and only forty-six of them have bathtubs, and they have only eight among them.

A CHEERFUL PHILOSOPHER REPORTED DYING. Under date of November 9 Rev. Robert J. Burdette, known world wide as the preacher-humorist "Bob" Burdette, was reported dying at his home in Pasadena, Calif. The famous philosopher of cheerfulness is seventy years old, and has made his influence for good felt through his lectures and writings all over the world. For several years he was active pastor of the Temple Baptist Church in Pasadena, and in later years pastor emeritus.

TO GROW BELGIANS ON THIS CONTINENT. It is stated in the press that the Association of Children's Aid Societies of Ontario is arranging with families in the country to take Belgian children orphaned by the war and bring them up as Canadians, thus relieving a measure of the distress among the homeless of Belgium and doing Canada a good turn in the bargain. Plans are also on foot to set aside good farming lands which Belgians who have lost their all by the war can acquire on very advantageous terms.

IT REALLY IS EASY TO GET RICH. But they that will be so fall into temptation and a snare. A healer calling himself Rev. D. R. Schiller and his companion Kate A. Braun have been placed on trial before Judge Landis in the United States District Court at Freeport, Ill., on the charge of using the mails to defraud people by offering to heal them of every known disease. A blessed handkerchief to place over the spot and a circular telling how, were, it is alleged, sent by "Hulda de Muth," or "Lady Sunshine," to dupes in a number of States.

EXPLOSION GUARDS DYE SECRET. While engaged in experiments to find the secret employed by German chemists in the manufacture of aniline dyes, Dr. William Beckers and twenty-five men working with him were blown through the wrecked walls of the factory in which they were working November 13 by an explosion of chemicals, one man being killed and Dr. Beckers injured, probably fatally. He was understood to be at the point of success in his experiments, and it is thought the results of his discoveries will be lost if he dies.

THE REAL THANKSGIVING

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

IT'S THE easiest thing in the world to look for trouble and to find it waiting, grim and terrible, for your search. It isn't very hard to count your blessings in a negative sort of way, by saying, "Yes, it's very nice, but it could be much nicer." It's quite the usual thing to hear folks complain—and complaining is heard more often than praise and thankfulness. Yet—so they tell us—a little over three hundred years ago a band of sturdy, venturesome Christian folk were very thankful indeed and praised their Lord fervently over a handful of parched corn and a bit of unleavened bread.

Once a year we set apart a day, consecrated to their memory, and try to throw aside the customs and complainings of the world as we know it. We gather together—families of us—and eat turkey and plum pudding; we talk of commonplaces and sometimes we feel bored and tired. Yet we are supposed to be celebrating.

We have bushels of things to be glad for this year—hundreds; it seems more than we ever had. As we offer up our blessings it won't be hard to remember that across a dividing bit of ocean other people are starving to death, and that ought to make us just a bit more thankful. As we see our families sitting around talking commonplaces it may help to think of other families in other countries that are fighting and dying on blood-stained battlefields. As we hear the crisp November wind banging in the trees, we ought to be mighty thankful that it isn't the sound of cannon and bugles and screams that we're hearing. Oh, friends of mine, it won't be very hard to be thankful this year!

As I was walking down Fourth Avenue a few days ago I was thinking, with my head in the clouds, of many things; thinking so hard that I did not notice exactly where my feet were taking me. It was only when I stumbled against a little boy who was running around a corner that I came down to earth with a bump.

"Oh! I'm so sorry," I said. "Did I hurt you?"

"Dat's a' right, lady," said the little boy with a dirty Raphael-cherub grin. "I was only running!"

"Oh!"—he was lingering at my side, so I felt it necessary to make conversation—"you were running—playing something?"

"Huh!" the little boy grunted beatifically as he pulled up one ragged stocking. "Oh, no; I was jus' running fer fun."

His little face crinkled with smiles again and he trotted on out of my sight.

Just running for fun, for the pure joy of living. A little boy with nothing else to make him happy—and yet a number of us frown and fret in the midst of all sorts of pleasures.

I was talking to a chum of mine not long ago, and some way our conversation drifted around to Thanksgiving time, and our interpretation of the day.

"It's all wrong!" said my chum earnestly, "all wrong!"

"Why?" I asked curiously. "I'm always thankful for my blessings on Thanksgiving; so are most people. Why is it all wrong?"

"Well," answered my chum, "on Thanksgiving Day we sit around and talk and eat—principally. I once asked a little girl what Thanksgiving Day meant, and she said 'turkey and cranberry sauce!' And then we thank God complacently for our harvests, and our food, and our clothes, and his love. Isn't it so?"

"Yes," I admitted.

"Well," continued the girl, "the Pilgrims did that, too, years ago. But they did not stop there. After they thanked God for their own blessings they tried to pass on the joy to folk less fortunate than they were. They even invited the Indians, beings that they had every reason to be afraid of, into their homes and gave them a little of the season's cheer. They kept Thanksgiving."

"Then"—I was choosing my words rather carefully—"then your idea is not to be thankful yourself—only to give someone else a chance to be thankful?"

"But," asked the girl softly, "isn't that the right way to be thankful?"

Isn't it?

It's a very easy thing to pass along the outside of life without even dipping down into the depths, and ever so many people do it because it is the easiest way. Somehow it is hard to convince folks that things that tear at their heartstrings are the things that they should see and know. It's mighty easy to eat our Thanksgiving dinners without a thought of our brothers and sisters who are starving on some other street in the same city, and it's only because it is so much easier, I reckon, that people do forget to pass a bit of their plenty and peace.

But, as I write, I can't help thinking of filled-to-overflowing baskets that I have seen in missions, of eager children grasping fat turkeys, of mothers crying happy tears over coal and wood that will keep them warm and happy. I can't help having my mind slip away from the well-filled tables and the happy smiles and the cheerful commonplaces of our own country, to the dreary homes in Europe that are being brightened because the people of this land were willing—yes, more than willing—to share their blessings with others.

Oh, friends of mine, it's the easiest thing in the world to look for trouble, and it isn't very hard to find people who are fretting and crying and counting their blessings in a negative sort of way instead of just being happy. But somehow, when we stop to look around us and think, the world seems to be a pretty nice place at Thanksgiving time.

HOW A "CLOG" HELPED THE BELGIANS

REV. WILLIAM P. PEARCE, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Appleton, Wis., used a clog-shoe to raise money for the Belgian sufferers. Four years ago Dr. and Mrs. Pearce were traveling in Europe, and spent some time in Belgium and Holland. In one of the quaint little towns, a girl of eight or nine years of age tried to sell them some postal cards, but they did not invest. Looking at the poorly dressed child and the badly worn shoes, Mr. Pearce pointed to the latter and offered to buy them. The child soon understood, and kicking off her clogs, handed them to Dr. Pearce, holding out her hand for the remuneration. Mr. Pearce gave her more than enough to buy a new pair. The little one darted away delighted. Dr. Pearce took the clogs to his American home. Of one he made a pincushion, and the other he laid aside. A little while ago he saw a cartoon in the daily paper, entitled "Besieged." A poor Belgian woman stood with her back to the door, holding a baby in her arms, and another little one clutching her dress. Outside was a wolf trying to force the door. Across the door was written "Starvation."

The thought of his "clog" came to him, and the following Sunday he took it into his pulpit. He told the story and stated that at the close of the service he would be at the door to receive any offerings the people might like to put into the shoe. He went over to Lawrence College and told the same story. The result was that seventy dollars were donated.

Dr. Pearce contributed five dollars to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Belgian fund, and sent the rest to England to support two Belgian children through the war.

Do you wish to canvass your circle of friends, or your village, in aid of the Silent Sufferers of the European war? If so, drop a postal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and we will send contribution blanks.

10% More for Your Money

Quaker Oats is put up also in a 25-cent size, nearly three times as large as the 10-cent size. By saving in packing it offers you 10 per cent more for your money. See how long it lasts.

Precious Vim-Food

If Quaker Oats Cost What Vitality is Worth You'd Weigh It on Gold Dust Scales

Quaker Oats is so plentiful—so cheap—that some forget its value.

Remember this: Each flake contains phosphorus, of which brains are made. Each is laden with lecithin, of which nerves are made. And each is stored with energy.

As a vim-producer—as a source of vitality—nothing else grown can compare with it.

These are precious elements. Their dearth or abundance may affect a child's whole career. One child may be languid—one "feel his oats." And the difference may lie in large part in their breakfasts.

Besides that, the child who lacks Quaker Oats—or gets it too rarely—misses one of the luxuries of life.

Quaker Oats

The Morning Luxury

Two things are important as regards this dish. One is to get Quaker Oats. It is made of the big, plump grains alone, so the flakes are large and luscious. All puny grains are discarded. We get but ten pounds of Quaker Oats from a bushel.

The result is a flavor, an aroma which delights the child. They love the dish. You can't serve it too often or serve too much.

Then serve Quaker Oats in big dishes. Children need an abundance. Most of them don't realize the full effect of this vim-food because they don't get enough.

The elements are there—all the elements needed for brains and nerves and bodies. Don't skimp on them. Let children eat all they will.

For 30 days, try serving Quaker Oats in plenty. That test will show you what this food can do.

Quaker Cooker

We have made to our order—from pure Aluminum—a perfect Double Boiler. It is extra large and heavy. We supply it to users of Quaker Oats, for cooking these flakes in the ideal way. It insures the fullness of food value and flavor. See our offer in each package.

CHRIST RISEN FROM THE DEAD

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DECEMBER 6
(MARK 16: 1-8; MATT. 28: 11-15)

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By J. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen." Luke 24: 5, 6.

It is customary today for men to speak of the Man of Nazareth or the Man of Galilee. But we dare not stop there. If that is the whole content of the Gospel, it is no Gospel for us and our present sins, sorrows and conflicts. That Jesus lived among men, filled with love and power, will not help the children of the twentieth century, unless we know that he is carrying on the same line of ministry in a changeless and indissoluble life. The four Gospels are not only an historic record of the past, but contain specimens of our Lord's perpetual age-long devotion to the needs of men. Not in the yesterday of A.D. 30, but in the today of A.D. 1914, he speaks the Beatitudes, gives sight to the blind, raises the dead, reveals the love of God, and saves at infinite cost penitent Magdalens and dying malefactors. The Gospels contain the first pages of the diary of his mighty acts, though they have been mightier since he was raised from the dead, and sits at the right hand of power. The full-grown flower is in the hidden marvel of the seed, and the heavenly Man reveals the true glory of him of Nazareth and Galilee.

The Empty Grave and the Full Life

By Amos R. Wells, Litt.D.

A MISSIONARY, having preached in a village in North India, was accosted by a Mohammedan gentleman, who compared Christianity unfavorably with his own religion on the ground that when Moslems go to Mecca they find at least a coffin, but when they go to Jerusalem, the Christians' Mecca, they find nothing but an empty grave. "Yes," said the missionary quickly, "that is just the difference. Mohammed is dead. Mohammed is in his coffin. The founders of all these false systems of religion and philosophy are in their graves. But Jesus Christ, who is to rule over all, is not in the tomb. Death could not hold him. He is risen."

The women came to Christ's empty grave at sunrise. The shadows of night had passed from the earth. Easter is always associated in our thought with the morning. The first Easter was indeed the morning of the world's hope. Dr. Hugh Macmillan beautifully says that just as the little birds in their nests open their mouths wide for food when a shadow passes over them, mistaking it for the mother bird, so what we in our nest mistake for death is really the shadow of God, come to satisfy our souls with long life. The Easter sunrise interprets all shadows to us with the fulness of the Light of the world.

Those women, as they drew near to the tomb, whose entrance they had seen covered with a great stone, and the stone sealed, and a Roman guard placed there to see that the seal was not broken, naturally debated how they should gain admittance to the tomb and embalm the body of their Lord. They doubtless planned to exercise all the arts of supplication, in which Eastern women are expert. But they had been thinking of a dead stone, not of the living Christ.

How often we do the same! John McDowell once asked a friend why he did not put money into a certain stock. "Why," the friend replied, "that stock has been dead for five years, and I am not putting my money into dead stock." That is just what we do when we worry about material things—what we shall eat, and what we shall drink, and wherewithal we shall be clothed. These are all stones that the living Christ will toss out of the way. Think of him.

Indeed, that is just why Christ died and rose again: that he might free our minds from all fear, even from the greatest of all fears, the fear of death. In England a certain house had a room that was supposed to be haunted. The father grew tired of hearing these superstitious stories, so he announced that he would sleep in that room. He did so, and the next morning he came down stairs smiling. "There," he said, "I told you there was nothing to fear in that room. Now you see there is not." Even so our Saviour slept for a little while in the chamber of death, which the imagination of men had peopled with so many ghostly demons.

The angel who told the women that Christ had arisen bade them go and tell others. That has been part of the Easter message ever since: "Go and tell others; spread far and wide the sunrise glory that has entered your own hearts." An evangelist was once holding a series of crowded meetings, when he was approached by a Unitarian, who asked him how an evangelist such as he could command large audiences day after day, while the Unitarians, with all their advertising and their culture, could get only a scanty company of hearers. The evangelist made a true answer: "It is because you present to the people a mere man Jesus, who died nineteen centuries ago. We preach Jesus Christ, the divine Saviour, who ever liveth to make intercession for his people." It is the power of such preaching—resurrection power—that will win the world.

The Jewish falsehood, that Christ's disciples stole his body from the tomb, is still uttered by infidels; but no reasonable man can accept it. For how, then, were the disciples raised to such a pitch of confidence that they went everywhere preaching a risen Lord, and gladly enduring martyrdom for his sake? The resurrection was the backbone of the preaching of Peter and John and Stephen and Paul. If the disciples stole the body why did not the Jews find it, and so prove their story? And how are we to believe the story of a sleeping Roman guard?

But, after all, the power of the resurrection of Christ is not in argument but in life. It is the risen Christ, who lives in his true disciples, that is to conquer the world.

What Does It Mean to Me?

By Arthur H. Howland, B.D.

LAST week we considered the question what the crucifixion of Jesus might mean to us individually. We study today the resurrection and again the question arises: "What does it mean to me?"

There are some wonderful passages in the New Testament which directly connect the resurrection of Jesus with our individual spiritual lives. Read especially Romans 6: 4, 5, 10, 11: "Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." "For in that he died, he died unto sin once; but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." Also Colossians 3: 1-3. "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." And Romans 8: 11-13: "But if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. Therefore, brethren, we are debtors not to the flesh to live after the flesh. For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live." And Romans 5: 10: "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life."

The power of the risen Christ in our souls! That is what Easter may mean to every one of us. The resurrection of Jesus means not only the hope and assurance of life hereafter, but present-day victory over sin, and present power to do the work he has called us to do.

Throughout the studies of the betrayal, arrest, trial and execution of Jesus we have been reminded that the same things which took place in Jerusalem then may be taking place in our own hearts now. The soul of every person is in a condition corresponding to some hour in these Jerusalem days. Many are in the darkness of betraying and condemning Christ; many are in the terrible earthquake darkness of crucifying him afresh; many are in the gloom and despondency and inaction felt by his friends while he was lying in the grave. But many others, thank God, are living in the sunshine and perfume and gladness of Easter morning. Christ is no longer dead. The old denials and betrayals are ended. The fears of crucifixion and the sorrows of the burial are passed. Christ is risen—not in Jerusalem long ago, but in our hearts today!

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

JERUSALEM is the only city in the world which, laying aside all else, gives itself unreservedly to reproducing in song, story and symbol the Bible events of the Passion Week. From the early morning procession of Palm Sunday till the midnight gloom of Good Friday the crowds walk solemnly to Bethany, up and down the Mount of Olives, to the Garden of Gethsemane and along the Via Dolorosa, with tearful faces, subdued voices, visiting the churches, draped in black, amid the ceaseless tolling of bells, until the very atmosphere seems heavy with sorrow and throbbing with prayer.

About four o'clock on Saturday afternoon, when the tension seems almost unbearable, occurs the ceremony of the Holy Fire, and then by common consent the bells all cease tolling for a short time and then burst forth into peals that seem like a resurrection. People's faces, motions, voices change instantly and from that moment thrills of joy seem to transform the very landscape and the atmosphere. As the hours wear on toward midnight, out of every church, transformed, come peals of Easter music and the City of Desolation becomes the city of glad and triumphant resurrection joy. All through the night crowds surge and sway in the almost impassable streets, and when the Resurrection morning has actually come the city is at the height of its greatest feast or festival, because among all other church occasions this is pre-eminently the great feast.

In lands where Easter—at best a strange word—is so frequently confused by the whirring of automobiles and the rustling of Paris fashions and millinery it is a relief and an inspiration to see the "common people," whom Christ loved, in the land where he lived, almost reproduce physically the sadness and gloom of the Passion Week, to be followed by the exultation of joy of the Resurrection Morning. More and more the real meaning of the Gospel story is taking hold of human hearts and thousands from civilized Christian lands (save the word in the presence of universal European war!) are coming back to keep "the Great Feast" in the land where Christ lived and died and rose again.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE COLONIAL SETTLEMENT SCHOOL is doing much for the mountaineers of the South. It is aided by the Colonial Dames of Tennessee. The population is scattered and the girls need home training. Many have no school to attend.

—A STRIKING FEATURE of the union tabernacle campaign conducted by Evangelists Hart and Magann with all of the churches of Marietta, Ohio, was the prompt retreat of a circus that, after pitching its tent, looked over the tabernacle and concluded that it was too great a counter-attraction. The evangelistic party conducted an automobile county tour, and thirteen automobiles with evangelists, pastors, singers and musicians visited ten towns.

THE SALVATION ARMY has thousands of members on the firing line in Europe's war as soldiers in the various armies, or in Red Cross or relief work; some are military chaplains. The dearth of all kinds of hospital supplies, especially bandages and linen generally, has led Commander E. C. Booth to inaugurate in every city in America an "Old Linen Campaign." The need is so urgent that it is hoped that not only the Salvationists themselves, but ladies' clubs, fraternal societies, schools, churches, and in fact everybody, will undertake to do something. In nearly every home there are old linen sheets, pillow-cases, tablecloths, napkins, towels, handkerchiefs, and other things that might be made up into bandages. The Army headquarters will give instructions as to how the bandages shall be made and guarantee their reaching the front.

THE Go-to-CHURCH BAND continues to grow, and there are now over thirteen thousand young people and children in twenty-nine States enrolled and endeavoring to attend church once each Sunday for four months; and thus they willingly learn the lesson of persistent church attendance. The following is an example of what the band will do for a church: A minister in Oxford, Mass., heard of the Go-to-Church Band last spring and noticed that the founder laid strongly upon the fact that it was a hard thing to make a perfect record in church attendance for four months, and that therefore the young people were attracted. He planned to introduce a band into his own church this fall, and started with the first of October, bearing vigorously on the difficulties to be overcome. The result has been that his congregation has increased 25 per cent., and he has secured the presence of the very class of young people he has long been striving to gain for the church. The whole result is most inspiring for preacher and congregation. Full information concerning the band can be obtained from Clinton Alvord, 7 Summer Street, Worcester, Mass.

AT THE ANNUAL MEETING of the New York Bible Society, the general secretary, Dr. George William Carter, presented the annual report which recorded the large distribution of 326,146 volumes of the Scriptures in forty-seven languages during the year. The New York Bible Society is the only society having for its sole work Bible distribution in the city and harbor of New York. On September 30, Rev. William G. Jones, the missionary of the society among the sailors of the harbor, completed forty years of service. He has visited during the year nearly 1,000 vessels and distributed over 15,000 volumes of the Scriptures. During the year the society has furnished over 10,000 Bibles to 372 hotels of the city. Within three years the society has furnished a total of more than 33,000 Bibles to 542 hotels in New York. Almost every hotel in the city has been supplied with Bibles by the society. During the year 180 institutions, including homes, hospitals and prisons, have been supplied with the Scriptures. More than one hundred missionaries have been engaged in the work. The society maintains a large work in Bible distribution at Ellis Island, where each immigrant may obtain a copy of the Scriptures in his own language. This work among the immigrants has been going on for more than eighty years. Bible Sunday will be observed on December 6 in Canada, England, Scotland, Germany; at the last International Sunday School Convention it was recommended that Bible Sunday be observed in all the Sunday schools of the world. The following officers were re-elected: President, John C. West; vice-president, Everett J. Esselstyn; secretary, Charles W. Parsons; treasurer, James H. Schmelzel. The office of the society is in the Bible House.

If you want to help the widows and orphans of the European war, send a postal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and we will forward contribution blanks promptly.

The Life Verse

B. Y. P. U. and Christian Endeavor Topic for December 6. Concrecation Meeting. Rom. 6: 23

WHAT is life? Nobody knows. We have life, and life is all about us, but what it is we do not know. We know that life makes it possible to be conscious of what is going on, that it, in some mysterious way, lies back of the capacity for thought and enjoyment and pain and character and hope. So far as science and nature have anything to say, all these things cease with death.

There is something not only sad but terrifying about a dead body. All the beautiful and amazing powers that went with life have come to an end. The eyes cannot see, the ears cannot hear, the lips cannot speak, the hands cannot work. So far as science and nature know anything about life, it has come to an end.

All through the ages there has been the hope that in some mysterious way life may go on after the body is dead. Philosophers have dreamed about it, poets have sung about it, scientists have investigated it.

But Jesus announced it. He stated calmly: "He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

Everything about this promise of Jesus and its effect in human experience is amazing. The fear of death, the terror lest it be the end, is removed. Along with the friendship of Christ and the experiences of his forgiveness and cleansing comes the conviction that this friendship will not be touched by death except to bring us into still closer fellowship with him. Paul thought of death as the pleasant event which would bring him into the immediate presence of Christ. "I have," he said, "a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better." Think over the saintly people you have known. You know they are not dead. You know they are living on, with joy and energy, their life of friendship and service with Christ.

From what Christ and his followers have told us about the life to come we know that it will be, in many respects, like this present life. But our lesson verse brings out one striking fact of similarity. That life is to be a gift, not something earned or bought. So is this life. It is a gift of our parents, or rather, a gift from God transmitted to us through them. We did not earn, nor even ask for life.

This idea of eternal life as a gift coincides with all the other great fundamental teachings of the New Testament. The big New Testament word "grace" strikes the keynote. God is, from first to last, freely giving us things which we cannot, in any sense, be said to have deserved or earned. Forgiveness, peace, cleansing, power, eternal life—these are among the priceless gifts to men brought from God by the bleeding hands of Christ.

Notice the other word: "Wages." That is something toiled for. Men toil hard to serve sin and in the end are paid his bitter wage—"Death!"

What Motive Shall Govern My Christmas Giving?

Epworth League Topic for December 6. Phil. 2: 3-11

WE HAVE all had—or, if not, we have missed the sweetest experience of life—the feeling of wishing that happiness might come to some one else rather than to ourselves. A mother has this experience perhaps more strikingly than any other. From the beginnings of her child's babyhood, she plans and works and hopes for his happiness, not her own. In the ideal marriage relation the husband and wife have this same experience. Each wishes to make the other happy, and forgets to plan for his or her own happiness.

Marriage and the home life have a peculiarly helpful influence. Young men and women who before marriage seemed thoughtless and selfish, after marriage become unselfish, thoughtful, eager to help and serve and please each other, and planning eagerly and jubilantly for the happiness of their children. Christmas means to a father or mother making the rest happy. The old childish wonder as to what presents will be received has given place to the self-forgetful longing to give something to the rest which they will enjoy.

It is this idea, this experience, which Christ has expanded to include all the world. "Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory." How much Christmas giving is on a level not much higher than this! We give so that others shall admire or appreciate us. We give, striving to keep up an artificial standard others have set. Or worse still, we give, hoping that others will give as much to us. What a travesty all this is on the plan and spirit and example of Jesus!

He thought always of others. He found his joy in making them glad.

The modern Christmas, with its artificial strain, its cruel hardships to poor working girls and clerks behind the counter, its fret and anxiety, is far, indeed, from the thoughts and dreams of Bethlehem, and the memories of the quiet Christmas of old home days.

Shall we not have a real Christ Christmas this year? Think of him, of what he would do with the gift day, and the opportunities it brings for making others glad.

Timely Gifts

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received the following letter:

"Enclosed you will find my check for one hundred dollars. The Lord has enabled me to make some special gifts for his dear work. Will you please divide it among the missions, the War Fund and the Chinese Orphan Fund, as the Lord gives you wisdom. Please do not publish any name; simply say it is a thank offering for healing.

"Very cordially yours in Christ."

This gift has been applied as follows: For Widows and Orphans of War, $33.33; China Orphan Fund, $33.33; Home Missions, $16.67; Foreign Missions, $16.67.

We take this opportunity to acknowledge the following gifts (among many): For the Bowery Mission, $20, and for the war's Widows and Orphans, $20, from William A., Brighton, Mich. And for the China Orphan Fund, $5 from S. Peregrine, $5 from G. T. Anderson, $2 from G. A. H., Cleveland, Ohio, and $5 from C. M. F., Cleveland, Ohio.

God's Love

BENEATH the snow the flowers sleep,
Beneath the ice the rivers creep
Unseen, silent, to the sea;
All crystal are the hills and vales,
All glittering the dells and dales,
Mountain top and languid lea.

And yet behold the ocean wide,
Restless its unceasing tide,
Winter, summer, never still!
How like to God's great love the deep,
Active always, ne'er asleep,
As resistless as his will!

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A TELEGRAM came to the Prayer League recently from G. B. S., of California, asking special prayers for a young lady who was very ill. The Bowery Mission was notified by telephone and a telephone message was also sent to the Fulton Street noonday prayer meeting. Now comes the happy news that the young lady "is improving daily." It is beautiful to think that our telegraph and telephone wires can be used to unite God's people in sudden prayer for special needs, and that he will make these material things the channels of his infinite spiritual power. All who joined in this special prayer will be glad to receive the good news that it is being answered.

"I am one of the thankful ones," writes Mrs. L. J. S., of Sayre, Pa. "My son has come home from the hospital, where he has been for over a year, and is able to work." P. M. A. writes from Indiana: "Some time ago I requested your prayers that myself and children might have a home of our own. That prayer has been answered in a remarkable way." C. B. F. writes from Fulton Lane, Ohio: "I desire to express my gratitude to you and truly thank our dear Lord that my wife is so much better of her heart trouble, and that she is spared to live for the glory of God." Mrs. A. M. writes: "I prayed that God would give me back my work again; he sent me greater work." Miss D. B., of Knoxville, Tenn., writes: "This same Jesus has almost raised me, as he did Lazarus, from the dead." A Sunday school teacher, from Oxford, N. Y.: "I sent a request for prayer for a deeper work of grace and my prayer has been answered to a great extent. I feel so much lighter and happier in my heart. Also, our Sunday school is prospering, as we prayed it should, though I wish for still greater blessings in both lines." A Mother from Iowa acknowledges answer to prayer for the conversion of her son and his wife, and also a marked improvement in her son's health. Mrs. J. M. B. writes from New Jersey: "I want to acknowledge answer to prayer for the marvelous protection and return of a dear nephew who was in great trouble and danger."

I. E. K., Virginia, writes: "God has lifted a burden." E. Y., of Elmira, N. Y., and Mrs. W. L. acknowledge answer to prayer for the lifting of burdens; A Reader, of Pawtucket, R. I., for the healing of her husband; N. G. E., Montpelier, Vt., for answer to two prayers; A CHRISTIAN HERALD Reader, of Lynchburg, Va., for answer to many prayers, especially that estranged friends be restored; A Reader, Nottingham, Pa., for restoration of daughter's health; C. H. R., Ducumcari, N. M., for relief from financial embarrassment; Mrs. S. F. S., that her son has found work; Miss G. T., for removal of a trouble; Mr. W. J. and Mrs. E. F. C., for spiritual and financial aid; Mrs. J. C. N. and Mrs. R. R. D., for two answers to united prayer; A Reader, Washington, Pa.; A Reader from Canada and Mrs. G. H. O. from Stratham, N. H., for the receipt of other blessings.

One of the saddest letters ever received for the Prayer League tells of a young husband and wife, both addicted to the morphine habit, who are leading a wandering life far away from friends. They ask the prayers of the League for victory over this drug habit, from which they long to be delivered, and that they may find employment. This is a real heart-cry for divine help. The pastor's wife, who wrote some weeks ago asking prayer for relief from burdens, writes to repeat her request. The burdens are heavy. Mrs. E. A. S. asks special prayer that her brother may recover the use of his limbs, which have been paralyzed. He is a clergyman, of evangelistic spirit, and has been recently a useful chaplain. Mrs. J. A. writes from Cambellport, Ont., to urge the members of the Prayer League to pray for the recovery of her son, who is gravely ill with tuberculosis. "My grief is sore," she writes, "at the thought of losing my only son." Let the prayers and faith of our league make it possible for Christ to exercise his healing power upon this young man, that the mother's heart may rejoice and the name of God be glorified.

Special prayers are requested for a consecrated woman who, while performing an act of charity, fell and seriously injured her right arm. It was feared at one time that she might lose her arm. Now the doctors hope to avoid this loss, but fear that the arm may be useless. Will not the members of our league pray that this good woman, whose husband is a special friend of the Prayer League editor, may be fully restored to bodily strength. Urgent prayers are also asked for an earnest Christian man who is dangerously ill with heart trouble.

A Young California Girl writes: "Pray that my mother, two sisters and two brothers be saved, that my youngest sister, who has been in ill health for some time, be well and strong. I also ask prayer for my oldest sister, whose husband cannot work, that she may have financial help, also for health for her husband." Mrs. Bertha Merwin writes from Wagoner, Ariz., asking prayer that she may have more faith in Christ, and may experience a real change of heart, and for the granting of other desires. N. S. B., N. J., asks the earnest prayers of the league that he may be fully led of the Spirit in the work of the ministry and be delivered from heavy burdens which have almost ruined his health and have hampered his work. A Mother writes, asking prayer that a daughter whose hearing is dull may be healed and may secure a position, and that three children be converted. Special prayers are also asked for a young girl who is in trouble.

Mrs. W. B. H., Mrs. S. F., Mrs. McK., Mrs. F. E., Mrs. L. O. B. E., Mrs. A. J. F., Mrs. E. P. M. and Mrs. W. R. ask prayer that relatives or friends be delivered from the drink habit. A Reader, that a friend's wife may be healed

WON'T MIX

Bad Food and Good Health Won't Mix

The human stomach stands much abuse but it won't return good health if you give it bad food."

If you feed right you should feel right, for proper food and a good mind is the sure road to health.

"A year ago I became much alarmed about my health, for I began to suffer after each meal no matter how little I ate," says a Denver woman.

"I lost my appetite and the very thought of food grew distasteful, with the result that I was not nourished and got weak and thin.

"My home cares were very heavy, for besides a large family of my own I have also to look out for an aged mother. There was no one to shoulder my household burdens, and come what might I must bear them, and this thought nearly drove me frantic when I realized that my health was breaking down.

"I read an article in the paper about some one with trouble like mine being helped by Grape-Nuts food, and acting on this suggestion I gave Grape-Nuts a trial. The first dish of this delicious food proved that I had struck the right thing.

"My uncomfortable feelings in stomach disappeared as if by magic and in an incredibly short space of time I was again myself. Since then I have gained 12 pounds in weight through a summer of hard work and realize I am a very different woman, all due to the splendid food, Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

CHRISTMAS PRESENT

The many unsolicited letters of congratulation we have received from those who ordered our Bibles for Christmas Present and the attractive prices at which we have been able to supply them, have encouraged us to make still greater efforts to supply all in need at a low price. It is now our pleasure to announce that we have just made arrangements whereby we can offer the readers of this paper during the Holiday Season Bibles of the same high quality as heretofore, which is the famous

Size Open, 8x10½ Inches

$4 International Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible at $1.50 Each

All Charges Paid

The regular list price of this handsome Bible is $4.00. Our present price is slightly above cost of manufacture to large quantities, and is offered as a special courtesy to Christian Herald readers, giving them the benefit of all middlemen's profits.

This Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible is printed on the best paper in bold black type, with morocco binding, divinity circuit (overlapping edges), extra grained lining, will not break or give way in the hinge, is very flexible, has round corners, with red under gold edges; contains all the helps and references, maps, concordances, etc.

In referring to this Bible, the Earnest Worker says: "Those receiving it will be well pleased."

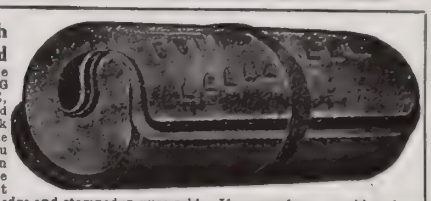
The Sunday School Times says: "The arrangement of helps, illustrations and maps new and admirable. It is very pleasing to the eye."

Bishop W. X. Ninde says: "Its cheapness is such that every one can afford a Bible, durable and beautiful in form."

Cumberland Presbyterian says: "Before recommending this Bible to our church and friends, we submitted it to a committee composed of able and scholarly men. After a careful, painstaking, and unprejudiced examination, the Bible was recommended in the strongest words of praise."

A more appropriate and acceptable Holiday Gift could not be made to a relative or friend, to a minister, Sunday School Superintendent, Teacher or Scholar.

For $2 with All Charges Paid we will send this same SELF-PRONOUNCING TEACHER'S BIBLE, with silk head band and silk marker, silk sewed with your name (or any other name you prefer) engraved in pure gold on outside cover, with patent thumb index cut in edge and stamped in pure gold. If you prefer, we could enclose your card and send the Bible to any address, to arrive just in time for Christmas.



DO NOT DELAY

As there is such a demand on the facilities of the mail and express companies before the Holidays, we suggest that you send us your order at once, so as to be sure of getting the Bible in good time.

WHY THEY ARE BEST

They are Self-Pronouncing, have Large Type—restful to the eye—and superior Paper, Strong Flexible Binding, 60,000 selected marginal references, Complete Concordance, Latest Maps, Best Teacher's Helps, 4,500 questions and answers, etc. They have stood the test of time, criticism and competition, proving their adaptability for every need of the Bible student and reader, never failing to give complete satisfaction.

APPRECIATIVE EVIDENCE

Gentlemen.—Bibles have arrived. They give perfect satisfaction. I would not take four times the price I gave for them. Respectfully,
NELL M. REYNOLDS, Loami, Ill.

Gentlemen.—I received the two Bibles I ordered of you in due time. To say that I am pleased with them is putting it mildly. They are marvels of cheapness and beauty—two very commendable virtues. It's a rare chance to buy a serviceable Bible combined with beauty. REV. W. H. STEVENS, Kingsville, Ont.

Gentlemen.—Your handsome Bible was received today. I am highly elated at being the recipient of such a valuable book for the amount paid for it. It is as represented and well worth $4.00. Its clear type and beautiful finishings commend it to the public as a gem of much admiration. Its helps and aids are a feature of special delight to me. I was once a S. S. teacher and wish I could have had such a volume as this. I would commend it to every S. S. Teacher and Scholar.
Yours truly,
C. T. GORDY, Mobile, Ala.

Your Cooking Done 10 Days Free

Will you let us take the grind of cooking the meals off your hands for ten days—just as a test—if we do it absolutely free—absolutely without a penny from you?

Just Send Your Name

Just send us your name on the coupon below and we will mail you a free book that explains the whole offer—How without asking for a single cent of deposit or even for a reference we will put in your kitchen for 10 days' free trial a new kind of fireless cooker that will get your meals while you are doing other work or away enjoying yourself—that will be a bigger help to you than a maid.

We Lend It To You

We aren't asking you to buy this new kind of fireless cooker—the Perfection Fireless Steel Range—but only to try it.
We lend it to you, absolutely free, just for a test—
Just to show you how much time and trouble it saves—how you won't have to set foot in the kitchen from the time you put the foods in to cook until you are ready to eat—how you can go to church or shopping or calling and find everything ready to serve the minute you get back—how it roasts, bakes, boils, steams, stews or fries without the slightest danger of scorching or overcooking, no matter how long you leave the foods in, yet everything keeps piping hot—and how it will give you better things to eat, from soup to dessert, than when cooked in the old way.

Not A Mere Cooker Box

The free book tells everything you want to know about the Perfection—shows how it is a revolutionary improvement over the old-fashioned cooker boxes—range high—don't have to stoop or bend or get down on your knees to use it—patent disappearing oven—fine steel construction throughout—built to last a lifetime. Complete set of Wear-Ever aluminum cooking utensils that would cost you $5 or $6 at any store included free with each range.

Complete Outfit of "Wear-Ever" Aluminum Cooking Utensils and other equipment absolutely FREE with each range

(Patented)

See How It Saves

The book shows how a Perfection isn't an expense, but a positive economy—how it pays for itself over and over out of what it saves on fuel and on meat and grocery bills—how it makes the cheaper cuts of meat just as tender and tempting as the most expensive cuts cooked by gas or coal.

Special Low Factory Price If You Keep It

The book explains all about the 10 days' free trial—how you don't have to send us a single cent in advance—how there won't be a penny to pay if you are willing to return the range—how you can get our special factory-saving Direct-From-Factory price, and how you can pay for it a little each month if you prefer.

Quick

Better send for the book NOW. Tell us what you decide whether you want to try a Perfection—whether you want to let it cook your meals or save you money. A postal will do, but send it today—now.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

F. M. B., ILL. Bought at 80, American Can Co. preferred stock will yield 8.75 per cent. provided the 5 per cent. rate is permanent. The common stock receives no dividend nor is one possible until the further accumulation of deferred dividends on the preferred has been paid. Tax-exempt 5½ per cent. 12-yr. No. 60 Yes, as a non-speculative investment.

MISS E. A. L., OHIO. Cleveland Water Works bonds are a general obligation of the city of Cleveland, and any issue which is dated previous to January 1, 1913, is tax-free in your State. There is no reason why, in our judgment, these bonds do not deserve the high reputation awarded them.

MISS A. P., DELAWARE. Perpetual six per cent. interest bearing certificates of the Public Service of New Jersey were issued in exchange for stock of the United Electric Company of New Jersey and other companies, out of which the first-named corporation was formed, and are, therefore, practically a preferred stock, not a mortgage obligation of the issuing company.

MR. I. G. M., PENNSYLVANIA. Superintendent Bierneis of the Banking Department of the State of New York has announced that he has obtained supreme court orders which will enable him to pay at once nearly $360,000 in dividends to the depositors of the various closed banks under his supervision. The money will be distributed to nearly fifteen thousand depositors, including the claimholders of the Industrial Savings & Loan Co., and the New York Mortgage Company. The Industrial Savings & Loan Company depositors will now receive $2,819.74 and the New York Mortgage Company claimholders will receive $57,121.30.

W. W. S., INDIANA. City of San Francisco 5's offer a very attractive investment opportunity when sold at par. These bonds sold at 105 a year ago.

MISS E. P. R., MICHIGAN. A woman with but $200 cannot afford to invest it at all. Keep the money in the bank.

MISS E. R., TENNESSEE. Beware of certain music publishing firms. There are about a dozen of these concerns that should be regarded with suspicion. Some positively fraudulent ones already have been shut up by the postal authorities. The plan upon which they operate is much the same with all of them. They encourage people to write verse and charge them from $25 to $50 for arranging a "score" and for "publishing." If the song writer cannot pay the whole amount in advance the concern will take $5 down and $1 per week. [illegible] the return of the form of meat [illegible] has absolutely no talent for composition whatever and would be told so frankly by a reputable publishing house. But not so with the fake concern. This kind of firm will publish rubbish if the $50 is forthcoming, making the producer believe a fortune may result. But all the victim usually receives is a hundred cheaply printed copies of his song. If you have written a really meritorious hymn send it to J. Fisher & Bro., publishers and dealers in music, 7 Bible House, New York City.

MISS S., OHIO. The Union Mutual Life Insurance Company is one of the oldest in New England. The company's 64th annual report makes a good showing.

R. D. R., PENNSYLVANIA. The publishing business is highly competitive. The stock is not an investment.

E. P. D., NEBRASKA. Three per cent. loans on farms are an economic impossibility. It is doubted that any landowner, after making payments for a year to establish a credit, ever obtained a loan from the company. The Canadian postal authorities recently raided the offices of the concern and arrested the promoters.

S. W. R., NEW YORK. (1) Three-year 8 per cent. Dan Patch Railroad notes seem far removed from the investment class. (2) Mutual Film Corporation 7 per cent. cumulative preferred stock as a speculative investment seems to possess attractive features.

D. E. S., WEST VIRGINIA. (1) Have nothing to do with the man nor his various schemes. He has been thrice convicted of fraud. (2) The Victoria Chief C. M. & S. Co. is listed by The Cooper Handbook as "dead."

L. S. D., ILLINOIS. There is good reason for the present popularity of short-term bonds. Undoubtedly there are many long-term issues selling at attractive prices, but the present is a time of uncertainty and there are likely to be many opportunities to buy long-term bonds lower during the next year or two. For the person who wishes to hold himself in a position to take advantage of these opportunities where they arise, short-term securities are a highly suitable medium of investment.

H. J., NEW JERSEY. We can obtain no information regarding the Thunder Mountain Consolidated Gold Mining Company. More money went into Thunder Mountain stock than ever came out, probably a thousandfold more. Thunder Mountain proved to be a bad egg.

C. A. S., CONNECTICUT. Stamford Water Company first 5s, due in 1915, are considered a good investment issue. Avoid a sale if possible.

A STRANGE CHINESE PUNISHMENT

ON JULY 7, in the prefectoral city of Liuchowfu in the province of Kwangsi, South China, three men, accused of crime, were stripped half naked, then dragged along the narrow streets, through the city gate to a place outside the city wall, where they were thrown into burning pits, and after suffering indescribable agony in the flames, were riddled with bullets, and then covered with earth. The crime charged against them was the murder of four soldiers, who the officials claim were suppressing gambling in the country districts when they were killed by a mob. The report current among the people was that these soldiers became involved in a quarrel, and three of them were killed in the melee that followed. After the execution, orders were issued that the entire village should be destroyed. Soldiers went from house to house and arrested as many men as they could find, and then set fire to the village. The prisoners were brought to the city for punishment, and nine of them were led outside the city wall and shot on the execution ground.

LOOKING INTO THE PIT

That this is an isolated case of cruelty we are glad to believe, for if in the name of law the Chinese officials are going to resort to the barbarities practiced in the Middle Ages, it will bring the name of the new republic into disgrace, and put far distant the day when claim can be made to civilization. (REV.) W. H. OLDFIELD.

THE TEST OF THE HARVEST

THE summer is over and the harvest is past. The sad skies, the bleak fields, the bare trees, the raw winds that whistle and groan and sob and sigh their dirges mournfully remind us that the season of fruitage has gone by and the time has come when we can only turn away, each to himself, and measure up our garnerings.

Nature gives us a seed time and a harvest time.

But these would be meaningless to us did she not also send a season when, at the warning touch of winter chill, we must measure our gains and consider our losses.

But for the lessons of this season no man would labor; we would know naught of temperance or thrift; we would go through the bright spring only singing, and idle away the summer in dreams.

So it is part of the divine plan that each of us should now go apart and carefully separate the wheat from the chaff, the flowers from the weeds, and that which is good and sound and enduring from all that perishes and taints. It is now that each must honestly examine and weigh the product of his own work.

It were useless now to try to deceive even ourselves.

Now, if at no other time, we see the vast difference in value between the picked fruit and the windfalls.

The one heap we proudly store away, knowing it will keep sweet and whole to the winter's depths, and the other we cast aside, that it may not contaminate as it rots.

It is a sad, sweet task—sweet for the counted gains, sad for the opportunities lost and to come no more.

And as we garner the gains we also garner wisdom.

As we separate the wheat from the chaff and the sound fruit from the windfalls, so, whether we will or not, we must in the inner consciousness separate the true from the false in principles of labor and living.

In the assorting, the garnering and the casting away, we must learn, if we will not learn it otherwise, that the best fruit comes to him who climbs rather than to him who only shakes the tree, while the man who lies at his ease in the shade, waiting for ripe fruit to fall to his hands, must go hungry.

No man, even of three-score—aye, four-score and ten, has ever known this law to fail in a single season. It knows no variation in all the cycles of time.

But grains and fruits are not all that we are garnering. Chaff and weeds are not all we ought to separate and cast away. There are things more important still. In the storehouse of the heart and mind and soul, is it not well to seek, just as carefully, though sometimes in vain, to keep only the better, the brighter, the more enduring things?

When the bleak November of life comes we shall have need of them.

Dreary will be the winter to him whose granaries are empty. But drearier and more desolate still must be the winter of old age to the man or woman whose mind and heart and soul have brought from the harvest only the joys that are chaff and the virtues that are mere windfalls, attained and adhered to only through easy convenience.

When that winter comes, as it must to many of us, we shall have only ourselves to turn to, and we shall find only that which we have sown and harvested in the bright spring and golden summer—the good grain, the sound fruit, the flowers, the high impulses, the sacrifices, the loves, yes, and the cheat, the chaff, the weeds, the windfalls, the hates, the jealousies, the low passions—all these and nothing more, to sustain us or to render us desolate.

We may, if we will, make each day a cycle of all the seasons. We sow each morning and reap each noon and garner each evening the fruits of our living in this little day. Day by day, if we strive on in right and hope and courage, must our knowledge and our strength and our store increase. Day by day, through many failings and fallings, do we come nearer to the true manhood and the true womanhood.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

CHILDHOOD IN KOREA

BY FRANK L. BROWN

Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

ANYBODY SPEAK?

THAT little girl, a mere child herself, who in the picture is bearing so uncomplainingly the burden of a little brother or sister, is typical of the millions of children in this "Land of the Morning Calm," who have entered life handicapped by burdens beyond their strength and robbed of their heritage. In my three visits to Korea in the last seven years I have seen them, thousands of them, dressed in the gayest of colors, yellow, red, green, pink, black, the waist of one color and the skirt of another, hatless, with coal-black hair, black eyes and rounded faces, so patient and appreciative.

The boys, with military caps and erect bearing, are polite, alert, absorbing through eye and ear the facts of world progress, as the extension of the school system by the Japanese from the larger cities to the villages broadens the outlook of these Korean boys and girls, and gives them a new self-reliance.

Until the Japanese came into possession of Korea, just a few years back, the only education possible to these Korean children was attained in the primary schools established by the missions and taught by Christian Koreans. Gradually these schools are likely to be replaced by those introduced by the Japanese. In the old mission school the Bible was taught. Now the Sunday school must be developed to do this work of Bible teaching, as the Japanese schools, of course, do not teach religion.

These Korean children, living in mud huts and playing in yards circumscribed by bamboo paling or mud walls, have not a square chance at cleanliness. Sanitation is unknown in the ordinary Korean household. Fresh air is considered an enemy rather than a friend, and all apertures through which a little air might enter are carefully closed. The smoke from the fire, where the family rice is cooked, runs through a pipe underneath the earthen floor of the living room and finds an exit on the side of the wall, and not upon the roof, and these blackened exits are a part of the side-wall decorations of Korean homes.

If, perchance, a Korean child has a stomach ache, the evil spirit causing the pain must be dislodged, and so long needles puncture the body, in order to drive out the disturber. On the heads of many children are bald spots, caused by application of hot irons to get rid of the spirits. Smallpox and similar troubles multiply under these conditions. Children are purposely exposed to these diseases as an economic measure. For if a child is to die from one of these afflictions, it had better die young so that the expense of the upbringing may be spared the home. Truly, it is a question in Korean, as in Chinese homes, of the survival of the fittest. But the Japanese officials are gradually compelling better sanitation and reducing mortality.

AM I WORTH SAVING?

With their short waists and full skirts a bunch of Korean girls look like old women. Very quaint are they and very wide awake, as you see them squatted on the floor at a Sunday school or church gathering. When they come in with their Bibles and hymn books they bow on hands and knees until their foreheads touch the floor, then adjust themselves to their inexpensive, backless floor seat, waiting in quietness and perfect patience until things start.

Children are always placed at the front in these gatherings, the girls on one side of the partition which separates the sexes, and the boys on the other side. They sing with a gusto and intensity that seems to lift the slanting Korean roof.

When in Korea last year I addressed a gathering of 1,600 Korean children at the Presbyterian Church at Pyeng Yang. The World Sunday school salute, which these children gave, clasping their hands over their heads, made a beautiful picture. They are wonderfully responsive. In fact, they are just like the boys and girls of America if given a chance at education and Christian training.

But they have not had a square chance in the past. The big folk have not considered the child's rights, and so in their Sunday schools to which the adults flock in Korea the same lesson was taught both adults and children, with no effort to simplify for the children, or to illustrate, or to give by exercises any expression to the activities of these little folks. But better days are here and now graded illustrated Sunday school lessons are in Korea and the child is being considered in his special needs in accordance with modern progressive ideals.

FIRST CRADLE ROLL MEMBER

Then, strangely, the heathen child, the one not from a Christian home, was considered outside the responsibility of the church until recently, when that Sunday school genius, Mr. M. L. Swinehart, entered these heathen villages and established some twenty-five Sunday schools with children from homes that were not Christian. And these children quickly learn the Lord's Prayer, Beatitudes, Twenty-third Psalm and Bible facts.

SOMEBODY HERE IS DOING MOST OF THE WORK

The Japanese in Korea are requiring the teaching of the Japanese language in missions as well as in the public schools. Gradually the youth of Korea will absorb Japanese ideals, and while at present official positions under the government are not open to the Koreans, this may come to pass in time.

The influence of the Japanese is shown, too, in the modification of Korean customs. Only a few years back a Korean girl would rarely be found in public after twelve years of age. Her place was at home, and if she ventured out her head and face would be covered, with the exception of the right eye. As the Japanese women wear no headdress when they are in the open, the Korean girls and women are now found in the streets with uncovered face, although holding to a headdress still.

Korea has about 200,000 in her Sunday schools, the bulk of these adults, the children being left at home as caretakers. They have had the whole Bible only a few years. They bring it and the hymn book to church and turn to the references as made.

These keen-minded Korean children, however, become expert Bible memorizers. I found a group of girls in the Methodist Sunday school at Pyeng Yang, who had committed blocks of Scripture to memory. Four girls had recited the entire New Testament excepting one book. And children and adults endeavor to carry out literally the life and spirit of the New Testament. I met one man at Pyeng Yang who had spoken to 3,400 individuals the previous year, urging them to accept Christ. I met a group of boys, sixteen to eighteen years old, from the Methodist Boys' School, who had given up their Christmas holidays to hold evangelistic services in surrounding villages, with the result that over 3,000 were converted. A modern Pentecost, and mere boys were the leaders.

And the many Christian blind in Korea are helping along Bible study. Blind Wang made the entire New Testament for the blind out of ten squares cut from Standard Oil cans. A converted blind sorceress at Seoul was the first Bible Home Department member for Korea. Her face shone as I accorded her this recognition. And a blind man is superintendent of the Methodist Sunday school at Songdo. He commits the entire service, Scripture and all, to memory. He walked to the station with me to bid me good-by and said: "Tell the people of America to keep on praying for Korea. Take John 3: 16 as my message to them."

WHO WANTS TO BUY?

[illegible] A CONVERSION

This is the spirit that runs through the Bible and the Sunday school. Some Kaffirs a great privilege have to be theirs.

On a glorious May day in 1911 there took place the baptism, [illegible] of the first of the Kaffirs who, [illegible] years ago, [illegible] the Gospel from the lips of [illegible] Mr. Hall, of Peddie, and many years have passed over the head of Christian native. That man of African descent, with humility and [illegible] to all the spiritual gifts of Kaffir consecrated and consecrated, married to the native graduate and by the Salvation Army band, and reading "Onward Christian Soldiers" [illegible] and wrote on the present under a brick [illegible] with a background of [illegible] and [illegible] to Tell Them, a [illegible] and when that [illegible] by Dr. Underwood, sang "Jesus Loves Me," as requested in the gospel with [illegible] it was like the "sound of many waters."

Mr. H. M. Hall of Peddie gave the message of America's Sunday school [illegible] to those Kaffir members of the World's Sunday-school family. With hands clasped over the head, the [illegible] of America will Keep the Bible study and world conquest for the Lord Jesus Christ was heartily expressed. And Ours will the Boldness of Kaffirs be given by heritage.

An American Evangelist in Ancient Guildhall, London

From a London Correspondent

I DON'T mind in the course of a long journalistic experience I ever saw [illegible] more remarkable than the four midday meetings for city men which Mr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander held in the London Guildhall. It was not the assembly itself so much as the entire character of the meeting-place. The great old Guildhall, [illegible] of London, is one of our most sacred old institutions. It was destroyed in 1666, restored in 1789, and restored in 1866. How kings and queens have been crowned, great heroes honored, great [illegible] held. Here the mayor of each City Company, that has [illegible] for most [illegible] all the freedom of the city, as great Englishmen. Here only a few weeks ago, the prime minister delivered his stirring call to arms [illegible] to take it into a [illegible] hall! That was startling, indeed. It is [illegible] that in recent years the Bishop of London has occasionally delivered [illegible] addresses there, but these have been quiet, [illegible] Church of England gatherings. To those who love the Guildhall and its associations it was extraordinary to see Mr. Alexander springing to his [illegible] pulpit, as a jack-in-the-box, clapping his hands, stamping his feet, smiling and waving the city men, in the most irritatingly [illegible] way, into a passing [illegible].

At the Y. M. C. A. at one meeting a hundred men made definite decision for Christ. All through the mission, which was seen to last from September 20 to October 11, there have been results which the peculiar circumstances have made the more remarkable. Many of those [illegible] have been sent to Egypt, preparing to go on active service. Mr. Chapman's daily mail included many pathetic letters. One was from a man who wrote: "At the Y. M. C. A. they call me a Christian. As a matter of fact, I am a thief, and I have stolen this. Please pray for me." This situation [illegible] in wartime, amid much [illegible] and excitement and commercial anxiety, will long be memorable and its results will be far-reaching. Probably—who can say?—many soldiers on the battlefield are now singing Mr. Alexander's [illegible] songs, and others will fight all the more heroically because before they began to serve the King Dr. Chapman's thrilling message won their allegiance to the King of Kings.

[illegible] OF HOLY

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUA

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

Indian troops, the exposure proved too much for him, a cold first, then penumonia, and the end.

This death has been mourned by friend and foe alike. "Bobs," as he was affectionately nicknamed, was highly regarded not only at home but all over the world as well. Even in Germany the leading Berlin newspaper says in its editorial on his death: "There are moments when one uses the sword to salute an enemy; not to smite him."

A simple, kindly old man, he was the best general Great Britain had produced in our time, and as a strategist his country has particular cause to mourn his loss at this moment, for, old as he was, his counsel was of value. A born fighter, he was also, as born fighters nearly always are, chivalrous toward his foes. His end came as it should within the sound of booming guns, fitting "passing bells" for a true soldier.

Great Britain honored the dead general and honored herself by giving him a public funeral at St. Paul's, which was attended by the king and all those who make England what England is, excepting only those who are fighting their country's battles on the firing-line in France.

Parliament opened during the week, and arrangements were promptly made for financing the war expenses of the government. The premier announced that the British loss to the date of his speaking approximated 57,000. Authority was granted for the recruiting of the additional 1,000,000 men requested by Lord Kitchener.

The military training of the young Prince of Wales has now advanced so far that he has received permission from Lord Kitchener, heretofore refused, to go to the front, and he is now on his way. He will be attached as aide-de-camp to the staff of General French, and will probably have a taste of real fighting. All the royal houses of the combatant Powers are now represented at the front by some one of their members, excepting, of course, France, which has no royal house.

Speaking of France, the trouble-maker Joseph Caillaux and his notorious wife have been sent out of the country, a mission to investigate the capacities of Brazil to supply foodstuffs for French consumption being the gilding of the pill. It would be interesting to know what foodstuffs Brazil could supply to France; coffee can hardly be considered foodstuff.

During the week there have been many minor happenings on the ocean, but no great battles. The German auxiliary cruiser Berlin, a North German Lloyd steamer in the piping times of peace, escaped from the Baltic into the North Sea during the week, but once there found it impossible to get any further, and being chased by superior forces detached from the British blockading fleet, made her way into the harbor of Trondhjem, Norway, where she was interned and disarmed, to remain until the end of the war.

The German cruiser Karlsruhe, which has been terrorizing the British shipping in the South Atlantic, was reported captured during the week, but this report turned out to be unfounded, and she is still at large. She is now credited with having taken seventeen British merchant ships, and is apparently in a fair way of rivaling the celebrated Emden.

The Glasgow, the sole survivor of the fight off the Chilean coast, has arrived at Rio Janeiro in a damaged condition, and will, it is said, repair there. Nothing has been heard of the Monmouth since the fight, and she has been given up as lost. Some fears are felt for the safety of the Canopus, which has not been heard from in a long time.

BEDOUIN CHIEFS OF EGYPT, TYPICAL OF THOSE WHO MAY SUPPORT ENGLAND

The first lord of the admiralty announced during the week that the British naval losses to the date of the announcement had mounted to 15 war vessels of cruiser type or larger, and some 6,500 men, of whom about 5,800 are dead.

Late in the week a combat took place between the Russian and Turkish fleets in the Black Sea, near Sebastopol. Both sides claim a victory, and neither gives many details, so that at this distance it is impossible to know who really won.

The German Baltic fleet, also late in the week, bombarded the Russian port of Libau in that sea. Several vessels were sunk, with the result, it is said, of blocking the entrance to the port; the railroad station and some oil tanks were destroyed.

UNITED STATES CRUISER TENNESSEE, WHOSE LAUNCH WAS FIRED ON BY TURKS AT SMYRNA

An occurrence of the week of much interest to Americans was the firing on a launch in which the captain of the cruiser Tennessee was proceeding from Vourlah to Smyrna, Asia Minor, to pay official calls, by the Turks. Although without definite details at this writing as to just what occurred, our officials at Washington have no doubt that the incident, no matter where the responsibility lay, will be promptly adjusted through diplomatic channels, so there is no need of excitement about the matter. Some people have taken a serious view of the incident, claiming that it is an outcome of the proclamation of the Holy War by the Sultan and the Sheik-ul-Islam, forgetting that the proclamation was against the British, French and Russians only.

The effect of that proclamation up to the present time does not seem to be very great. Probably its effects will be felt only in Egypt, Afghanistan, Algeria and Turkestan, and, except in the first two, it may well be doubted whether there will be any real consequences. The attitude of the Khedive of Egypt may give the movement body in that country and force a guerilla warfare on Great Britain there, and the fanaticism of the Afghans may cause them to make raids on the adjacent portions of India, but this will probably be all.

The real significance of the declaration is that Germany, following the example set by the Allies, has called pagans and Moslems into activities against the white man, which course of action may have bitter results for the white man hereafter.

The weather has been very bad everywhere in Europe during the past week; heavy snows have fallen in Poland, East Prussia, and Galicia, and in France there has been heavy rain mingled with snow and sleet, as well as fog in some sections, all of which has caused great suffering among the troops in the trenches. Sickness is increasing enormously, particularly affections of the throat and lungs, and there are reports that the troops stationed near the East Indian forces have contracted Asiatic dysentery from them. These East Indian troops are in a really bad way, owing to the change of climate and water.

The news from South Africa rather seems to indicate that the rebellion led by Generals DeWet and Beyers is not meeting with much success. General Botha has again inflicted a defeat on General De Wet's forces, said to amount to some 1,200 in number, and to have succeeded to a large degree in scattering this force after its defeat with considerable loss. It looks as though irregular and sporadic fighting might continue for some time, but that the backbone of the rebellion is broken.

In the Turko-Russian campaign the Turks inflicted a severe check on the Russian invaders of Armenia. This fight took place in the region of Kopzukine near Erzerum. The Russian advance guard had been advancing with success towards Erzerum for several days, when finally the Turks made a stand and drove back the advance guard on its main body, which they also attacked and drove back some distance. The Russians admit a check, and the Turks claim to have captured 4,000 men with several guns.

The Turks, however, did not come off so fortunately in an encounter they had at Sheik-Said with a force of British troops, mixed whites and East Indians, by whom they were attacked and driven from Fort Turba, with a loss said to be of about a thousand men. There is no more news of the projected invasion of Egypt, nor of the much-talked-of movement against the Suez Canal. The canal by this time is probably well guarded.

The Austrians are really making progress in their Servian campaign. During the week after a successful fight at Valjevo, where the Servians lost about 6,000 men and some twenty guns, the Austrian forces drove them back to the outer line of the Belgrade defenses and are preparing to assault that city simultaneously from the north and southwest.

The whole of northwestern Servia seems to be in Austrian hands and the country cleared of its defending troops. This campaign is of great importance to the Austrians, for they regard it as a crusade to revenge their murdered prince.

Coming northward, the fighting in Bukowina during the last week has increased in severity. According to cables from Rumania the Russians are endeavoring to recapture the capital, Czernowitz, which they once held, and are being strenuously resisted by the Austrians. The issue of the fighting, however, is not yet determined. Both here and elsewhere the improvement in the fighting abilities of the Austrian troops seems to continue.

FRENCH ALGERIANS BEING ADMIRED IN FURNES

THE LUST OF BLOOD

A SERMON

BY

Rev. D. J. Burrell, D.D., LL.D.*

"Thou shalt not kill." Ex. 20: 13

WHO said that? God said it, amid the thunderings of Sinai. But who cares? The law was spoken three thousand years ago; and today the earth is trembling under the footfalls of armies. All Europe is red with blood. The day breaks with the clash of steel and the night winds whisper "Kill! Kill." The smell of blood is in the air. The lust of blood is in the hearts of men.

Is God responsible? The rulers of all the Powers now engaged in war have all, with a single exception, laid the responsibility upon God. Thanks to the unspeakable Turk for unsheathing his sword without crying, "Allah il Allah!" It is unthinkable that God should be the author of War, since his other name is Love. He came all the way from heaven to say so. On the slopes of Olivet he taught it: "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; pray for them that despitefully use you." On the cross he exemplified it: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

No; war is of the Prince of Darkness. By very name he is the adversary of both God and man. The dripping sword is bathed in hell; the burning brand is kindled in hell.

But this would signify nothing were it not for the grip which Satan has upon us. Sin expresses itself in terms of hatred; and hatred is constructive war. So the Master said: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; but I say unto you, He that hateth his brother without a cause is in danger of the judgment," because, by a just interpretation of the law, he hath already committed murder in his heart. Sin in its essence is both suicidal and homicidal. It ripens into meanness and selfishness, malice and vindictiveness; and "when it is finished it bringeth forth death." Thus the embers of war are ever smoldering in the hearts of men.

How long shall this be? On a July day in 1863, just after the battle of Gettysburg, President Lincoln, surveying the field of carnage, said sadly, "This is awful! This is awful! But it must go on."

What Shall End War?

Must it go on? Yes, so long as the Prince of Darkness reigns in the councils of nations and in the hearts of the children of men. It must go on so long as sin is dominant in this world of ours: for it is sin alone that scatters the dragon's teeth. Sin is selfishness; and selfishness is hatred; and hatred is murder. Sin is like poison in the blood; war is only a cutaneous symptom of the contagious malady which prevails among us.

It must go on so long as governments are instruments of overweening ambition; so long as the right needs vindication, and innocence needs defense. What else did Jesus mean when he said, "I am come not to send peace but a sword"? So long as the Philistines ravage the homes of Israel the rams' horns will be heard upon the mountain, "To the help of the Lord! To the help of the Lord against the mighty!" So long as there is a Philip II to kindle the fagots of persecution the "Beggars of Holland" will march to defend their homes and hearthstones with the cry "Oranje boven!" So long as there is a bloody Claverhouse to sweep Scotland with a besom, the Covenanters will rally under the standard of "Christ's Crown and Covenant." The sword thus unsheathed for truth and justice and the vindication of the oppressed is the Sword of the Lord: and it will never rest in its scabbard until wrong and oppression are driven out of the earth. Meanwhile "the Son of God goes forth to war"; and blessed is he who follows in his train.

In the beauty of the lilies
Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in his bosom
That transfigures you and me:
As he died to make men holy,
Let us die to make men free:
For God is marching on!

It is obvious, however, that the responsibility for this condition of things is with the wrongdoer and not with the defender of truth and justice. The nation that will not stand for principle and adventure all in the behalf of justice and humanity is surely not ordained of God. What are governments for but to protect society? It is manifest, however, that such protection with all its bloody issues would be unnecessary were it not for the encroachments of tyranny upon the most sacred rights of man.

But what shall make an end of war? Will Progress do it? We are living in the very climacteric of progress; and behold a war that, in its character and dimensions, puts to shame the barbarism of the ages!

Has the Gospel Failed?

Will Arbitration end it? Far be it from me to utter a word against those who have so earnestly conferred and so successfully, too, for the setting up of arbitral courts to determine upon all international disputes without the resort to arms. But behold the result: "The mountain travails and brings forth a mouse." The Peace Palace at The Hague, which signalizes the high-water mark of all Peace Conferences, is as silent today as the tomb of old Sesostris and echoes only to the footfall of soldiers marching by.

Will Diplomacy make an end of it? By all means let statesmen do their utmost; yet the pathway of diplomacy has thus far led only to compromise; and compromise is but a makeshift after all.

Will Prayer end it? The only prayer which can hope for an answer is that which is offered in humble pursuance of the revealed will and plans and purposes of God. To pray in contravention of his Word is as vain as it would be to hurl a syllogism at the Palisades. The plans and purposes of God concerning the bringing in of ultimate peace have been so clearly revealed that we are without excuse if we do not offer our supplications in line with his holy will.

When shall the end be? So the disciples asked of Jesus while he discoursed to them of the coming of the Golden Age and the restitution of all things. "Master, when shall these things be?" It pleased him, thereupon, to give them a sign: "The Gospel must first be preached throughout the whole world; then shall the end be." Then and not before will the Millennium be ushered in.

But they tell us the Gospel has been on trial for some thousands of years and has proven "a failure." No, not a failure; but a postponed success; and postponed only and obviously because the Master has not been taken at his word.

The Gospel has not been "preached throughout the whole world." In this twentieth century of the Christian era there are still twelve hundred millions of people who have not heard it. The prophecy of Christ is unfulfilled because his great commission has not been carried out. There cannot be ultimate and universal peace until the conditions are met.

The so-called "Christian nations" are not converted. The evidence of that fact is forthcoming in the ratio of their patriotism to their piety. Patriotism is a Christian virtue; but when patriotism is exalted above piety, it becomes a non-Christian vice. The patriotism which is exploited today is usually a mere synonym for national pride. One of the great powers which calls itself Christian has recently solicited and secured in twenty-four hours no less than a thousand millions of dollars toward the carrying on of the present war: and the same Christian nation has not contributed one million in the last decade for the propagation of the Gospel among the unevangelized peoples of the earth! What does that mean? It means that the enthusiasm of piety is to the enthusiasm of patriotism in the proportion of one-tenth of one per cent.! Yet ruler and people alike are besieging heaven for the conclusion of this war. It were better to cease asking God to be upon our side until we have definitely decided that we are upon the side of God.

And the church itself is not adequately converted yet. We are hearing much of "mobilization" in these days. At the drum-beat the standing armies were in line. Then followed peremptory call upon the reserves to fall in. How has the church mobilized for the holy war? The call of the Master is "Go ye"; and it is addressed to all who profess to follow him. There are no reserves. Alas, it is to be feared that many who profess his name are quite indifferent. The Great Commission falls on heedless ears. If Wesley's conception of a mobilized church—"all at it, always at it, altogether at it"—were realized, the propaganda of the Gospel would not have languished for these nineteen hundred years. It would have sounded through the whole earth until the last sinner should have bowed his knees.

But the lesson goes deeper yet. It has a personal significance for you and me. "The mind that was in Christ Jesus" does not rule in us. We hear the voice of Abel crying for vengeance from the ground, and its answer is the blare of a trumpet; but "The voice of Jesus speaketh better things than that of Abel," and we are slow to hear it. What says the blood of Jesus? "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you and pray for them that despitefully use you." If a man smite me on one cheek it bids me turn to him the other also. It speaks from the cross in that most wonderful prayer, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." Oh, how far we are from the gentle and forgiving spirit of the Prince of Peace!

Thus It Is Written

But the day of better things is coming. The world moves and every time it rolls around its axis it rolls a little further into the light of God. "His purposes will ripen fast." The dawn of universal peace will surely come in the fulness of time. It would appear that the Second Psalm was written for the very days we are living in. "The kings of the earth set themselves and the rulers take counsel against the Lord and against his Anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder and cast away their cords from us!" And what has the Lord to say to the challenge of the great Powers? "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh! The Lord shall have them in derision." Then hear him utter his edict: "Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill. I will declare the decree: Thou art my Son; ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Thus it is written and thus it must be.

But what can we ourselves do to hasten the desired end? It behooves us to get right with God; to divest ourselves of envy and meanness and selfishness and hatred and every form of sin, which is blood-guiltiness; to put ourselves in line with the purposes of God for the conversion of the world and the bringing-in of the ultimate reign of peace and righteousness among men. It is not enough to pray, "Thy kingdom come," unless we are lined up with those who are doing their utmost to bring in the kingdom. And withal it behooves us to offer our prayers with faith in the ultimate outcome of the pacific mission of Christ. The only prevailing prayer is that which takes him at his word and follows the clear pathway of his holy will.

The time is coming when the smoke of conflict will lift and we shall perceive how the omnipotent and omniscient God has been so ruling and overruling in history that even the wrath of men shall praise him. The blood of Christ will ultimately purge the world of its blood-lust and he who came to save us with garments dyed red in the winepress will come again in raiment of fine linen, clean and white, to usher in the truce of God.

For lo, the days are hastening on,
By prophet bards foretold,
When with the ever circling years
Comes in the age of gold,
When peace shall over all the earth
Her ancient splendors fling,
And the whole world give back the song
Which now the angels sing.

"Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will toward men."

Then shall the glory of the Lord cover the earth as the waters cover the sea; then shall the spear be broken asunder and the chariot be cast into the fire; then shall every man dwell in peace under his own vine and fig-tree; then shall the tabernacle of God come down among men, and he will dwell with them and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be their God.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, December 6. John 8: 12. "I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." Our Lord resumes his discourse to the people. It may be, as some think, that the imagery of our text was suggested by another ceremony connected with the Feast of Tabernacles: the lighting of the golden candlestick in the court of the women and the brilliant illumination of the homes of the Israelites. This was in commemoration of the fiery pillar which had led the van of Israel's host on their way to Canaan. The pilgrims were about to start for their homes. Our Lord dismisses them with a parting blessing. He is the Light of the world. Through him the light was commanded in the beginning to shine forth out of darkness. But more lustrous than sun and moon and stars is the light of truth and righteousness, mercy and love which he sends into human hearts, to dispel the darkness of spiritual ignorance, to dissipate the gloom of sin, to scatter the clouds of despair, to lift the pall of death. He came at his birth into the land of the shadow of death. He was the day-star of a new era. He came into the dungeon of sin and vice and guilt as the Sun of righteousness with healing in his wings. He enters into the dark chambers of contrite hearts and imparts the light of faith and hope to the crushed spirits of men. He is a light in them that believe. These walk no longer in darkness. Earth and heaven, here and beyond, this life and that which is to come, have received a new meaning for them, because Christ is in them and they in Christ. The truth as it is in Christ Jesus has in them become a lamp of faith to light up the highways of life for themselves and their fellow pilgrims. They press forward, buoyed with the confidence of an undying hope, through the gathering shadows of life's eventide on to the everlasting light of glory and to the life that has no end.

MONDAY, December 7. John 8: 14. "Though I bear record of myself, yet my record is true: for I know whence I came, and whither I go; but ye cannot tell whence I come, and whither I go." The Pharisees had attacked the claim which Jesus has just made, viz., that he is the light of the world. The ground of their objection is that his testimony, being self-witnessed, must be discounted because such testimony is prompted by bias begotten of self-interest. Perhaps the Pharisees remembered what our Lord had said about the value of self-testimony at the healing of the impotent man. However, either they did not remember all he had said, or they garbled his statement. Christ now declares even his self-witness incontrovertible by asserting his wonderful self-consciousness. This assertion is one of the profoundest utterances in the Bible on the mysterious personality of Jesus. It has been rightly said that into the life which Jesus lived in the flesh there flowed constantly the thought of two eternities: that out of which he had come when he was incarnate, and that into which he was entering by suffering and death. Jesus is the real superman, and only one such man has ever lived on earth. Nor will there ever be one like him. True man that he was, he possessed a personality distinct from his humanity though now united with the same in one personage. When a person constituted as Jesus was speaks of himself, he will always utter things which must baffle the comprehension of men. The Jews, and thousands since then, have balked at the statement of his eternal origin and mission. But the self-testimony of Jesus must be put in a higher class than mere human self-testimony. How can a being such as he was speak differently concerning himself than he did?

TUESDAY, December 8. John 8: 15. "Ye judge after the flesh; I judge no man." Jesus deplores the unfortunate attitude of his critics toward him. It is really unworthy of them; for it does not do their real intelligence justice. Their view of him is quite carnal. They gather from their observation of him no more than the physical organs of perception can convey to them: he is a man. Why, a dumb brute running up to Jesus would apperceive that much about him, and could also tell, by the treatment it received from him, whether he was a kind or cruel man, etc. Jesus, then, urges his critics to look below the surface of his humanity. He was flesh, indeed; but he was the Word made flesh. And men had in his flesh beheld the glory of the Only-Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. What should hinder the Pharisees from seeing what others had seen? Unbiased souls in all ages have never found it impossible to become convinced that Jesus was more than a man. Even the centurion under the cross, to whom the "flesh"—the human life and earthly existence of Christ—was exposed in its most abject and forbidding form, had caught a glimpse of his true personality that was sufficient to wring from him the confession of the divinity of Jesus. What would become of us if Jesus were to judge as he is being judged? When men pass superficial judgment on our actions, we confidently appeal to him who knows us through and through. We expect from him, not a carnal, but a spiritual opinion of ourselves. Just so we must approach the study of his personality. Above all, let us remember that we are now dealing with him, not as our future Judge, but as our present merciful Redeemer.

WEDNESDAY, December 9. John 8: 16-18. "And yet if I judge, my judgment is true: for I am not alone, but I and the Father that sent me. It is also written in your law, that the testimony of two men is true. I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father that sent me beareth witness of me." For the truth that our Lord is the Light of the world, he had appealed to his own consciousness, which was so real, strong and clear that he could never renounce it without becoming a liar. But he is willing to meet his critics on the common ground of secular law: two witnesses, as the law of Moses requires, shall establish the truthfulness of his claim. Every person must be allowed to speak in his own behalf, and hence self-testimony must be admitted as the deposition of one witness. Jesus has told his opponents the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, about himself. His testimony has received ample corroboration by a magnificent series of signs and wonders which the Father wrought since his Son entered this world. Not the least of these wonders is the firm conviction that has been wrought by the preaching of Jesus in the hearts of many followers that he is a teacher come from God, and that is, come to save. Of this latter fact the Pharisees had knowledge in abundance. They must admit, then, that Jesus is legally attested to them, by the power of his own word and the signal co-operation of the Father with him, as a divine man. And now the Lord inverts the argument of his opponents: if he should choose to pass judgment on them and their mode of reasoning, would he not be just in condemning their attitude toward him as blasphemy and apostasy, because the very facts they cite for their support are against them? Thus truth meets lie on its own ground, and conquers.

THURSDAY, December 10. John 8: 19. "Ye neither know me, nor my Father: if ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also." When Jesus had appealed to the testimony of his Father, the Pharisees had asked: "Where is thy father?" That was spoken in irony. They virtually admitted that by the concurrent testimony of the Father with his own, Jesus had established his claim by two witnesses. But as they had rejected Jesus' testimony, so they now proceed to assail the validity of the testimony of the Father which he had cited in his defense. They know of no such "father" as Jesus appeals to. Now, it must be borne in mind that the term "father" was a common designation among the Jews for the Deity. There was not the least doubt as to whom Jesus meant when he spoke of "the Father." The irony of the Pharisees, therefore, was only a reiteration in malicious form of their standing denial of his divine Son-ship. Jesus was no doubt saddened by this mean question. It must have distressed him to note how these men sought to escape also the legal argument he had advanced—these men who pretended to be such great respectors of the law. He suggested to them that, as men often do, they might have drawn inferences from the character of the Father to that of the Son, and vice versa. Their incapacity to grasp Jesus is proof that they do not know the Father either, though they boast him as their God. Denial of Jesus necessarily includes denial of the true God. God can be truly known only in and through the Son. All worship of God that leaves out Jesus is idolatry; for it is the worship of a being that men have constructed to suit their own fancy, not of that Supreme Being who has been fully revealed in Jesus, and who is the only true God.

FRIDAY, December 11. John 8: 21. "I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins: whither I go, ye cannot come." A new scene, tragic like those that have gone before, is here presented. The Jewish authorities had attempted to arrest Jesus, but had not succeeded, for his hour had not yet arrived. Words like these in our text Jesus had uttered a few days before; but with the present repetition of his previous statement, there is here connected a more ominous prediction. When Jesus shall have made his exit from the scene of his activity among them, when he shall have passed through the portals of death out of shame into glory, the Jews will go on in their blindness. Their rejection of Jesus the Messiah will rest upon them like a curse. In the terrible days that are coming they will strain their eyes with feverish unrest, watching for the great Deliverer of their race. They will passionately expostulate with God for not sending him; they will be maddened to blasphemous fury against Jehovah, but there will be no Helper. They will die in this sin, the rejection of their only Saviour. The unbelief which governs all their actions now will prove a baneful spell on their souls in their dying hour. They will pass away unreconciled with God, and pass on to their final doom. They have, by their own choice, become forever separated from him who alone could help them in life and death. Oh, with what crushing weight these words of Jesus still fall on all who are impenitent and refuse to accept his atoning sacrifice: "Ye shall die in your sin."

SATURDAY, December 12. John 8: 23. "Ye are from beneath; I am from above: ye are of this world; I am not of this world." Our Lord's statement about his departure from them the Jews interpreted to mean that he contemplated self-destruction. Only a suicide, they reasoned, could determine the time of his departure beforehand. Suicides went to hell. Thither they would never go. Accordingly, they believed, he was correct in saying that they would never meet. There was bitter scorn and mockery in this taunt. Jesus tells them the separation between him and them has already begun. He had just indicated its final form; now he speaks of its present aspect. Though only a few inches of space separate Jesus from them while he is speaking these words to them, he is thousands of leagues removed from them morally. Their lives and his life even now are spent in two different hemispheres. Theirs is the lower, his the higher. They are of this world, senuous, carnal, earth-bound, selfish, unspiritual. He is heavenly-minded, filled with the Holy Spirit, holding his citizenship on high. He has desired to lift them to his higher plane of thinking, speaking, acting, living. They have tried to drag him down to their low level. Both have failed, but the blame must be on them for the separation that has been created between them and that will remain hereafter.

GOSPEL NOTES FROM HERE AND THERE

—FROM THE TIME when the first Floating Christian Endeavor Society was organized on board the revenue cutter Dexter in 1890 to the present time, the members have been inspired to better living and higher thinking. To link the work together around the world on ships and port with port, the World's Floating Christian Endeavor Union was organized in 1908, which is a constituent part of the World's Christian Endeavor Union.

EVANGELIST ROBERT JOHNSON recently conducted a tabernacle campaign in Mount Union, Pa., and points as far east as Lewiston and as far west as Altoona sent delegations. The East Broad Top Railroad furnished special trains to accommodate the people who desired to attend the meetings from points twenty-five and thirty miles distant. A special feature was an industrial parade of over 1,200 men who marched to the tabernacle in a body. A special rest night service was also held for foreigners only, when Evangelist Johnson addressed men of various nationalities through an interpreter. On the closing night, preceding the service, there was a parade of those who had decided for Christ during the meetings, with hundreds of men, women and children from all walks of life in line. A women's meeting preceded by a parade of over 500 women, all dressed in white, and each carrying a Bible, was a unique feature.

—THE FIFE BROTHERS, musical evangelists, report successful union tabernacle campaigns in Longmont, Colo., and Sheridan, Wyo., resulting in many conversions and additions to the churches. In these campaigns a feature was made of definitely allying new converts with the churches for which they had signed cards.

—THE ANNUAL MEETING of the New York district of the International Union of Gospel Missions was held at the Hadley Rescue Hall, 293 Bowery, on Wednesday, October 14, 1914. Seventeen missions were represented.

—THE ANNUAL AUTUMN RECEPTION given at the Union Missionary Training Institute in Brooklyn was on Thursday evening, October 29, the seventieth birthday of the founder of the institute, Mrs. Lucy Drake Osborn. All the speakers of the evening were missionaries who had received their training, either wholly or in part, at the institute. Three of them represented the work in India.

CAN THE CHURCH WIN THEM BACK?

LEADING THINKERS DISCUSS THE LONG ALIENATION OF THE WORKING CLASSES AND HOW TO END IT

HON. CHAMP CLARK

CHRISTIANITY found its earliest adherents among the poor and lowly. On his journeys through Palestine they flocked to Christ, drawn by his call to become children of the heavenly Father, regardless of their social position. Fisherfolk of Galilee, inhabitants of little wayside villages, they gathered about him openly and gladly, while the rich and cultured came to him in the dark stillness of the night or turned away with hanging head.

Through the decades, while the seeds of the new faith were sending a hundred, a thousand roots into the massive fabric of the Roman Empire, its adherents were of the lower and lowest orders of society. The scarcity of literary remains in this period, the names of the early officials, the inscriptions of the Roman catacombs, eloquently bear out this fact.

Centuries roll by. The nation that fought against the spread of the Christian Church with fire and sword now enthrones her. The church sits side by side with the mighty of the world. But with the feeling of power comes the lust after greater power. Before the vision of her thinkers and her statesmen arises the dream of world dominion. The church casts in her lot with the rulers of men and decks herself out in the splendor of this world. The example of her Master, who himself had not where to lay his head, who, as the Good Shepherd, went out into the wilderness to gather in close to his bosom the one lost little lamb and bring it back to the fold, is forgotten. Instead has come the mighty battle of centuries, in which the church attempted to bring the whole outward world with all its institutions under her absolute sway.

The Reformation broke and turned the tide back to the source and fountainhead: Christ and the Bible. It again emphasized the value of a soul, every soul. It insisted on the freedom of conscience and the equality of men before their God and demanded that the church, if true to her divine mission, must seek all, must exist for all.

Again the cry is raised that the church has turned aside from the common man to cast in her lot with the favored classes. The cry is becoming more and more insistent. Is it true? Men claim, frequently men within the church, that already a gulf exists between the organized church and the man that works with his hands. Is it true? If it is true where lies the fault and where the remedy?

Realizing the growing urgency and gravity of the question, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has asked for a frank expression of views from representative Americans, statesmen, reformers, educators, labor leaders, editors, business men, pastors. It feels that such a summary, drawing from the experience as well as the intelligence of the nation, will aid in crystallizing the question and may offer a solution.

The problem, as stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is as follows:

1. Is the condition of the workingman today more unfortunate than at any other period in history? If so, what constitutes the heart of the problem for the church?

2. Has the church been neglecting the welfare and interest of the working classes, and if so, in what respect and how far has that neglect contributed to present conditions?

3. Do you share the opinion some have expressed that the church should lay less emphasis on spiritual matters and find a greater field in social betterment?

4. If you hold that the spiritual ministration is the essential duty of the church, what course, in your opinion, must it pursue to combat specific industrial evils? If its essential duty be social betterment, how shall it meet the practical questions arising?

5. In your opinion, is the institutional church a great help toward solving the problem?

6. Can the regenerative power of a spiritual Christianity be counted upon in any measure to bring material advances toward better conditions?

We give below the first instalment of the replies received. Other replies will appear in a subsequent issue.

President Eliot Contrasts Labor's Attitude With That of the Church

THE condition of the workingmen today is much more fortunate than at any other period in history, the wage system being a great advance on slavery, serfdom and peonage, which have only lately disappeared from the civilized world. The Christian Church has habitually taught patience and submission to present ills, supposed to be inevitable, with compensatory anticipations to bliss in a future world, obtainable through the good offices and instructions of the church. It has also been much more apt to teach trust in Providence than keeping the powder dry. Hence, the alienation of the working classes from the church.

I would have the church diligent in social betterment, but without laying less emphasis on faith, hope and love. The church can resist specific industrial evils by studying them carefully, describing them accurately and setting experts at work on devising and promoting remedies. It will do more harm than good if it denounces existing

DR. CHARLES L. WHITE, secretary of the Baptist Home Missionary Society, reports that the year just closed at the San Francisco Chinese Mission is the best in the history of the mission. There is a greater interest in the Gospel, and a larger number of baptisms—nineteen—than in any year since the founding of the mission.

DR. GEORGE A. SIMONS, superintendent of the Methodist Mission in Russia, cables to the board that the American community at Petrograd has established a Red Cross Hospital for wounded soldiers, and that the Methodist Mission through its deaconesses is co-operating with great efficiency. The Deaconess Hospital at Helsingfors, Finland, has also been offered to the Russian Government for the care of the wounded.

THE HON. CATO SELLS in a letter received by the American Commission on Indian Affairs commends the generous help of the American Bible Society in supplying printed Navajo Bibles. The agency has gone to the expense of making new dies for the strange characters used in Navajo spelling, and also purchased new type so as to get a book easily read by the school children and by the adult heathen. Mr. Sells calls the attention of the Protestant churches to the fact that there are 24,000 Indian children of school age not in any school, and 8,000 for whom no school house has been provided.

IN SPITE OF THE [illegible] TIMES ESSENTIALLY on account of the war in Europe, the regular receipts of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church for 1914 were $1,179,258.95, an increase of $54,580.57 over 1913, which had held the record as a banner year, according to the figures given out at the annual meeting of the board held recently in Brookline, Mass. Special gifts to be applied to mission work added $418,496.32 more to the regular receipts. These two totalled more than last year's gifts by $93,135.54. In February a friend whose name is withheld gave $175,000 to be used in the erection of a building at Budapest, Hungary, and at Petrograd, Russia, and for the benefit of the William Nast College at Kinkiang, China, while $50,000 was to be set aside for the permanent use of the board. The retired ministers' fund began last year by a gift of $75,000 was increased by a gift of $50,000. The amount received from legacies this year was $81,248.57, as compared with $68,863.20 last year.

THERE WERE THREE boys who featured prominently at the Disciples Convention in Toronto, 1913. They were the sons of Mr. and Mrs. R. Ray Eldred, missionaries to Africa. The mother had died at the station of Longa. Her husband continued the work alone. A few months later the father was drowned while swimming a stream on one of his evangelistic tours. The boys were in the home for missionaries' children in Hiram, Ohio. Dr. Hugh Morrison of Illinois stopped at Hiram on his way from the Toronto Convention to see the boys, thinking he might adopt one. It was announced at the 1914 convention in Atlanta that Dr. Morrison had taken all three boys to be reared and loved as his own, and that the several thousand dollars contributed for them would be kept to give them a start in life.

FOUR MISSIONARY BISHOPS were elected by the Board of Foreign Missions of the Episcopal Church at their last meeting: The Rev. Paul Jones, of Salt Lake City, for bishop of Utah in place of the late Bishop Spalding; the venerable Hiram Hulse, archdeacon of Orange, for bishop of Cuba; the Rev. Herman Page, D.D., rector of St. Paul's, Chicago, for bishop of Spokane; the Rev. George C. Hunting, secretary of the Eighth Province, to be bishop of Nevada. The meetings were held in Minneapolis, and closed on October 11, when all the churches of the Twin Cities united and bishops and distinguished clergy gave missionary addresses; on Sunday afternoon at St. Paul's five hundred choristers sang from the platform, and 8,000 people filled the building. This meeting is described by Bishop Lloyd, president of the Board of Missions, as the largest and most brilliant within his experience.

—MRS. HELEN BARRETT MONTGOMERY of the Baptist Missionary Society has issued a call for a day of fasting and prayer by the society, which is just as urgent upon all women of all churches. It is as follows: "Think over the situation. The great nations of Europe involved in a death grapple, the missionary enterprises of those nations menaced as they never have been in the history of the world. America trembling in every fiber of her being over the disaster in which she may be involved! I solemnly summon all the members of the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society to set apart at once a day of fasting and prayer. Let those who pray and want to pray come together to intercede with God for the Christian Church. Pray for the missionaries—pray. Pray for each other. We must not wait. The crisis is on us. The King's business demands haste. Our churches are sick unto death, yet they must get under the burden. Only God can enable us to withstand and alter conditions. Before the world Christ is visibly on trial. He must not—he must not suffer loss! Pray—knowing that prayer in faith must be heard!"

—THE MISSION COLLEGE of the Presbyterian Church in India has been called upon to advise several of the Indian rulers whose chief source of income had been opium growing, according to information just received by Dr. Halsey, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions: "It was desired to replace opium with something helpful, and so selected wheat, cotton and sugar-cane was advised. These same native states are anxious to get hold of the men we train, so before any of our boys are ready to go out useful work awaits them. One of the viceroy's staff writes, urging the Mission College to undertake this work, and says: 'By this deputation work you will be doing more good in a few weeks than any one in India can do in an equal number of years.' Other missions all over India, now that they see the students at work and our success, are anxious to send their men to be trained. The Salvation Army wants to send men. One of the most difficult problems of the Indian Government is the criminal wandering tribes, so the care of these, numbering thousands, has been turned over to the Salvation Army, whose success was commented on by Sir John Hewitt, governor of the Provinces. The Salvation Army wants us to train some of their picked men. The director of public instruction wants as many men as we can train for their new agricultural schools under construction."

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

[SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS TAKEN PLACE. The nurse, Della Wetherby (who was Pollyanna's good friend in Dr. Ames's sanatorium), prevails upon her wealthy sister, Mrs. Carew, of Boston, who lives almost as a recluse in sorrow over the disappearance years before of a little nephew, Jamie, to permit Pollyanna to come and visit her, Miss Wetherby feeling sure in her heart that the result will be Mrs. Carew's restoration to happiness. The letter of invitation is received by Pollyanna's aunt, Mrs. Chilton, in Beldingsville, together with a letter from Dr. Ames, urging that Pollyanna be allowed to make the visit in Mrs. Carew's interest. Mrs. Chilton, unwilling to let Pollyanna go to strangers, is considering the matter, her husband waiting for her to speak.]

CHAPTER II—Continued

STILL there was silence. The doctor, watching his wife's face closely, saw that the usually firm lips and chin were trembling. He waited then quietly until his wife spoke.

"How soon—do you think—they'll expect her?" she asked at last.

In spite of himself Dr. Chilton gave a slight start.

"You mean—that you will let her go?" he cried.

His wife turned indignantly.

"Why, Thomas Chilton, what a question! Do you suppose, after a letter like that, I could do anything but let her go? Besides, didn't Dr. Ames himself ask us to? Do you think, after what that man has done for Pollyanna, that I'd refuse him anything—no matter what it was?"

"Dear, dear! I hope, now, that the doctor won't take it into his head to ask for—you, my love," murmured the husband of a year, with a whimsical smile. But his wife only gave him a deservedly scornful glance and said:

"You may write Dr. Ames that we'll send Pollyanna, and ask him to tell Miss Wetherby to give us full instructions. It must be some time before the tenth of next month, of course, for you sail then, and I want to see the child properly established myself before I leave, naturally."

"When will you tell Pollyanna?"

"Tomorrow, probably."

"What will you tell her?"

"I don't know—exactly; but not any more than I can help, certainly. Whatever happens, Thomas, we don't want to spoil Pollyanna, and no child could help being spoiled if she once got it into her head that she was a sort of—of—"

"Of medicine bottle with a label of full instructions for taking?" interpolated the doctor, with a smile.

"Yes," sighed Mrs. Chilton. "It's her unconsciousness that saves the whole thing. You know that, dear."

"Yes, I know," nodded the man.

"She knows, of course, that you and I and half the town are playing the game with her, and that we—are wonderfully happier because we are playing it." Mrs. Chilton's voice shook a little, then went on more steadily: "But if, consciously, she should begin to be anything but her own natural, sunny, happy little self, playing the game her father taught her, she would be—just what that nurse said she sounded like—'impossible.' So, whatever I tell her, I shan't tell her that she's going down to Mrs. Carew's to cheer her up," concluded Mrs. Chilton, rising to her feet with decision and putting away her work.

"Which is where I think you're wise," approved the doctor.

Pollyanna was told the next day, and this was the manner of it:

"My dear," began her aunt, when the two were alone together that morning, "how would you like to spend next winter in Boston?"

"With you?"

"No; I have decided to go with your uncle to Germany. But Mrs. Carew, a dear friend of Dr. Ames, has asked you to come and stay with her for the winter, and I think I shall let you go."

Pollyanna's face fell.

"But in Boston I won't have Jimmy, or Mr. Pendleton, or Mrs. Snow, or anybody that I know, Aunt Polly."

"No, dear; but you didn't have them when you came here—till you found them."

Pollyanna gave a sudden smile.

"Why, Aunt Polly, so I didn't! And that means that down to Boston there are some Jimmys and Mr. Pendletons and Mrs. Snows waiting for me that I don't know, doesn't it?"

"ARE WE GOING TO RIDE IN IT?" BROKE OFF POLLYANNA

"Yes, dear."

"Then I can be glad of that. I believe now, Aunt Polly, you know how to play the game better than I do. I never thought of the folks down there waiting for me to know them. And there's such a lot of 'em, too! I saw some of them when I was down there two years ago with Mrs. Gray. We were there two hours, you know, on my way from out West."

"There was a man in the station—a perfectly lovely man, who told me where to get a drink of water. Do you suppose he's there now? I'd like to know him. And there was a nice lady with a little girl. They live in Boston. They said they did. The little girl's name was Susie Smith. Perhaps I could get to know them. Do you suppose I could? And there was a boy, and another lady with a baby—only they lived in Honolulu, so probably I couldn't find them there now. But there'd be Mrs. Carew, anyway. Who is Mrs. Carew, Aunt Polly? Is she a relation?"

"Dear me, Pollyanna!" exclaimed Mrs. Chilton, half-laughingly, half-despairingly, "how do you expect anybody to keep up with your tongue, much less your thoughts, when they skip to Honolulu and back again in two seconds? No, Mrs. Carew isn't any relation to us. She's Miss Della Wetherby's sister. Do you remember Miss Wetherby at the Sanatorium?"

Pollyanna clapped her hands.

"Her sister? Miss Wetherby's sister? Oh, then she'll be lovely, I know. Miss Wetherby was. I loved Miss Wetherby. She had little smile-wrinkles all around her eyes and mouth, and she knew the nicest stories. I only had her two months, though, because she only got there a little while before I came away. At first I was sorry that I hadn't had her all the time, but afterward I was glad, for you see if I had had her all the time, it would have been harder to say good-by than 'twas when I'd only had her a little while. And now it'll seem as if I had her again, 'cause I'm going to have her sister."

Mrs. Chilton drew in her breath and bit her lip.

"But, Pollyanna, dear, you must not expect that they'll be quite alike," she ventured.

"Why, they're sisters, Aunt Polly," argued the little girl, her eyes widening; "and I thought sisters were always alike. We had two sets of 'em in the Ladies' Aiders. One set was twins, and they were so much alike you couldn't tell which was Mrs. Peck and which was Mrs. Jones, until a wart grew on Mrs. Jones's nose, then of course we could, because we looked for the wart the first thing. And that's what I told her one day when she was complaining that people called her Mrs. Peck, and I said if they'd only look for the wart as I did they'd know her right off. But she acted real cross—I mean displeased, and I'm afraid she didn't like it—though I don't see why, for I should have thought she'd been glad there was something they could be told apart by, 'specially as she was the president, and didn't like it when folks didn't act as if she was the president—best seats and introductions and special attentions at church suppers, you know. But she didn't, and afterwards I heard Mrs. White tell Mrs. Rawson that Mrs. Jones had done everything she could to get rid of that wart, even to trying to put salt on a bird's tail. But I don't see how that could do any good. Aunt Polly, does putting salt on a bird's tail help the warts on people's noses?"

"Of course not, child! How you do run on, Pollyanna, especially if you get started on those Ladies' Aiders!"

"Do I, Aunt Polly?" asked the little girl, ruefully. "And does it plague you? I don't mean to plague you, honestly, Aunt Polly. And, anyway, if I do plague you about those Ladies' Aiders, you can be kind o' glad, for if I'm thinking of the Aiders, I'm sure to be thinking how glad I am that I don't belong to them any longer, but have got an aunt all my own. You can be glad of that, can't you, Aunt Polly?"

"Yes, yes, dear, of course I can, of course I can," laughed Mrs. Chilton, rising to leave the room and suddenly feeling very guilty that she was conscious sometimes of a little of her old irritation against Pollyanna's perpetual gladness.

During the next few days, while letters concerning Pollyanna's winter stay in Boston were flying back and forth, Pollyanna herself was preparing for that stay by a series of farewell visits to her Beldingsville friends.

Everybody in the little Vermont village knew Pollyanna now, and almost everybody was playing the game with her. The few who were not, were not refraining because of ignorance of what the glad game was. So to one house after another Pollyanna carried the news that she was going down to Boston to spend the winter; and loudly rose the clamor of regret and remonstrance, all the way from Nancy in Aunt Polly's own kitchen to the great house on the hill where lived John Pendleton.

Nancy did not hesitate to say—to every one except her mistress—that she considered the Boston trip all foolishness, and that for her part she would have been glad to take Miss Pollyanna home with her to the Corners, she would she would; and then Mrs. Polly could have gone to Germany all she wanted to.

On the hill John Pendleton said practically the same thing, only he did not hesitate to say it to Mrs. Chilton herself. As for Jimmy, the twelve-year-old boy whom John Pendleton had taken into his home because Pollyanna wanted him to, and whom he had now adopted because he wanted to himself—as for Jimmy, Jimmy was angry, and he was not slow to show it.

"But, you see, you've just come," he Can the Chasm Be Bridged?

WE HEAR a great deal of complaint in these days regarding the indifference of the church to the working classes. It has been charged that the two have drawn away from each other in the passing years, and that the church, now grown rich and powerful, sits side by side with the mighty of the world, forgetting that its Founder was the friend of the humble, and that wherever he went "the common people heard him gladly."

Now, we do not believe that any situation can be improved by being viewed through the lenses of pessimism. There is not, nor should there be, any irreconcilable breach between the church and the workingman. So mutually dependent are they on each other that a permanent estrangement is inconceivable. Yet it is claimed, and not without a considerable amount of truth, that in a very large proportion of our churches today the laboring class is conspicuous by its absence.

If it be true that a gulf exists between the organized church and the man who works with his hands, where lies the fault and what is the remedy? for there must be a remedy. How is the chasm to be bridged? How are church and workers to be reunited?

This is the vital problem that demands the attention of every earnest Christian in or out of the church at the present time. It has been strongly urged that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, being an interdenominational journal, should lay the matter before the great tribunal of enlightened public opinion. We hold no brief for either side, but we are strong in the conviction that something ought to be done toward effecting a reconciliation. We have, therefore, submitted the problem to a number of representative pastors of different denominations, eminent laymen, sociologists, labor leaders, reformers, editors and men of influence in various religious activities. The first instalment of their letters appears in the present issue, and will be read with deep interest.

It is our earnest hope that, as the series advances, the writers may succeed in pointing the way to a real solution. When all the letters have appeared Dr. O. H. Pannkoke, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contributing staff, who has conducted the discussion, will give a summary of the results.

The High Tide of Generosity

A GREAT wave of compassion is sweeping across this continent. It has kindled the hearts of men and women everywhere and melted them to deeds of kindness. Whether their possessions be much or little, they have found a new and glorious use for a portion of them at least. They are reveling in a widening and delightful vision of Christian service. While the older nations are torn by a war so vast and dreadful that no human power can stop it, God's people are carrying on a war against suffering and sickness, hunger and death, a war so far-reaching and inclusive that for the first time in history the world's benevolence would seem to measure up almost to the extent of the need. If the present colossal relief plans now under way are carried forward as energetically as they have been begun, millions of human beings will be benefited. Like heaven-sent argosies of blessing, our relief ships are crossing the seas, prayer-wafted and food-laden. They are making the Stars and Stripes the symbol of world-wide mercy and helpfulness. All neutral nations, to a greater or less extent, are supplementing the work which is now being carried forward so successfully by the United States.

There are various indications that this flood-tide of generosity may ultimately come to be regarded as a part of the great divine plan in relation to the present war. It could only be by inspiration that a movement so gigantic could have suddenly sprung into existence, demonstrating that though sin may abound in the world, the spirit of the Master lives within the hearts of multitudes of his followers, urging them to those deeds of kindness and benevolence. We see relief organizations springing up on all sides, and all with the same purpose in view. Organized charity has eclipsed itself. The Rockefeller Foundation gives its millions. Hundreds of thousands of dollars pour into the various funds from a variety of sources. So generous are these combined offerings that there would seem to be no limit to the possibilities of this amazing flood of benevolence. Truly, God's people have lifted the sluices and opened the dykes and inundated the blood-red zone of war with the stream of their gifts. And right here a question rises that is causing misgivings to many:

Is there not a grave danger that this astonishing tide of benevolence may actually become a means of prolonging the war?

We, in common with many others, feel that the question is not an idle one; it indicates a possibility which was farthest from the minds of the contributors. While they, as a whole, were willing to give most liberally for the relief of suffering, they could not and did not consider the possibility of their generosity being so transformed that it would become the means of reinforcing the armies and thus prolonging the strife. Had the case been presented to them squarely at the outset their choice would have been instant and positive. "Millions for the relief of suffering, but not one cent for war."

We do well to give freely in aid of the distressed millions of Europe. But such generosity should not absolve us from the duty of responding to calls nearer home. The war has greatly increased unemployment and multiplied want and suffering here, and appeals in behalf of our own unfortunate ones should not be set aside. In the enthusiasm of rescuing Belgium, let us not overlook the destitute at our own doors, but rather strive, with a discriminating hand and a good conscience, to do our duty to both until the present crisis is safely past.

Premature Peace Talk

IT IS not surprising to learn that our government is being urged from various quarters to take some step in the interest of peace in Europe. To such suggestions there can be but one reply: The initiative must come from one or more of the combatant Powers, and in such form as to afford a basis for action. Up to the present time, as President Wilson himself admits, no communication, formal or informal, has yet been received in Washington which would indicate that any of the combatant Powers is ready to accept mediation, or that any suggestion looking to the opening of peace negotiations would even be considered. Holland, Spain and Switzerland are doubtless, like ourselves, awaiting events, and stand ready to assist in making peace should the opportunity arise; but it is safe to say that no neutral nation will assume the initiative, or take any step that might be regarded as an uninvited interference. While all hope that the great opportunity may come soon, there is little in the present situation on which to base such an expectation. Peace talk at the present time may be set aside as wholly premature.

Still, this does not mean the abandonment of the hope of peace. Some one asks: "Why have not the nation's prayers for peace been answered? What is the reason God is silent when his people plead? Are we losing faith?" We do not believe for a moment that God's people are losing faith in him as a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. Their cry to him will yet be answered. We are disposed to be impatient because we cannot comprehend the divine purpose in permitting this terrible war. We forget that it may be a discipline to the nations for sin, and especially for the great sin of forgetting God. Would not praying for peace without restriction be questioning the divine wisdom? How much better, then, to pray that when peace comes, it may be abiding, and that the whole world may be infinitely better for the discipline it has undergone.

An Ungracious Criticism

OUR Roman Catholic contemporary, America, is sadly vexed because the government in Washington has sent the United States cruiser North Carolina to Palestine with $75,000 in gold—a portion of the fund appropriated by Congress—to be disbursed by Ambassador Morgenthau in relieving American citizens stranded in the war zone. By some peculiar mental process of its own, America assumes that this money is intended for the missionaries. Therefore, it concludes, it is a gift of public funds to sectarians, and is "what might be expected of an evangelical in the presidential chair." This reflection on the President is as mistaken as it is ungenerous and unworthy, and is an ill return for all the favor he has shown toward Catholics. As it happens, however, the relief is meant for American citizens as such, irrespective of their religion; moreover, the treasure ship is the Tennessee, the North Carolina only going as convoy. There are numbers of tourists and others who need such aid, and as Turkish mobilization has stripped the country of food supplies, horses and all means of transportation, these citizens were entitled to the same consideration that is being extended to Americans stranded by the war in other lands. If there are missionaries who need help, it is quite likely that there are Catholics among them, who will not thank America for its ill-timed and ungracious remarks. Of the gigantic relief funds now being raised to help the war sufferers, a very large proportion will inevitably go to Catholic beneficiaries. Everybody knows this; but we have yet to read the first hostile criticism by any publication, Catholic or Protestant, on that account.

A Conglomerate Prayer-Meeting

REPORTS from Japan mention a strangely assorted gathering recently held there. It was a "prayer meeting," held in a Shinto temple at Tokyo, conducted by the French ambassador to Japan, the object for which prayers were offered being the success of the armies of the nations represented at the meeting. France, while like the United States having no state religion, is catalogued as a Christian nation. Surely it is an odd sight to observe the official representative of this nation leading a service of prayer in a temple devoted to a religion whose gods are innumerable, including the sun-goddess, creator gods, gods of fire, food, mountains, rains and winds, as well as some human beings who have been deified.

Unbelievers have scoffed at the thought of prayer in connection either with war or peace. They have tried to picture the perplexity of a deity receiving petitions from the people of warring nations, each group asking victory for its own cause; they have ridiculed the idea that prayer could bring peace so long as men are still disposed to fight. Now they have something new to ridicule—representatives of Christians mingling their prayers with those addressed to gods whom Christians know to be dreams.

If this event took place as the reports allege there is in it cause for sincere regret. It is not likely that it will work very serious harm to the Christian propaganda in Japan, which has been spreading during recent years with such gratifying rapidity. But it will at least perplex those natives who have heard Christian teachers declare that the worship of the one and only true God cannot be mingled with the adoration of any other god whom man's fancy and superstition have created.

While every devout Christian among the nations at war has the privilege of praying that his own nation's cause may triumph, he must, with that petition, breathe the Saviour's acquiescence: "Not my will, but thine be done." Deeper even than passionate patriotism must be the desire that God shall guide the destinies of the world. All can unite earnestly in petitions that the contendinng nations may speedily find the way of peace. But Christians cannot countenance nor participate in prayers offered to imaginary beings which are the creation of misguided and unenlightened minds. Christendom, divided now in many of its aims, must unite at least in this—that when the nations have emerged from war, the Christian's God shall be recognized more clearly than ever before as the world's one hope, the world's one changeless Friend.

Comment by the Way

—THE AMERICAN BOARD has just received the past year's report of their College at Marsovan, Asia Minor, one of the seven colleges identified with the board in Turkey. Among the teaching force of twenty-five are six Americans, eight Armenians, nine Greeks and one Russian. All from the warring countries returned home. Only time can tell if the Christian work may continue.

—FROM MR. FRANK S. SEXTON, the executor of the estate of the late Martha M. Woodbury, of Gloversville, N. Y., the CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home has received a legacy of $150 in aid of that work, of which the testator was a warm friend in her lifetime. This gift will support a cot for seven years, and give summer outings to half a hundred little guests in succession at Mont-Lawn during that period.

—THE ARABIAN MISSION of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church is celebrating its silver anniversary. The General Synod appointed the first Sunday in November as Foreign Mission Sunday, also for the missionaries in Arabia to meet at Busrah to celebrate the Arabian mission's twenty-fifth birthday. Missions to Moslems have been established. Arabia is being occupied. The Bible is being widely distributed. The population of Moslem Arabia is estimated at 4,500,000. Pastors in the churches celebrated by preaching upon the work.

Sugar Conquers Baby Elephant

A BABY elephant was being transferred in an automobile truck from one show to another in a large city, when the rear axle broke and let the truck down and sent the animal sprawling over two street car tracks. The elephant concluded, as he was not responsible for his plight, that he would do nothing to relieve the situation. So he simply lay still, and refused to help get himself out of the way. A policeman ran up to him and commenced to kick him. Soon the cars going in both directions were stalled for blocks along the crowded street. A motorman took hold of the elephant's trunk and called upon all lookers-on to aid in pulling him bodily out of the way. The animal used his trunk as a fireman's hose and drenched the motorman with water, and drove him from the scene amidst the laughter of the crowd. The man in charge of Nero had been doing his best all the time to get him to move, but had failed. He happened to think of the elephant's fondness for sugar. He drew from his pocket a handful of lump sugar. The moment Nero saw it he bounded up like a rubber ball, and stepping off the tracks let the cars go by. It was some time before a permit could be secured from the health department to allow the elephant to walk through the streets to his destination. It is claimed that the elephant is next to man in the scale of intelligence. The baby elephant showed a good deal of human nature. The child responds much better to the lumps of sugar of love than to the kicks of the policeman, or the rough handling of the motorman, in family government. There ought not to be the lack of the strictness of justice, but it should always be remembered that the great motive force is love. It is so when the children are grown up. Much of greatness is beaten into men and women by authority, but most of it comes by love, by the lumps of sugar as against force. The dynamic force of love in the development of character is thus powerfully expressed: "Thy gentleness hath made me great." (II Sam. 22: 36.)

A New Typhoid Vaccine

MEDICAL science has been moving rapidly toward the conquering of typhoid fever, as it has subdued smallpox and other diseases. Hundreds of thousands of anti-typhoid capsules are now being sent to the French army from the Pasteur Institute, which, unlike other anti-typhoid vaccines, can be absorbed on the battlefield without feverishness or disability of any kind. In an experimentation with ten thousand persons it has been shown that the treatment confers immunity from typhoid for a minimum of three years. In many wars typhoid has been more deadly than the enemy's guns. Our age, so largely blessed with benevolent discovery, will hail any new remedy that will ease pain, cure the sick, prevent disease. The divine ministry of spiritual healing was often accompanied by that of physical healing. When Jesus went out of Judea into Galilee a nobleman came to him for the cure of his son who was dying with a malignant fever. "Jesus saith unto him, Go thy way, thy son liveth. And the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken unto him, and he went his way." (John 4: 50.)

Educator's Important Suggestions

DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER in his annual report makes the recommendation that only persons who are physically sound should be admitted for tuition; that a physical test like that exacted at the United States Military and Naval Academies be required of all applicants. We would count so severe a condition as unwise. It would cut off a large number of those who would make the best students and most valuable citizens in after life. To shut out those who have serious diseases which are incurable or such as would cause a default in examinations, or such as might prove dangerous to others, would be proper, but to require the standard of physical soundness demanded of the students in the army and navy schools would work a hardship and seem to be a mistake. It is important that a young man or woman not measuring up to so high a standard of health shall have a college education for self-sustenance, for development, and usefulness in life. Such a standard would take out of literature, science, art, government, and religion some of the greatest and best men and women of the past and present. Dr. Butler's recommendation that the senior year, if desired, may be devoted to commercial education seems most excellent. "Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord." (Romans 12: 11.)

FIELD MARSHAL LORD ROBERTS DEAD

IN THE death of Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, England loses perhaps her greatest and most popular military hero since Wellington. He was born in Cawnpore, India, in 1832, and began his young life in war at the siege of Delhi. In 1878 he became a vigorous general in the Afghan war, and was made a commander-in-chief of the Madras Army and that of India. In 1895 he was created field-marshal. In 1899 the old hero was sent to South Africa, and he was made commander-in-chief of the British army in 1900, and retained the position till it was abolished in 1904. The lure of battle, his beloved Indian soldiers, and the flag he had given his long life so ungrudgingly for, took him down into the zone of the present war. But the excitement and the rain-soaked trenches were too much for him. He contracted pneumonia and died in Flanders. His remains were interred in St. Paul's. Although he ranked so high among the men of military genius that even Emperor William paid him the unusual tribute of calling him "the greatest soldier of his time," Lord Roberts was more than soldier. He possessed marvelous powers of observation and deduction. For six or seven years prior to his death, he had striven in vain by voice and pen to arouse England to the danger of a great European war, and to the need of adequate preparation. But his warning passed unheeded and the storm caught the nation unawares. Lord Roberts was a simple, sincere soldier of the Cross, and the words of the apostle could be appropriately applied to him: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." (II Tim. 4: 7, 8.)

Found Serpent in Book

A GENTLEMAN in the Far East in taking a book down from the shelf felt a sharp pain in the end of his finger. He thought a needle had been left in the book, and that it had pricked him. His hand and arm began rapidly to swell, and he died from the wound, which was the bite of a snake that had crawled into the library. Books, like the tongues of philosophers, are the best and worst things in the world; if good the best, if bad the worst. So many books today are beautiful in their rhetoric, brilliant in their pictures, and yet often so very dangerous to the morals of the reader, as though serpents had crawled into the volumes to sting the souls of the readers to death. Of such authors can be said: "They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adder's poison is under their lips." (Ps. 140: 3.)

"Tell Mother About It Easy"

TRYING to dodge around a freight car to get across the railroad tracks in West Manayunk, Pa., James McIlhenny, twelve years old, was run over and his right leg was cut off. Though suffering excruciating agony he exhibited the greatest courage and common sense. Policeman Robinson, who was near by when the accident occurred, ran to the lad and lifted him and aided in bearing him away. The boy said to the policeman: "This is mighty bad, but I feel worse for mother than I do for myself. Say, how's this going to be broke to her? She'll have a fit if you ain't careful. So please tell her about it easy, won't you?" It is to be hoped that the little fellow will recover. He deserves to. The home and community can make good use of the splendid qualities the boy so naturally and modestly revealed. There is a great deal of heroism and filial loyalty among the children of all classes, including the humblest and poorest of the population. It may well be wished that the boy may get well and live many years to realize the fulfilment of this commandment with a promise: "Honor thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." (Ex. 20: 12.)

Wonderful Forests of Stone

FOSSIL is from a Latin word "to dig out of the earth," and originally referred to whatever was taken out of the ground, whether mineral or vegetable. It then came to include all animal and plant organisms that by long chemical processes had turned to stone. Forests of stone have been found in the coal fields of Wolverhampton and other parts of England, and in those of Nova Scotia, in Egypt and other countries. There is a stone forest beneath the clay on Chesapeake Bay. Perhaps the most extended and beautiful forests of stone in the world are in the United States, particularly in Arizona and the Yellowstone Park. There are in the Yellowstone Park forests of stone on top of other forests of stone two thousand feet high. It is a rare thing to see a forest of stone, rarer still to see a fossilized animal or man. But human hearts turned to stone can be found on every hand: hearts cold and hard and dead to fellows and to God. It was the object of Christ's advent into the world to take out this heart of stone and put in its place a heart of flesh throbbing with divine life and love. The fossilizing of the heart by the influence of sin and its restoration to life is thus described by the prophet: "And I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and I will give them a heart of flesh, that they may walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances." (Ezek. 11: 19, 20.)

Federal Reserve Banks

ON NOVEMBER 16 the new Federal Reserve Banking System, devised by financial experts and recently enacted into law, was inaugurated. The twelve banks are located in Boston, New York City, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Richmond, Atlanta, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Kansas City, Dallas and San Francisco. They represent 7,571 member banks, which mostly until now have been national banks, operating under the National Bank Act. Mr. McAdoo, secretary of the treasury, thus explains the system: "The Federal Reserve Banks provide for a system of credits based upon commercial paper, thus at last securing to the country an adequate supply of the necessary credits to meet the legitimate demands of business as they develop." The friends of the system confidently hope that with the opening of these regional banks the dangers of restlessness, of artificial depression, of check manipulation and sectional disturbance in the complicated financial life of the nation will be reduced to the minimum. Now that the financial systems of Europe are rocked by war, it seems fortunate that the United States enters upon a new era of financial stability. The lending of money at interest, which thought is at the basis of the new banking system, is thus referred to: "Thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the bankers, and at my coming I should have received back mine own with interest." (Matt. 25: 27, R. V.)

HOW EAST PRUSSIANS SAVED THEIR GOODS

WE HAVE received the following cablegram, dated November 19, from Mr. Theodore Waters, secretary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who is abroad organizing our relief work for the widows and orphans of the war:

Landing Rotterdam after being detained on the North Sea. The following committee is appointed for relief work in Belgium: Rev. J. Hoornbeek, Rev. W. H. Shuffelt Kremer, Rev. H. Carleton, Colonel J. Lotos, American consul at Rotterdam; Edmund Knight, Belgian consul-general; Captain J. F. Lucas, Paul Fuller Hymans, and P. C. Jongewaal. Am now waiting for Brussels.

This message shows good progress and the strength of the committee appointed for work in Belgium augurs well for promptness and efficiency in handling the food supplies already in hand and still to follow.

SOME disorder now in our body, and at first gives us acute misery. But after a while, during the progress of cure, we are unconscious of its presence only at intervals. And the same thing is true of the world. The civil disorder on a scale never before known which is filling Europe with woe, is less the daily horror to us that it was in the beginning. And the suffering which has been caused the generally liberal people of Europe and which increases daily as the war goes on and winter settles down, also may cease not to arouse as a terrible disturbance in the common human melody, just because we are beginning to get accustomed to it. Nevertheless, these two disorders are not being cured. They are growing more awful. And the right-minded and good-hearted people of America, we believe to say, have not abated one jot their interest in the desperate and homeless families who are to such a large extent dependent upon our Christian bounty for the bread immediate. The CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, but one of many others, all wisely handled, is steadily growing, and the committee in charge is arranging for the widows and orphans of every nation. At noon of Thursday, November 19, the amount stood at $51,111.84.

We hope to be able next week to publish reports direct from the owners of distributing of our first cargo of food supplies sent to Belgium, from the secretaries of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Theodore Waters, who with the committee abroad is directing the work there. Mr. Waters, from the time he left New York, has been living in the atmosphere of war and its consequences to non-combatants, as the following brief extracts from his first letter show:

"ON BOARD R. M. S. Adriatic,
"November 5, 1914.

"JUST before the gangplank was drawn in some moving-picture actors posed before the camera—a girl and her sweetheart in a long farewell on account of the war. The actress's face was painted and the man was dressed for the part and the passengers lining the rail provided a background of faces that were, I fear, not as serious as the 'movie' people would have liked to have them. I thought afterwards that the smiles must have contained much of irony for the moving-picture men, who had created an artificial scene, when all around them the impending horror of war was gasping for expression.

"Moving pictures of the war? There were dozens of them on board that steamer if the camera men had but known. A little boy of ten waved his hand gaily to those on the pier. His father was an English army officer going home from far afield to offer his services to his native country. He did not wave his hand gaily, and the look on his wife's face spoke volumes of apprehension.

"Standing near me at the rail was a young man from somewhere in Nova Scotia, who was on his way to the front to find a wounded man. That is to say, he meant to try to go to the front. News of the wounded man's plight had reached the ears of the soldier's mother in America and she had implored his old-time chum to go and try to find her boy. There was not much hope when so many wounded men had died and been buried in unidentified graves, and maybe he would not be able to come back himself, but he was going to have a try.

"Somehow the story of that mother's anxiety reminded me of a conversation I had had with Mr. Hallimond, president of the Bowery Mission, whose son had been sent with a Canadian regiment somewhere into the thick of the fight.

"'If,' said Mr. Hallimond, 'you should run across my son give him his mother's love and mine, and tell him that he is always in our prayers.'

"The ship was full of the dread of war, but the spirit of fortitude was there also. There were few women and fewer children. The men talked of the great conflict in low tones; the women knitted for the London Guild silently, forebodingly, one might say. The children romped and played, happily, unconscious of the probability that some of them at least were on their way to join an army—the growing army of orphans.

"Evenings the stewards closed every window and porthole opening on the outside of the vessel and over the windows they hung heavy curtains. Every foot forward took us into more perilous waters, and it was not the captain's intention to have his fine big vessel captured.

"On the first morning out we read on the bulletin board the following:

"'IMPORTANT NOTICE!

"'All aliens (U. S. citizens included) will on no account be permitted to land at Queenstown. It will be necessary for every passenger to accurately declare his or her nationality and an address in the United Kingdom temporary or permanent.

"'On arrival at Liverpool each passenger will be interrogated by the port alien officer. Your careful attention to the foregoing will facilitate your disembarkation.'

"Later on, the bedroom stewards made the rounds and asked each passenger the name of the hotel he or she was going to, and you had a feeling that you might just as well be accurate in case you were looked up afterward.

"On Sunday morning church services were held in the dining-room. It was the regulation prescribed by the Church of England. The purser presided. There was no sermon. A majority of the passengers and every steward who was off duty attended. Perhaps it was the presence of the war spirit that impelled the earnestness with which every one sang the old hymns and answered to the prayers, but I have never attended a more solemn function.

"As I write this we are approaching the Irish coast. We can see it in the distance, a long range of hills. The Mother Cary's chickens which have followed us across through fair and stormy weather have left us, and their place has been taken by gulls flying low like ducks over the water.

"This morning we were spoken by an English man-of-war. She came up swiftly out of the haze, and trimmed her guns upon us. She spoke to us in the flag language, and the signalmen on our boat replied in kind. She turned on her heel and went off to resume her patrol.

"Through a glass we can see the golden brown of the hills of Erin. A short while ago we had a shower, and now a rainbow is arched over the distant shore. It does not seem possible that the people of that land can be engaged in bloody warfare. It looks so peaceful over there. There is no suggestion of heartbreak in the view. Yet we know as the hills become plainer and plainer that war and its perils are coming nearer and nearer and that the sorrows of the widow and the orphan hang like a pall over the land."

THE many agencies now at work in behalf of the war-sufferers are making redoubled efforts in the face of winter to insure the utmost relief in the stricken heart of Europe. We call upon our readers to help us do a large part of this all-important work in the name of our common Master. We feel that the out and out Christian population of America should be out and out generous in a cause that appeals to all classes. You have already done excellently, and we wish to burden no one with this appeal, but by all means, if it is in your power, renew your former gifts again and again; and if you have not yet helped to swell this fund, for the widows and orphans of the war we urge upon you the duty and the privilege of doing so at once.

If any feel that they would like to give a little more than their purse affords, please signify your willingness to join our staff of volunteer workers, and we will gladly indicate how you can greatly forward this cause.

Address gifts and all communications about the relief work to the Widows and Orphans Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

IN EUROPE'S WAR-THREATENED CITIES

ONE of the most startling phases of the war has been the danger of destruction in which many cities of France and Belgium have stood. The possibility that such places, with their multitudes of population, their important public buildings and in many cases their treasures of art, might be treated as mere obstacles in the path of an army, has emphasized the abhorrent character of war. Fortunately, the damage so far sustained by any city of importance is slight.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

CATTLE DISEASE WORSE AND BETTER. The great stockyards at Chicago re-opened after their rigid quarantine and disinfecting scrubbing at midnight November 14, to operate under strict rules that assure immunity from the dreaded foot and mouth disease. The epidemic is being controlled in many States, but keeps appearing in others, sixteen States being under quarantine when the Chicago yards opened. Great numbers of cattle and hogs have been killed by Federal and State authorities at an estimated cost thus far of about $700,000, with prospects of $2,500,000 being asked of Congress when it assembles, to complete the work of exterminating the plague. The disease has spread from coast to coast, and every State may eventually be included in the history of this particularly untimely visitation.

GOOD GROWING WEATHER FOR HALF A CENTURY. The Department of Commerce has issued a retrospect of the last fifty years of American development. We have grown from 25,000,000 in 1850 to more than four times that number today: our school children have increased to 19,000,000, and cost us $500,000,000 a year for their education; our commerce has leaped from about $300,000,000 annually to four billion dollars more than that; there is about $34.19 per capita in circulation, or a total of $3,419,000,000, and $4,375,000,000 to the credit of 11,000,000 depositors in savings banks, an average of nearly $400 each—there were only 251,000 depositors in 1850. The total national wealth is estimated at $140,000,000,000, as against $7,000,000,000 in 1870. Farm property jumped in that period from $4,000,000,000 valuation to $41,000,000,000, manufactures from $1,000,000,000 to more than twenty times that; and railroad mileage from 9,021 miles to 258,000 and over, 1,004,000,000 passengers being carried annually now, and 1,845,000,000 tons of freight. The Post Office Department handles about twenty billion pieces of mail annually, and there are over 22,000 newspapers and periodicals, including THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, proud to record the fact.

SUNDAY MAY FIND HIS WORK ALREADY DONE FOR HIM. Philadelphia has long been preparing for the great Billy Sunday campaign which is to begin there on January 3, and announcement is now made that 2,500 prayer groups will hold meetings three times a week during December to pray for a revival; these groups will meet mornings during the actual progress of the campaign. The city is divided into districts to make this work the more thorough; every minister in Philadelphia has been invited to co-operate.

OUR CONTEMPORARY, THE Literary Digest, has tested the attitude of the American press on the European War by a questionnaire sent to between 350 and 400 editors. In view of the extreme partisanship of some journals and the moderate tone of others, the impression on the mind of the average reader as to the press attitude generally has been somewhat hazy. The Digest's figures give this enlightening result:

Replies received	367
Favoring the Allies	105
Favoring the Germans	20
Neutral	242

In the Eastern States there are 34 pro-Ally editors, 13 in the Central, 47 in the South and 11 in the West. In the Central States, 10 favor the Germans, 5 in the South and 4 in the West, while in the Eastern States there is only one pro-German editor. The neutrals are 43 in the East, 112 in the Central, 51 in the Southern and 36 in the Western States. The same editorial canvass makes this showing on community feeling of 189 cities and towns represented: in 38 the feeling is favorable to the Germans, while in 140 it is neutral or divided. The pro-Ally cities and towns are 52 in the East, 40 in the Central, 71 in the South, 26 in the West; the pro-German communities are 2 in the East, 29 in the Central, 4 in the South and 3 in the West. The neutral towns and cities are 24 in the East, 66 in the Central, 28 in the South, and 22 in the West.

FINAL SESSION OF SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS. President Wilson is at work upon his annual message to be delivered to the Congress when it assembles on Monday, December 7. This may prove to be an historic session. If news forecasts of the message are accurate, it will be a busy one. Mexican affairs, the Philippine question, the merchant marine, foreign relations, industrial problems, government ownership of public utilities; these and other important subjects may engage the attention of the Congress.

ALL READY FOR COMPANY, NOBODY TO COME. The Panama-Pacific International Exposition buildings are sitting up stiff and straight in their places, all dressed up ready for any number of millions of visitors, but the door-bell won't ring till February 20, 1915, and even then there may not be quite as many callers as once were expected. European interest in the fair has already suffered a check. In this connection it may be said in reminder that the original world's fair was inaugurated by Queen Victoria's consort, Albert, in Crystal Palace, London, as a national contribution to the cause of international peace. It has cost $50,000,000 to get the great exhibition grounds on the Pacific coast ready for this latest world's fair at a time of intensest international strife.

FOR HUMAN VIVISECTION. The third Congress of American Surgeons has met in Washington and planned to erect their own national headquarters in that city eventually. Surgery as an aid in the treatment and cure of bodily ailments is making tremendous advances over old methods, and every recurrent assembly of the profession learns of some new departure in the science of human vivisection for curative purposes.

EXTENDING WAR AMENITIES TO ALIEN RESIDENTS. The British Home Secretary has stated in the House of Commons that there are 14,500 alien enemies of the realm interned in concentration camps in different parts of the British Isles in addition to prisoners of war, and that 29,000 such aliens were still "at large." It is also reported that the German Government has ordered all subjects of hostile countries, without distinction of age or sex, to depart from a large number of enumerated places, including all German islands along the North Sea, and has threatened to place all Russian subjects in Germany in concentration camps if the report that Russia is so doing to subjects of Germany resident in Russia proves correct, and also claims to have protested to England against the detention of women in concentration camps, with the intimation that if the protest goes unheeded like treatment will be inflicted upon English women in Germany.

APROPOS OF AN ARTICLE ON ANOTHER PAGE. Three members of an interstate remedy concern of Detroit, Mich., have been fined $10,000 by the United States court for fraudulent use of the mails in advertising cures for many ills, but using the same compound in all cases; the convicted men agreed to turn over to the government a mailing list of 5,000 names.

FIRST AMERICAN FOOD TO REACH BELGIUM

(Copy) Western Union Cablegram

ROTTERDAM, Nov. 19, 1914 (Delayed).

Christian Herald, New York:

Our cargo of foodstuffs, purchased with $40,000 from the Relief Fund for Widows and Orphans, now being distributed in Belgium, the first American food to reach the starving people in that country. Tell our people this is but a drop in the bucket. Tell them to give and then give again. It is snowing here, yet women and children refugees in The Hague stand in line for clothes as well as food. There are 7,000,000 in need in Belgium. It is a country without a smile. This is considered the greatest need in the world's history.

Mr. Waters, Secretary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an earlier cablegram from whom appears on another page, is assured safe conduct through Belgium by reason of his having been appointed special messenger bearing legation mail to United States Ambassador Whitlock at Brussels.

ONE POPULAR MONOPOLY. The people of this country are quite content to let the government manufacture all the currency, and will find no fault with the Treasury Department for having designed new bank notes for the Federal Reserve System that offer the utmost possible discouragement to counterfeiters. The denominations are: $5 showing Lincoln on face, discovery of America by Columbus and landing of Pilgrims on reverse; $10, Jackson on face, agricultural and manufacturing scene on reverse; $20, Cleveland, transportation scenes on reverse; $50, Grant, with marine interests in allegory on back; $100, Franklin, the reverse depicting Peace, Plenty and Labor.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR TO ROUND UP JOBLESS. The Chicago Tribune makes the announcement that the Federal Department of Labor, with the co-operation of the Post Office Department, will make every rural post office in the United States an employment office for farm hands, lumbermen, and general out-of-door workers both men and women, by getting employers to file statement of their needs with the local post office on blanks to be furnished by the department. The post office at the same time in filing the statement to make application there for work. Government bureaus scattered throughout the country may also be included in the plan, which may be in operation by the first of the year. Jobless men in the cities will be reached through the city post office and by publicity.

NATION'S BETTER HALF SPEAKS OUT. The forty-sixth annual convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, which closed its session in Washington November 16, adopted many resolutions in the interest of women, among them one that all women encourage the boycotting of business and other, that uphold equal pay for equal work regardless of sex; urging Congress to protect the rights of women citizens who marry foreigners; one against holding political parties responsible for the acts of congressmen, or holding public officials or others responsible for the action of their party on woman suffrage. Dr. Anna Howard Shaw was elected president, Mrs. Stanley McCormick of New York, first vice-president, Mrs. Desha Breckinridge of Kentucky, second vice-president, and Miss Katherine B. Davis of New York, third vice-president.

ONE EVERY TWO HOURS NIGHT AND DAY. By multiplying 365 by 24 you get 8,760 hours, and multiplying that by three you get 25,280 hours in three years; by dividing that by 13,000, the number of people killed at railroad grade crossings in the last three years, you get approximately one such accident every two hours night and day. The president of the National Association of Railway Commissioners in session at Washington, commenting on these gruesome figures, recommended Federal ownership of common carriers in order to eliminate the competition which makes such an annual slaughter possible. Much blame is also attached to reckless automobile driving. It was shown at this meeting that express company revenues during the last fiscal year fell off about $10,000,000.

RELIABLE NEWS FROM MEXICO. Mexico is in the hands of its friends, who are not, however, agreed on what is best for their country. The world spectacle of two or three presidents, as many generals, and a self-appointed executive committee, all determined on governing the country, still continues, as does the stream of news despatches, each one contradicting its predecessor. All parties concerned are intent on making the outside public understand the justice of their respective plans for the management of Mexico, and various armed forces are in the field ready to march upon this or that city as the necessities of their respective leader's plans may require. If there is anything reliable in the news beyond this, it has failed to get into print.

HOPEFUL NOTE IN BUSINESS TALK. The Boston Transcript is responsible for the statement that Federal departments in touch with the country's business activities are confident that the most serious effects of the European War on American business have passed. It is a trifle disconcerting to find that military supplies bulk large in the foreign orders which just now are responsible for increased work in factories. Foodstuffs also are very prominent in our trade activities. Nevertheless, the work performed by the representative of British financial interests who came to this country, Hon. George Paish, in easing up the strain caused by the credit balance due to England, has, together with the opening of the new Federal Reserve System for business, created a far more optimistic feeling.

NEW AMERICAN AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE. Mr. William G. Sharp, member of Congress from Ohio since 1909, has been appointed by President Wilson to succeed Myron T. Herrick, also from Ohio, as American ambassador in Paris. Mr. Herrick was on the point of giving up the post when the war broke out, but remained because of the emergency. Ambassador and Mrs. Herrick return with many evidences of the appreciation felt for what they and other Americans were able to do to relieve the situation in Paris. The newly-appointed ambassador expects to present his credentials to President Poincaré December 1.

THE GREATEST NEED THE WORLD HAS KNOWN. A cablegram to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD direct from the scene of suffering in Belgium so describes the distress of Europe's destitute non-combatants. America, of course, leads in relieving this need, and a number of agencies of one kind or another are engaged in collecting funds and clothing in this country. It is asserted with reiteration by those best in a position to know, that the efforts of none of these organizations can be spared. Besides the CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for Widows and Orphans of the war, the more important funds are those being collected in New York by the Belgian Relief Committee, the Red Cross, the German Relief, the American Hospital Committee, the Prince of Wales Fund, the Swiss Fund, the War Relief Committee, the Woman's Section of the American Commission and the American contingent of the Committee of Mercy. In other cities branches of these organizations or independent agencies are at work collecting money, foodstuffs, and clothing. In New York alone the total already contributed is close to two million dollars.

EGGS THAT LOSE THEIR FIRST BLOOM. It is almost impossible to disabuse some people of the belief that bad eggs are bad food, but Federal and State authorities are engaged in a laudable endeavor to persuade egg producers all over the country to cease shipping their "rots and spots" to Chicago, where, it is stated, there is a good market for them at $2 a case of 30 dozen. Ostensibly every producer sends his bad eggs there for use only in the leather tanning and similar businesses, but the over-plus finds its way into bakeries, and officials claim that most of the shipment are over-plus. Other cities that are not particular about their eggs are expected to cultivate a better taste in that respect as a result of this activity.

THE GOVERNMENT'S HEALTH CRUSADE

TWO important branches of the Government are conducting an active and a resultful campaign against quacks and charlatans, who have long thrived in the business of "selling health," the Department of Agriculture and the Post Office Department. The former works through the Bureau of Chemistry and the latter through its fraud order division. The Department of Justice, when necessary, co-operates with both.

The law cannot be invoked against some of the "fakirs," but the Department of Agriculture tries to reach them through publicity. Complaint letters from all over the country, containing fake advertising matter, had flowed into the department, and experts were put to work. Their work resulted in the following warning, prepared under the direction of Dr. Carl A. Alsberg, chief of the Bureau of Chemistry:

In view of the wide spread of literature and advice of so-called "diet experts," it seems desirable to warn people against adopting the dietary recommendations of those without real scientific standing in the community. Some of the advocates of freak diets are sincere, but are themselves deluded; while others are fakers, who seek to make monetary gain by advising peculiar systems of diet. Neither class can offer [illegible] advice. In most of the recommendations of these self-established "experts" there is hardly a shadow of reason, though they may seem plausible.

The department's experts, who make the investigation and experiments, say that many of the so-called diet systems lay great emphasis on raw foods. One expert said to the writer:

"Now, there is no objection to anyone's eating raw food if he likes it, or finds after experiment that it agrees with him, provided it is of good quality, free from contamination and wholesome. As a general proposition, raw food is not cleaner than cooked foods. Proper cooking sterilizes food and so renders innocuous pathogenic bacteria and other organisms possibly harmful. Raw foods have to be very carefully washed and cleaned before being eaten and as a general rule simple washing, while it will get rid of most of the dirt, will not remove all the bacteria, insect eggs, spores of fungi, etc., that may adhere to them. If the systems of some of these diet experts were logical, it would be possible to draw the conclusion that no one should eat lettuce or other salads, or raw vegetables and fruits. This would not be warranted by true science.

"Some of the advocates of raw food urge their correspondents not to eat animal foods because, they say, meat is filled with bacteria. This is not true. The surface of meat is not sterile, but the interior is, except in rare cases. We do not eat raw meat, except dried beef, or something similar, but cause it to be cooked, and this sterilizes it. In most cases where people have suffered, or think they suffer, from eating meat or any other normal article of diet, the trouble lies not with the actual article, but either in the imagination of the consumer or in the fact that the food has not been kept clean or properly prepared and handled after it is cooked."

A specialist of the department has pointed out that if the deductions of many food faddists which are accepted as facts were really operative, it would be difficult to explain how the human race has survived; the race should have expired very soon after man had progressed enough in intelligence to exercise choice in his diet and to cook his food.

The department lays emphasis on the fact that many of the people who offer dietetic advice for sale undertake to recommend a diet that will cure diseases without ever seeing the patient. The average man or woman, in talking about his or her own illness, frequently imagines symptoms, or describes them so inaccurately that they are not safe guides to the physician. Many sellers of food information, however, undertake to diagnose symptoms, and to advise a complete remedy, purely on the patient's description of his condition.

People beginning a radically new diet, whether it has curative value or not, think they gain a benefit, but this is because any marked change in diet or cooking may produce such an effect, the change itself often being a benefit. "Much of the advice on diet which has passed from individual to individual, and much of the supposed scientific advice now being sold by some food advisers, is really little more than folklore," says a specialist of the department.

"Stop worrying about your body," advises the department. People can expect to be lighter in weight in summer than in winter, and as a person grows older he should begin to cut down the amount he eats and depend on a simpler diet. It is often said that when a person passes forty he begins to need a different diet. The reason is, he does not exercise as energetically as before and does not need the same kind and amount of food as was required to keep up his energy for more active physical work.

Here is the plain common-sense advice of the Department of Agriculture:

If you like raw food better than anything else, eat it. If you like bread and milk twice a day, eat it. The main thing, as one grows older, is to eat in moderation and then, as always, to see what you eat is clean and that the cooked food you eat is originally in good condition and that it is well cooked. If something really disagrees with you, and the fault lies actually with the article rather than with the method by which it has been kept or cooked, stop eating that kind of food. If you experience serious discomfort which persists, consult the best physician you can discover.

As a general proposition, be wary of people who offer to give you advice or to cure you without ever seeing you. Finally, bear in mind that each human body has individual characteristics, and that a diet which admirably suits one man who lives in a certain location and does a certain kind of work may not be adapted to another individual living in a different climate and doing a different kind of work.

THE Department of Agriculture has given attention to so-called "anti-fat cures" because of inquiries and complaints. A thriving business is done by persons who pretend that they have systems of diet, etc., which will reduce flesh. As the result of the department's inquiries and investigation, it has reached the conclusion that "no other class of preparations, exploited to humbug the people, has a wider sale, and in almost every instance the preparations are practically useless."

In order to formulate a definite reply to inquirers, the Bureau of Chemistry made a series of tests with a number of nostrums of the above character on employees in the department, who wished to lose surplus flesh without injuring their health. One of the most widely advertised prescriptions for reducing flesh was tried for a period of six months. The result was that two of the subjects under experiment were obliged to stop, after taking the medicine for two or three weeks, because of its injurious effects. The third subject gained two and one-half pounds.

The Department of Agriculture says: "The only ways that the department's specialists know of for safely reducing flesh are rigid dieting and strenuous exercise, and those to be effective must be continued over a long period of time. The fat-reducing patient must eliminate from his diet fats, starchy foods and sugar. In many cases it is not wise because of other physical conditions for fat people to attempt any rapid reduction in weight. As a general rule diet and exercise are best directed by a skilled physician. Loss of flesh is by no means a blessing if accompanied by loss of health, energy or strength."

THE BOWERY MISSION CELEBRATES

THE thirty-fifth anniversary of the Bowery Mission was celebrated on November 7, 8 and 9, and was of unusual interest. It was the culmination of a year's work of unceasingly strenuous activity. Following the severe winter work when, in consequence of the snow blizzard in February last, the Mission was kept open day and night for several weeks in succession, there came in the spring and summer months a totally unprecedented number of unemployed men, so that the activities of the Free Labor Bureau and of the Labor Settlement were strained to the utmost. Even in the very hottest of the summer months the Mission auditorium was crowded to the doors.

The Brotherhood of the Mission has now assumed large proportions, and one of the most striking features of the anniversary was the reunion on Saturday evening. The cosmopolitan character of the work done in the Mission was evidenced by the fact that representatives of twenty-three different nationalities were present at the meeting and spoke of their conversion and Christian experience. The present membership is over 22,500.

The anniversary sermon was preached on Sunday morning, November 8, by the Rev. George S. Avery of the New York Home for Intemperate Men, Mount Vernon. On the evening of the same day a "testimony" meeting was held at which the principal speakers were Mr. B. F. Alexander, of the Water Street Mission, and Mr. Elliott of the Boston Industrial Home. Several Bowery Mission converts had come in from distant places: "Tom" Greene from Philadelphia; "Fred" Parmelee from Middletown, Conn.; "Jack" Leary from Chicago, and they, with a host of others who are now established workers at the Mission, contributed to one of the most effective meetings ever held within the walls of the life-saving station. Mr. J. T. Hunt, the secretary and business manager of the Mission, and himself a convert of twelve years' standing, presided.

The climax of interest in the anniversary was reached in the final meeting of the series, on Monday evening, November 9. At this meeting, Dr. Hallimond, the superintendent, presided, and the speakers were Rev. W. D. P. Bliss, D.D., the leader of the movement amongst the churches in behalf of the unemployed; the Rev. W. H. Morgan, D.D., the pastor of the largest M. E. Church in the United States, and Mr. John Lloyd Thomas, the popular manager of the great Mills Hotels. Dr. Morgan, Mr. Thomas, and Dr. Hallimond were all born in the same village in the north of England, and some interesting reminiscences were indulged in. Especially telling and touching was Mr. Thomas' tribute to the memory of his father, the late Rev. Isaac Thomas, who was instrumental in the conversion of some of the most famous preachers and scholars of the present day. Among them was the late Dr. Hughes, the father of Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Hughes.

The work of the Bowery Mission during the coming winter promises to be arduous and pressing beyond all previous records. CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, we are sure, will not fail to stand by and support it by their prayers, sympathy, and pecuniary help.

These are Different

The chief difference between Crisco doughnuts and others is their digestibility. Crisco itself is readily digestible and anything fried in it is most wholesome.

Then, too, Crisco can be made so much hotter than lard, without burning, that when the dough is placed in it the extreme heat of the Crisco immediately forms a light, tender crust. The inside is sealed against the absorption of fat and in consequence is lighter than the ordinary doughnut.

Do not wait for Crisco to smoke, but test from time to time with a bit of dough.

CRISCO

For Frying For Shortening For Cake Making

You will find that Crisco doughnuts agree with every member of your family and that each will ask that the doughnut jar be filled every week. There are four delightful doughnut recipes in this book.

Beautiful cloth-bound book of new recipes and a "Calendar of Dinners" for five 2-cent stamps!

This handsome book by Marion Harris Neil gives 615 excellent tested recipes. Also contains a "Calendar of Dinners"—a dinner menu for every day in the year. The Calendar tells what; the recipes tell how. Book also contains cookery hints and the interesting story of Crisco's development. Bound in blue and gold cloth. THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA reproached Pollyanna, in the tone of voice a small boy is apt to use when he wants to hide the fact that he has a heart.

"Why, I've been here ever since the last of March. Besides, it isn't as if I was going to stay. It's only for this winter."

"I don't care. You've just been away for a whole year, 'most, and if I'd s'posed you was going away again right off, the first thing, I wouldn't have helped one mite to meet you with flags and bands and things that day you come back from the Sanatorium."

"Why, Jimmy Bean!" ejaculated Pollyanna in amazed disapproval. Then, with a touch of superiority, born of hurt pride, she observed: "I'm sure I didn't ask you to meet me with bands and things—and you made two mistakes in that sentence. You shouldn't say 'you was'; and I think 'you come' is wrong. It doesn't sound right, anyway."

"Well, who cares if I did?"

Pollyanna's eyes grew still more disapproving.

"You said you did—when you asked me this summer to tell you when you said things wrong, because Mr. Pendleton was trying to make you talk right."

"Well, if you'd been brought up in a 'sylum without any folks that cared, instead of by a whole lot of old women who didn't have anything to do but tell you how to talk right, maybe you'd say 'you was,' and a whole lot more worse things, Pollyanna Whittier!"

"Why, Jimmy Bean!" flared Pollyanna, "my Ladies' Aiders weren't old women—that is, not many of them, so very old," she corrected hastily, her usual proclivity for truth and literalness superseding her anger, "and—"

"Well, I'm not Jimmy Bean, either," interrupted the boy, uptilting his chin.

"You're—not—why, Jimmy Be—What do you mean?" demanded the little girl.

"I've been adopted, legally. He's been intending to do it all along, he says, only he didn't get to it. Now he's done it. I'm to be called 'Jimmy Pendleton,' and I'm to call him 'Uncle John,' only I ain't—are not—I mean, I am not used to it yet, so I hain't—haven't begun to call him that, much."

The boy still spoke crossly, aggrievedly, but every trace of displeasure had fled from the little girl's face at his words. She clapped her hands joyfully.

"Oh, how splendid! Now you've really got folks—folks that care, you know. And you won't ever have to explain that he wasn't born your folks, 'cause your name's the same now. I'm so glad, glad, GLAD!"

The boy got up suddenly from the stone wall, where they had been sitting, and walked off. His cheeks felt hot and his eyes smarted with tears. It was to Pollyanna that he owed it all—this great good that had come to him, and he knew it. And it was to Pollyanna that he had just now been saying—

He kicked a small stone fiercely, then another, and another. He thought those hot tears were going to spill over and roll down his cheeks in spite of himself. He kicked another stone, then another; then he picked up a third stone and threw it with all his might. A minute later he strolled back to Pollyanna, still sitting on the stone wall.

"I bet you I can hit that pine tree down there before you can," he challenged airily.

"Bet you can't," cried Pollyanna, scrambling down from her perch.

The race was not run, after all, for Pollyanna remembered just in time that running fast was yet one of the forbidden luxuries for her. But so far as Jimmy was concerned it did not matter. His cheeks were no longer hot, his eyes were not threatening to overflow with tears. Jimmy was himself again.

CHAPTER III

A Dose of Pollyanna

AS THE eighth day of September approached—the day Pollyanna was to arrive—Mrs. Ruth Carew became more and more nervously exasperated with herself. She declared that she had regretted just once her promise to take the child—and that was ever since she had given it. Before twenty-four hours had passed she had, indeed, written to her sister, demanding that she be released from the agreement; but Della had answered that it was quite too late, as already both she and Dr. Ames had written the Chiltons.

Soon after that had come Della's letter saying that Mrs. Chilton had given her consent and would in a few days come to Boston to make arrangements as to school and the like. So there was nothing to be done, naturally, but let matters take their course. Mrs. Carew realized that and submitted to the inevitable, but with poor grace. True, she tried to be decently civil when Della and Mrs. Chilton made their expected appearance, but she was very glad that limited time made Mrs. Chilton's stay of very short duration and full to the brim of business.

It was well, indeed, perhaps, that Pollyanna's arrival was to be at a date no later than the eighth, for time, instead of reconciling Mrs. Carew to the prospective new member of her household, was filling her with angry impatience at what she was pleased to call her "absurd yielding to Della's crazy scheme."

Nor was Della herself in the least unaware of her sister's state of mind. If outwardly she maintained a bold front, inwardly she was very fearful as to results; but on Pollyanna she was pinning her faith, and because she did pin her faith on Pollyanna she determined on the bold stroke of leaving the little girl to begin her fight entirely unaided and alone. She contrived, therefore, that Mrs. Carew should meet them at the station upon their arrival; then, as soon as greetings and introductions were over, she hurriedly pleaded a previous engagement and took herself off. Mrs. Carew, therefore, had scarcely time to look at her new charge before she found herself alone with the child.

"Oh, but, Della, Della, you mustn't—I can't—" she called agitatedly, after the retreating figure of the nurse.

But Della, if she heard, did not heed, and, plainly annoyed and vexed, Mrs. Carew turned back to the child at her side.

"What a shame! She didn't hear, did she?" Pollyanna was saying, her eyes also wistfully following the nurse. "And I didn't want her to go now a bit. But then, I've got you, haven't I? I can be glad for that."

"Oh, yes, you've got me—and I've got you," returned the lady, not very graciously. "Come, we go this way," she directed, with a motion toward the right.

Obediently Pollyanna turned and trotted at Mrs. Carew's side through the huge station, but she looked up once or twice rather anxiously into the lady's unsmiling face. At last she spoke hesitatingly.

"I expect maybe you thought—I'd be pretty," she hazarded, in a troubled voice.

"P-pretty?" repeated Mrs. Carew.

"Yes—with curls, you know, and all that. And of course you did wonder how I did look, just as I did you. Only I knew you'd be pretty and nice, on account of your sister. I had her to go by, and you didn't have anybody. And of course I'm not pretty, on account of the freckles, and it isn't nice when you've been expecting a pretty little girl to have one come like me, and—"

"Nonsense, child!" interrupted Mrs. Carew a trifle sharply. "Come, we'll see to your trunk now, then we'll go home. I had hoped that my sister would come with us, but it seems she didn't see fit—even for this one night."

Pollyanna smiled and nodded.

"I know, but she couldn't, probably. Somebody wanted her, I expect. Somebody was always wanting her at the Sanatorium. It's a bother, of course, when folks do want you all the time, isn't it?—'course you can't have yourself when you want yourself, lots of times. Still, you can be kind of glad for that, for it is nice to be wanted, isn't it?"

There was no reply—perhaps for the first time in her life Mrs. Carew was wondering if anywhere in the world there was any one who really wanted her—not that she wished to be wanted, of course, she told herself angrily, pulling herself up with a jerk and frowning down at the child by her side.

Pollyanna did not see the frown. Pollyanna's eyes were on the hurrying throngs about them.

"My! what a lot of people!" she was saying happily. "There's even more of them than there was the other time I was here; but I haven't seen anybody yet that I saw then, though I've looked for them everywhere. Of course the lady and the little baby lived in Honolulu, so probably they wouldn't be here; but there was a little girl, Susie Smith—she lived right here in Boston. Maybe you know her, though. Do you know Susie Smith?"

"No, I don't know Susie Smith," replied Mrs. Carew dryly.

"Don't you? She's awfully nice, and she's pretty—black curls, you know; the kind I'm going to have when I go to heaven. But never mind, maybe I can find her for you, so you will know her. Oh, my! what a perfectly lovely automobile! Are we going to ride in it?" broke off Pollyanna, as they came to a pause before a handsome limousine, the door of which a liveried chauffeur was holding open.

The chauffeur tried to hide a smile—and failed. Mrs. Carew, however, answered with the weariness of one to whom "rides" are never anything but a means of locomotion from one tiresome place to another, probably quite as tiresome.

"Yes, we're going to ride in it." Then, "Home, Perkins," she added to the deferential chauffeur.

Workable Church Federation

TYRINGHAM, Mass., is receiving considerable attention as a town in which the new ideas of denominational federation are being successfully carried out. Tyringham is a village and township of 382 people; in 1850 it had 820. Its Baptist and Methodist churches united not long ago in work and worship, and in the support of one pastor for community leadership in what is called "The Federated Church." Church attendance in the community has increased about 100 per cent. in two years, and there is a corresponding increase in missionary gifts. Moral reforms have been effected, education redirected, wholesome recreations established, agricultural improvements well under way, church properties renovated, and a new community spirit has come to birth. The "Extension School in Community Development" includes instruction in agriculture, home-making, economics and practical business. The conferences under the direction of the school are times of community co-operation, both in study and in pleasure. The Extension School is not a church affair, being under the direction of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, but it was the influence of the Federated Church upon the community which opened the way to the establishment of the school. By means of the school, the community may "go to college" to learn further how to work out its own salvation.

THE GREAT COMMISSION

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DECEMBER 13
(MATT. 28: 16-20; LUKE 24: 36-49.)

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." Matt. 28: 20.

Of course "the world" should be "the age" (R.V.). The end of the world is "a far-off event," but the end of the age may be close at hand. The signs indicated by our Lord are all fulfilled at the present time. The restlessness of humanity, like the roaring waves of the sea, the widespread wars; the false teachers and the chilling love of the church; the evangelization of the world, as distinct from its conversion—these like successive historic utterances that we live at the junction of two ages—that of the Gentiles, and that of the new Heavens and Earth. But be that end soon or late, there is not a day in which Jesus will not be with us. Leading the battle, when there is fighting to be done; supporting us by encouragements and assurances; standing with us when we bear witness, calling to us in the instance of persecution. In all our afflictions he is afflicted, and the Angel of his Presence saves. He is with us now by his Spirit, but soon he will be manifested to us and to the eyes of men; and then shall we be manifested with him in glory. Now he is Immanuel, God with us; then we shall be forever with him!

Regaining Lost Ground

By Arthur H. Howland, B.D.

THERE is a peculiar sadness about the study of this particular lesson at this particular time. In the Revised Version of the passages assigned for our study the expression twice occurs: "the nations." "Make disciples of all the nations"; "that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all the nations."

Now, instead of receiving the teaching to observe all things that Jesus had commanded, most of the nations of the world are receiving and acting upon precisely the opposite teaching and doing precisely the things which Jesus commanded men not to do.

Already the war has had a disastrous effect upon the work of foreign missions. Funds have been lacking, protection has been uncertain and in many fields the work is badly disorganized.

So it comes to pass that as the Christian Sunday schools of the world meet this year to study this lesson of the "Great Commission," the commission to preach the Christ of peace and brotherhood and to initiate the nations into the divine life of service and love, they find that the work already accomplished is being undone and that the nations, instead of pressing forward to the goal Christ set, are rushing back into the whirl of wrong from which he came to rescue them.

The work of Christ has been thus set back many times through the centuries. But these setbacks merely act as a challenge to the church to push ahead with still greater vigor and sacrifice in its task of purging the world from wrong and lifting mankind up to the standards of Jesus. He has lost none of his authority; none of his power. He has not rescinded nor compromised his emphatic promise: "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the age." He is still with us; he still has all authority. The church must take fresh hold of him and receive fresh enduements of his power to regain the ground that has been lost and push forward to greater victories.

A few phrases in our lesson are worthy of special study. "All authority." Emphasize the universality of that. Greater than all kings and potentates is Jesus—Prince of Peace, Lord of Righteousness. "Therefore." Because he has this authority, we are to go gladly, confidently, vigorously, sternly, yet lovingly, with his message of salvation. His authority gives us our authority. To speak for God and to exhort men to bow before him. "Teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever I commanded you." We are sometimes inclined to side-step some of the things Jesus told us to teach. Paul said to the Ephesians, reviewing his work among them: "I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." (Acts 20: 27.) Complete justice, complete kindness, complete surrender to the will of God, whole-hearted love of him, which leads us to whole-hearted service to our neighbor, these are the things which Jesus taught. We must announce faithfully the commands he would utter to the world through us. "Repentance and remission of sins." That is God's treatment for sin. Other religions agree in announcing the penalties of sin; Christ's religion announces sin's forgiveness and removal. What sincere soul can resist that offer? Christ comes to men, saying: "Will you let me forgive your sins? I will take them away if you will let me." Surely that is a winsome offer, an offer that we should be glad to carry. "Ye are witnesses." Has Christ forgiven our sins? Are we feeling the sweetness and power of his continued presence? We should be his witness to the reality of these things, saying to all who know us: "These things have been made true for me; they can be yours if you will take them."

"Tarry till ye be endued with power." Ah, how heavily goes the work of Christ when we try to do it in our own strength! how slowly and ineffectually the Great Commission is carried out if we do the planning and the announcing in our own strength and wisdom! Have we experienced the fulness of the Pentecostal blessing which came to the disciples as they tarried in the city in obedience to this command? It is important to "go"; but it is of first importance to "tarry" till the heavenly power has come upon us to equip us for the heavenly work we have to do.

Missions: Commission or Omission?

By Amos R. Wells, Litt.D.

LET us all be glad that among Christ's last words to his disciples were these words of glorious confidence: "All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth." His power is our power. Dean Stanley once wrote truly, "The greatness of God is the true rebuke to the littleness of men. The greatness of Christ is the true rebuke to the littleness of Christians." Here is a pond that is supposed to be in communication with the ocean, and it is half dried up. We know that the communication is choked. If all power is Christ's, and we are Christ's, then we must be conscious that all power is ours—all the power we need. Test your Christianity by that truth!

For note Christ's "therefore." It is the most inspiring "therefore" ever spoken. "All power is mine," said he; "therefore, go ye and teach all nations." How gloriously Christ takes it for granted that all that is his is also his disciples'! And how gloriously also he takes it for granted that what is his will not rest selfishly in his disciples' lives, but will be gladly, freely and promptly passed on to others! "Love," says Dr. J. Stuart Holden, "is the most practical as well as the most potent force in the world, for love is that which is not forever seeking to get, but which always delights to give." Christ's loving "therefore" includes his disciples' union with him in loving service.

Healthy, beautiful hair by using Resinol Soap

Shampoo regularly with hot water and Resinol Soap, rubbing the rich, creamy lather thoroughly into the scalp so as to soften and stimulate the scalp, to remove the dead skin and cells, and to work the healing, antiseptic Resinol balsams well into the roots of the hair.

Rinse in gradually cooler water, the final water being cold. Dry the hair thoroughly, without artificial heat. This simple, agreeable method almost always stops dandruff and scalp itching, and keeps the hair live, thick and lustrous. When the hair or scalp are in very bad condition, apply a little Resinol Ointment to the scalp a few hours before shampooing with Resinol Soap.

Resinol Soap leaves no stickiness or unpleasant odor in the hair and contains no harsh, drying alkali. Its rich brown is due wholly to the Resinol balsams that it contains, not to artificial coloring. For sample, free, write Dept. 15-C Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

But this service is not left indefinite. Our Master is not so careless a Master as that would be. He does not send us out to teach whatever comes into our head to teach. He is very specific.

Spurgeon bids us suppose that we hire a man for a gardener. "He is very industrious, but when you walk around your garden you do not see him; and for a very good reason: he is not there. Where is he? He is at work in your neighbor's garden! Of course you love your neighbor as yourself, so you are pleased to think that your servant is working on behalf of your neighbor. You smile, do you, and say to yourself, 'That is a kind of servant I should not care to keep.' Well, now, if I, as a Christian minister, become a teacher of philosophy instead of the truths of the Gospel, then Christ is not my Master." We have a perfectly clear commission, telling us not only to teach, but what to teach.

"Repentance and remission of sins"—that is what we are to proclaim. There is a beautiful story of a grand old eagle, chained in a town of our Southwest, and marked for sale. Along came a young mountaineer, who gazed at the dejected bird, bought him and immediately let him go free. He explained to the bystanders: "I had seen that bird up on the mountain, and I could not bear to see him here in chains." This is to be the spirit of our Christian testimony: remission, freedom, restoration, salvation!

What a spur to fidelity is that saying of Christ's: "Lo, I am with you alway"! You know the famous story of Napoleon and the sentry, whom the great general found asleep in a field of grain, overcome by the heat. The emperor took the man's musket and stood in his place on duty. When the soldier awoke he was filled with terror, seeing who was giving him that unworded rebuke. If you are asleep, Christian, some day you will wake up and find the King of kings on duty in the place you should have filled, and how great will then be your shame and fear!

We are to be "witnesses of these things." "Witness" is translated from the Greek word which is the same as our "martyr." Christ calls us to no sofa life. "Soldiers," said Garibaldi, "I have nothing to offer but rags, poverty and wounds; but let him who loves his country follow me." Thousands did follow the red-clad leader; and millions follow our Leader of the red cross, though he promises only a cross as the reward of our martyr-witnessing; "and in the world to come, life everlasting."

"Tarry in Jerusalem," Christ said, 'till ye be endued with power from on high." The Russian peasants tell of an old woman who was invited by the magi to go with them to find the Christ child, but who tarried to set her house in order. She is still alive, says the legend, and is searching for the Christ child all over the world. Not such tarrying is to be ours, but faith-filled, expectant, eager; and then, as soon as Christ says, "Go!"—off and away!

By Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

TEACHING all nations. Jerusalem and Galilee. If little Jerusalem, and Galilee with its two hundred and seventy-nine villages, needed a Pentecost in those days and a gift of tongues, what shall we say of the task in these days! Moslem missions spend centuries of toil to undo the confusion of tongues. In my own immediate family we make almost constant use of four languages. I can read and understand another three. In the Lebanon Sanatorium for Tuberculosis Sufferers, connected with our mission, under Dr. Mary Eddy's care, we have had this summer not less than eight languages, four great religions and six Christian sects, and five distinct races. There was no common language in which service of prayer could be held and understood by all.

In our schools for boys and girls, while English and Arabic are the languages of instruction, we frequently find as many as ten and eleven mother tongues. A few years ago a young American tutor in the Syrian Protestant College invited his classes to write the verse, "God is love," in as many languages as possible, and before the list was complete it stood written in twenty-two languages.

In Acts 2, fifteen nationalities are named, including nine countries, four of which fall within Asia Minor, so that the languages of pupils in the schools of the American mission in Syria probably outnumber the tongues of Pentecost. If one goes farther south to the city of Jerusalem perhaps as many as fifty languages can be found and into all these languages the Bible societies, with their army of translators, have with almost infinite toil translated the Word of God.

My own share of toil in the great work has been upon the Bible in Arabic, which is the religious language for one-seventh of the human race. Since 1900 my work has been mainly in connection with the American Press, where we print the Bible and Arabic literature. During the past six years my major task has been the adaptation of a new set of references for the Arabic Bible and the making of a new set of electrotypes for the great Bible. It has involved an amount of toil that falls to the lot of a very few men and a strain upon eyes and nerves that not many could bear. The printing of this new edition has already begun and a year hence will see, we hope, the end of a seven-year task and a work that may stand for centuries.

The American Bible Society has all the expenses of this work, which will cost not less than $15,000. The Syria Mission loans the missionaries to the society in this joint task.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Q. I would like to ask you if you can tell me where I could find a list of questions suitable for a contest of six months between classes of young men and women.—M. E. J.

A. A Book of Bible Questions (Smith) covering the Old and New Testament in an interesting way, has been found to be of great service. Copies may be secured through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Q. Can you suggest something to interest boys and young men from 16 to 20 years?—M. E. J.

A. In addition to the missionary suggestions made above, you can get suggestions for the physical life of the boys from Alexander's book, The Boy and the Sunday School. Also for the social side, Social Plans, by Reisner. Start several of these boys to train for leadership by taking up one or more of the lines of work suggested under "Sunday School Leadership Training," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Relate each boy to some definite task, as a member of one of your class committees.

Q. I understand you have one of the finest regulated schools in the country. As secretary of the school at this place, would you suggest installing a card index system? What plan would you suggest for following up absentees?—L. H. B.

A. In our school we have two card indexes of members, one showing the membership record and arranged alphabetically, and the other the birthday record, and arranged by months. In a school of our size we find the plan of a secretary for each department with an alphabetical and birthday index for the department simplifies the work. In a school of average size one secretary may be able to care for both records. Secure Fox's book, Records, Rewards and Recognitions.

THE TIME DRAWS NEAR

O PRECIOUS Saviour, guide the faltering feet;
We've journeyed long to reach thy mercy seat.
We would not fail, O Father, there to kneel,
And beg of thee our wounded soul to heal.

The storms of life are many, rough and wild,
The rivers deep, oh save thy sinking child!
Across our pathway oft goes wingless night,
Oh come, my Saviour, come with morning light!

So slight the claim, so little done for thee,
Thy wondrous goodness, Lord, the only plea.
The time draws near; the hour to us unknown,
With the new birth, oh bring us to thy throne.

KNOX FRENCH DAINTIES

2 envelopes Knox Acidulated Gelatine
4 cups granulated sugar
1½ cups boiling water
1 cup cold water

Soak the gelatine in the cold water five minutes. Add the boiling water. When dissolved add the sugar and boil slowly for fifteen minutes. Divide into two equal parts. When somewhat cooled add to one part one-half teaspoonful of the Lemon Flavor, found in separate envelope, dissolved in one tablespoonful water and one tablespoonful lemon extract. To the other part add one tablespoonful brandy, if desired, one-half teaspoonful extract of cloves, and color with the pink color. Pour into shallow tins that have been dipped in cold water. Let stand over night; cut into squares. Roll in fine granulated or powdered sugar and let stand to crystalize.

Vary this recipe by using different flavors and colors, and if desired, add chopped nuts, figs, dates, raisins or peanuts to the lemon mixture.

CHURCH AND THE WORKINGMAN

evils in an exaggerated way and stops there, particularly if the denunciations are unjust to any class in the community.

"The regenerative power of a spiritual Christianity" does not seem to me to have been effective in preventing or even mitigating the shocking evils of war, alcoholism and prostitution in the white race, so that I have faint hope that that influence, unsupported, can bring about any considerable improvement in the social and industrial conditions; for such improvements we have to look to legislation, preventive medicine and social hygiene, and, in general, to the increase of goodwill among men, this goodwill taking effect through the advance of knowledge in economics, physical and biological science and social ethics.

As you invite me to write on any phase of the general subject I venture to add a passage from a letter to a labor unionist last February; and I select this topic because I have thought for many years that the Christian churches often lend their support to trades unionism without understanding, in the least, the bad effect of many of their policies on the character and happiness of the members of the unions.

My objections to the trades-unions are altogether educational and moral. They seem to me to have had a bad effect on the character and happiness of their members, because of certain methods which they have used and are still using. The first of these objectionable methods is the habitual use of violence against persons and property to gain their ends. The second is the limited output. The third is the uniform wage, alike for all journeymen, without regard to age or skill. The fourth is the disregard of contracts—their own contracts and the contracts which employers or managers have entered into with owners or consumers, but have not yet fulfilled.

The first and last of these practices are grave violations of the universal moral sense. The second and third rob the workingman of strong motives for self-improvement and make it probable that he will do no hearty, zealous, faithful work. Under those conditions it is impossible to be happy in the life-work; for there is no happy, contented work except that done with good will, generous zeal and loyalty.

All well-read, thinking people believe that the progress of civilization depends on universal, steady, productive labor; the unions seem to believe that the less one works the better.

CHARLES W. ELIOT.
Cambridge, Mass.

Editor White Believes in the Regenerative Power of Christianity

I SHOULD regard the condition of workingmen today rather more fortunate than at any other time in history. But on the other hand, I think because of their very good fortunes, which consist largely in general intelligence, the problem of the church is more surely to help the workingmen than it ever has been before. The church has been neglecting the welfare interests of the working classes and that neglect has contributed to much of the unfortunate conditions of which labor justly complains.

The neglect has been largely a class feeling among the middle class, which has blinded them to the real needs of the working classes. I think that the church cannot lay emphasis on spirittual matters without finding a greater field for social betterment, because the minute a man begins to think and feel and exercise his spirit, that minute he sees the need of a social readjustment. I should say that the way for a church member to help solve the social problem is twofold: First, to solve the problem in his own household and in his own sphere of influence, whether he be an employee or an employer; to get himself in right adjustment with the world; if he is an employer, to give his men an eight-hour day with good shop conditions, the maximum of pay and the benefit of insurance against sickness and accident; then to use his vote in city, State and national matters as his own personal property, and not to put it in escrow in any party nor for any candidate.

The institutional church, it seems to me, is simply the church doing what the individual should do, and it is a good thing so far as it goes; but, of course, it goes a very short distance, except that it helps to make people in the church see how sadly they are neglecting their social duties.

I think the regenerative power of a spiritual Christianity is the only thing that may count in the long run to bring material advances toward better conditions. W. A. WHITE.

Dr. Parkhurst Against "Ungospelized Humanitarianism"

MY attitude as to the subject matter of your inquiries is a conservative one. The Gospel, as I understand its purpose and as that purpose is illustrated in the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, has for its aim, its primary aim, to change men, not to improve conditions. The improved conditions will come as fast as the man himself is improved, and my feeling is that the heavier and heavier emphasis that is being thrown by the pulpit upon bettering the outward life of people is tending to degrade Christianity to an ungospelized humanitarianism. This does not mean indifference to human economic conditions, but it means that those conditions should be steadily exhibited as being essentially and permanently bettered only as they come as the corollary of newness of heart.

New York. C. H. PARKHURST.

A Labor Leader on the Hostility Between Labor and the Church

IT IS not difficult to understand why men who labor are possessed of this feeling [of hostility] when they see men who are notorious as flagrant violators of every moral obligation taken into the bosom of the church, their contributions not only accepted but solicited, while the church, by such practice, stands sponsor for their unrighteous acts here and assumes to guarantee their salvation hereafter. It is the natural result that a man who has been exploited questions the divine mission of churches so administered, and refuses to affiliate with a church forming part of a monopoly for vending the redeeming blood to the highest bidder.

When the church has purged itself, not only of men of that class, but of those of its own servants who rush to their defense, thus making it apparent that from the standpoint of the church salvation is not a matter of barter, and that all men are equal before the altar, even if some are clad in faded garments, then, and probably not until then, you will find the laboring man becoming part and parcel of the church militant.

A. B. GARRETSON.
President, Order of Railway Conductors of America, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Speaker Clark Holds that Churches Should be Social Centres

MY OPINION is that the most effective work that the church can do for labor is to furnish opportunities for recreation, amusement and pleasure. Of course I am not undertaking to discount and belittle the effect of religious services in any way, but people in this world need something more than religious services to keep them out of trouble. They desire amusement and recreation, and if they don't get it in the right place they are liable to get it in the wrong place.

I am heartily in favor of the movement to make schoolhouses in the United States the center of social entertainment and I have somewhat the same idea as to churches.

CHAMP CLARK.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

How Much Do We Love Christ?

Epworth League Topic for December 13. John 21: 15-22

WE ARE all very familiar with the operation of measuring things. Early in life we begin to talk about and handle quarts and pints, pounds, half-pounds, pecks and gallons. We learn how the thermometer registers heat and the foot-rule measures lines. We go to school and begin to learn how to compute measurements of floor space, or field space, or the contents of vessels great and small.

Today we are to discuss the problem of measuring a very important thing —our love for Christ. We all realize that our love for him is the most important thing in life. As we grow older we are tempted to get the idea that the important quantities or amounts to consider are the sums of money we can make and store or the number of years we can manage to prolong life. But our lesson tells us about something incalculably more important than dollars or years. Best of all, it is a thing everyone of us may possess. We may not only possess it, but we may possess as much of it as we choose. We cannot be sure about dollars or years, but we can be sure of getting this thing in liberal quantities—the love of Christ. This does not mean his love to us. That is always beyond all measure. But it means our love to him. How large a place in our affections does he hold? How much do we care for him? How much do we love him? Christ gave to Peter in the conversation they had on the seaside in that early morning hour a measure by which he and all other friends of Christ may compute their love for him. That measure is: "How much are we doing for others?" After winning each of the three assurances from Peter that he loved him, Jesus said: "Feed my sheep" or "Feed my lambs."

It is strange how many people who call themselves Christians seem utterly to forget this plan and command of Jesus for kindly service. The family quarrels and bickerings, the expressions of impatience and unfriendliness among Christian associates, the little meannesses and selfish efforts for comfort and advantage; these things show how far we have wandered from the ideals of Jesus and how little we really care for him. We are brought again to the consideration of that chosen plan of Jesus, which is seen not only to be so beautiful and winsome and powerful, but so ingenious—the plan of winning all his followers to ardent love for himself and then telling them that all this love for him can be manifested and made productive by kindly service to others. He stated it most clearly in those searching words: "Inasmuch as ye have done it, or have not done it, unto the least of these, ye have done it, or have not done it, unto me." This is what it means to love Christ. This is what it means to be a Christian.

No matter how humble our work may be we can put into it the soul of a poet, and the passion of a saint. How many people are we making happy? How many people are we helping to be good? How many people are we really helping to live? How many bodies or minds or souls are we earnestly striving to make stronger, cleaner, richer and better, in the name of Jesus? This is the measure of our love for him.

Gems from My Reading

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for December 13. Prov. 2: 1-12. (Brief extracts with comments.)

THE prejudice against novels has almost entirely disappeared. They, together with poetry, form the basis of the literature of the nation or epoch. Certainly a book can do no harm because it is a "story" rather than a philosophy or history. Best writers of fiction give us our clearest comprehensions of life, because the art of fiction means the art of painting life in words. Such writers as Dickens, Charles Kingsley, Charles Reade, George Macdonald, J. M. Barrie, Jean Ingelow, who was a novelist as well as a poet—a thing which many people seem to have forgotten—Nathaniel Hawthorne, Gilbert Parker, Winston Churchill, F. Hopkinson Smith, Henry Van Dyke, will make any life richer and fuller, not only of usefulness, but of pleasure. As to the newer works of fiction, there are so many that one cannot begin to keep up even with what is thoroughly good. One must choose carefully and be careful not to waste time on works which are really worthless. We are in danger in these busy days of losing our taste for poetry. It would be too bad to do that. Tennyson, Browning, Mrs. Browning; our own dear "New England" poets, Lowell, Whittier, Longfellow; and later Sidney Lanier, and at the present the beloved James Whitcomb Riley will lead to paths full of music and flowers and light and to treasures and bright jewels.

Do not neglect history, which is in reality a story, the story of nations and of the world. Begin to learn something of philosophy as soon as possible, understanding the efforts men have been making to find out what thought is, and how to think, and what life and the world really mean. Now is it hard to believe that "devotional reading," even sermons, may be thoroughly delightful and attractive? You can learn to have as much delight in Isaiah as you may have in your favorite novelist or poet. It is full of music, full of beauty, full of life. So the great devotional writers of the present day, Andrew Murray, J. R. Miller, F. B. Meyer and Dr. Jowett, lay before us paragraphs and chapters and books of great beauty as well as of nourishing soul food.

Aside from all these books there is a constant stream of periodical literature, bringing with it a weekly and monthly bounty of instruction and entertainment. The special question for discussion tonight is how we should collect and preserve the "gems" that we find in our reading. The scrap book is old-fashioned, but I do not know that I ever heard anyone who kept a scrap book regret that he had done so, while I have frequently heard people express regret that they have not done or are not doing so. If you keep a scrap book have one with loose leaves so you can keep the related extracts near together. Besides your scrap book you should have another note book for copying out passages from books. We all recognize, of course, that it is a crime for which there is no adequate punishment to cut or tear a book. If you are making a formal collection of extracts and can afford to do so, it is sometimes a good plan to buy two copies of a book for the special purpose of taking them apart and pasting the pages which you wish to preserve on separate sheets for binding. People disagree about the advisability of marking their books. If it is carefully and neatly done it makes the volume more valuable than it was before.

But, best of all, memorize. Whole chapters of the Bible, not only the Psalms, but chapters from the prophets and the New Testament, are so beautiful that they should be read and reread until they have written themselves upon the pages of the mind and can be read there without opening the book. So with other paragraphs and sentences and lines of best-loved books and poems. Store your heart and your mind with them and they will not only be never-failing sources of comfort and delight to you, but will make your conversation, your letters and, when you come to it, your public address, attractive, helpful, powerful.

Hamilton Accuracy
The thing that makes a better watch is Accuracy. The thing that distinguishes a watch and makes its owner proud of it is Accuracy. Begin to talk Accuracy to your jeweler and he will begin to talk Hamilton Watch to you.
Hamilton Watch
"The Railroad Timekeeper of America"
In the picture the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad's train, the "Commercial Limited," is about to start on its fast daily run. Conductor D. Kelly and Engineer G. Cooper are comparing their Hamilton Watches with which they have timed their runs for years with perfect satisfaction.
Write for the Hamilton Watch Book—"The Timekeeper"
It pictures and describes the various Hamilton models and gives interesting watch information.
There are twenty-five models of the Hamilton Watch. Every one has Hamilton quality and Hamilton accuracy. They range in price from $12.25 for movement only (in Canada $12.50) up to the superb Hamilton masterpiece at $150.00.
Your jeweler can show you the Hamilton you want, either in a cased watch or in a movement only, to be fitted to any style case you select, or to your own watch case if you prefer.

Only the Tree-Ripened Oranges and Grapefruit are Sold under this mark
Only nature can ripen oranges and grapefruit successfully—man's efforts to imitate her processes always have failed. Nature's way is to ripen the fruit on the tree—she holds the oranges and grapefruit there until they have become sweet and juicy. Sometimes men try to beat out nature by picking the fruit green and sweating it until the skin turns yellow. Then the orange or grapefruit looks ripe but it remains immature inside—the pulp will be dry and stringy and the juice flat and sour. It isn't fruit good to eat.
FLORIDA CITRUS EXCHANGE
The Florida Citrus Exchange, a co-operative, non-profit-making association of growers, markets only tree-ripened fruit. The members are pledged to leave their oranges and grapefruit growing on the trees until nature has converted the citric acid into sugar and has made the fruit healthful and delicious; really good to eat.
Your guarantee of tree-ripened, sweet, juicy, well-flavored citrus fruits is the mark—in red on boxes and wrappers—of the FLORIDA CITRUS EXCHANGE
Booklet telling how to serve and use citrus fruits mailed for four cents in stamps.

Sozodont
FOR THE TEETH

For three generations (since 1846) Sozodont has kept the teeth of its users from decaying.

Decay is caused by food decomposing in the crevices of and between the teeth; and also by acids in the mouth which first eat away the enamel and then gradually create a cavity. Sozodont prevents these inroads from starting.

Sozodont is a liquid, and only a liquid can permeate into the infinitesimal crevices between and in the teeth. And Sozodont is so prepared that wherever it goes acids are neutralized and foods or foreign substances immediately removed, leaving the teeth thoroughly and antiseptically clean with no chance for decay.

Sozodont itself is not a tooth polish—nor does it whiten teeth—but for these purposes Sozodont Tooth Powder or Sozodont Tooth Paste should be used. Which do you prefer?

Let us send you a booklet written by a prominent dentist on the value of a clean mouth and clean teeth. Just mail your name and address—there is no charge.

PARK NOVELTY

SOFA PHILOSOPHY, II

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"GIRLS are funny things," said the Boy. He said it argumentatively, and he looked at the Girl as he spoke.

"Why?" the Girl questioned from her end of the sofa—"and you always look at me when you say mean things—why?"

"Well," the Boy hesitated for the fraction of a second, "you wear such funny clothes—that ribbon around your arm, for instance. What good is it?"

The Girl looked down at the offending arm. Sure enough, a lavender ribbon was tied half-way between the elbow and the wrist. She looked at it thoughtfully for a moment. Then she smiled.

"I think it looks pretty," she answered. "Don't you?"

"'Pretty!'" the Boy snorted. "'Pretty!' How would I look with a couple of yards of blue baby-ribbon tied on me?" Peevishly he pulled the sleeve up from a brown, strong-looking wrist. "How would I look?" he persisted.

The Girl looked at the wrist, and then at the serious face above it. Quite unaccountably she laughed.

"Awfully funny," she told him; "funnier than you could imagine. But," her eyebrows lifted disdainfully, "I don't think that I do!"

The Boy pondered for a moment, a frown puckering his rather good-looking face, while his heels beat an endless tattoo on the sofa. Then he answered her:

"You do," he told her. "If you think it's an ornament you're mistaken. I think it's silly. Why do you wear it anyway? Lots of other people don't."

"Then you admit," the Girl chuckled delightedly, "then you admit that it's an original idea, rather?"

"Original nothing." The Boy grinned at his innermost thoughts. "You don't do it because it's original. You do it to attract attention—admit it!"

"Admit nothing." The Girl was getting just a bit angry. "That's exactly like men! Every time a girl attempts to fuss up a bit or tries to look pretty they think it's to attract their attention. Poor girls! they are never credited with a thought above trying to smile sweetly to please you; and I assure you, as a class, you're not so easy to please! What kind of clothes do you like, anyway, you men?"

The Boy hugged his knee between his two hands and looked off into a space pictured with vaguely moving, perfectly gowned figures. The Girl waited. Finally he spoke.

"Well," he told her, "men, as a rule, don't like sensational clothes, or ultra-smart hair styles. They don't like slipper heels five inches high, or slit skirts, or beauty curls. They don't like any of the fussy, 'obviously to attract attention' styles that you see on Sixth Avenue."

"Oh!" The Girl was sitting on the extreme end of the sofa. "You like"—she sounded like the cruel step-mother in a fairy tale—"you like hair screwed into a tight knob on the back of the head. You like flannel wrappers in the morning and a calico dress for afternoon. You like hats that sit up high like a peanut, and coats that fit like a bolster case. You like white mittens for church—"

"Don't try to be smart," the Boy interrupted. "It's sickening. Of course I don't like things that are crazy. I like to see a well-dressed girl as much as—more than—you do! I think that a girl is well dressed if her clothes are well cut, and fit her and are in style. If the colors are becoming, and her hat has good lines. I like a girl to be modern as well as you do, and I hate calico dresses, and mittens, and peanut hats much more than you ever will. But I hate freaky things!"

"I never said myself that I liked freaky things," the Girl retorted. "I like well-cut clothes, and becoming colors, and hats with good lines, as well as anybody else likes them. You sound almost disagreeable tonight!" Her voice was just a bit sarcastic.

"But," the Boy persisted in the true masculine way, "but, if you really do feel that way about clothes, why don't you live up to your feelings? I'd like to know."

"When," demanded the Girl fiercely, "have you seen me not living up to them? I can't remember ever wearing any of the awful things that you're talking about. You're thinking about some other girl." She frowned as she said it.

Quickly the Boy slid down to the other end of the sofa.

"You know"—he began smilingly.

"Then," the Girl's glance was withering, "why did you say it?"

The Boy's mind groped back—back to the beginning of the conversation.

"Why," he told her—"that ribbon on your arm started it—it's such a silly ribbon." He was ready to begin all over again.

The Girl rested her hand on the sofa and looked into his face long and earnestly.

"Are you in dead earnest?" she asked him. "Don't you really like it, or are you teasing me?"

"Like it!" the Boy sniffed. "Like it? What d'you suppose I've been fussing about? It's too silly. How would I look with a bow on my arm?" He was starting on his old theme.

The grandfather clock ticked away in the corner of the room, and the Girl tapped her fingers on the sofa in time to its slow sound. Suddenly she fumbled with the ribbon and untied it.

"There!" she told him with a rather bad grace. "I've taken it off. Do you feel any better?"

The Boy smiled with the conquering "I-told-you-so" smile of the man who has won out in an argument with a woman.

"Yes, I do feel better," he told her loftily, "and I'll take back what I said. You are open to reason; you're not like the rest of 'em."

The Girl resented the patronizing tone.

"It's time for you to go home," she said. Suddenly she turned toward him. "Why," she asked, "haven't I asked you to stop wearing red neckties, and fancy handkerchiefs? Why haven't I asked you to shave off your silly mustache?"

"Girls are funny," the Boy told her, soberly. Then he laughed.

WANTED TO LIVE RIGHT

RALPH W. BROWN, assistant religious work director of the West Side Y. M. C. A., New York, leaning over his desk in the association building, looked up and saw a man of nondescript, well dressed, intelligent of face, standing beside him. "I am an ex-safe-blower," the man said. It was a new experience and for an instant Mr. Brown didn't know what to make of it. He listened to what the man was saying. Safe-blowers, as a rule, do not go around telling folks about it.

"Is there a chance for a fellow like me to get right and live right?" the man asked.

"Certainly," replied Mr. Brown heartily. He drew a chair up beside his desk and motioned the stranger to a seat.

For several months, the West Side branch has been holding evangelistic meetings from automobiles along Broadway. The stranger and he had listened to one of the speakers, and had decided to accept the invitation to go to the Y. M. C. A. and "talk things over."

This occurred several weeks ago, and, according to last reports, the man is "living right." He has a "job," and is working regularly.

Farther to the west, around Cracow, the situation is not so favorable to the Austrians. Russian advance columns have reached within about thirty-five miles of that city to the north and are at Tarnow at about the same distance to the east. The city, however, is not in imminent danger, as there are large forces both of Germans and Austrians between them and the city, and until the situation in Central Poland is cleared up it is extremely doubtful whether the Russians will make a serious offensive movement towards Cracow from the north, as a decisive defeat in Central Poland would leave a far advanced Russian army in an exposed and dangerous position.

The Germans in the last week drove the Russians in Soldau in Eastern Prussia first back to Mlawa in Poland, and then continuing their advance, drove them out of Mlawa towards the fortress of Novo Georgievsk. At the same time another force advanced along the Vistula from Thorn and drove the Russians first to Lipuo and then out of Lipuo to Plock and beyond. While these things were going on a third German army, the army which had originally invaded Poland and had nearly reached Warsaw, and had retreated to the river Warthe, suddenly resumed the offensive and inflicted an important defeat on the Russians with a loss to them of some thirty thousand men and many cannon, and following up the retreating foe, advanced to Lodz, which it now holds.

At present the three German armies are moving toward Warsaw as their joint objective, and it now remains to be seen whether the Russians can prevent their juncture and their own defeat.

The battle of the rivers in France and Belgium is at a standstill, with the combatants in practically the same position which they occupied over a month ago. Severe fighting occurs from time to time, but the lines do not move. The weather and the consequent inundation both from the sky and the ocean have converted the extreme western end of the line, towards the ocean, into practically a lake, and consecutive campaigning is out of the question. On the rest of the line, as far as changes of position go, there is absolutely nothing to chronicle. Even around Verdun and Toul, the critical points, the fighting has slackened.

Do You Know Your Bible?

New Questions. John Mark (Marcus).

Half-Year Contest, List 5; Year's Contest, List 11

1. (a) Where did John Mark live? (b) What incident shows that his mother's house became a gathering-place for the Christians in the city?

2. (a) Who was his cousin (one of whom he is spoken as "sister's son")? (b) With what two Christian leaders did he start on a missionary journey?

3. (a) At what point did Mark refuse to accompany his companions farther [In this passage he is called by his first name "John"]? (b) Where did he go?

4. (a) Which one of his former companions wished to take him on a subsequent journey? (b) What was the result of the discussion between the two leaders over the question of Mark's accompanying them? (c) Where did Mark and his champion go?

5. (a) What three passages in Paul's epistles show that Mark became again one of his fellow-workers? (b) What expression in one of these passages indicates that Mark was a special messenger of Paul's?

6. (a) What expression in one of the three passages just referred to indicates that Paul set a high regard on Mark's help? (b) Locate the passage in which Paul states that Mark was among those who were "a comfort" to him?

7. (a) What passage indicates that Mark was also a companion of Peter? (b) What affectionate term indicates their close spiritual relationship?

8. How does the Gospel which Mark wrote compare in length with the other three Gospels?

9. In the first five chapters of Mark's Gospel how many times does the word "immediately" [or "straightway"] appear?

10. What nameless character mentioned only in Mark's Gospel, in connection with the arrest of Jesus, may have been Mark himself?

Honor roll and correct answers for Question List No. 10 (half-year contest, No. 1) will appear next week.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

NOT much has been said during recent weeks about the noon-hour prayer. The members of the Prayer League are urged to remember this time of prayer and so far as possible to observe it. If it is not possible to retire for devotions at this hour we may at least lift our hearts to God, wherever we may be, in earnest prayer for his blessing upon the other members of the League, that all their requests and desires may be granted, and for his blessing upon the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, for his people everywhere and for his work throughout the world. We will continue to pray for the speedy ending of the war which rages, and that God's will may be wrought out in the affairs of the world. During these Thanksgiving days we must not forget to praise him for the multitude of answered prayers and for his never-failing goodness.

The correspondence of the Prayer League is so much greater than can be accommodated in the space available in the weekly issues of the paper that for this issue many initials are omitted and instead the numbers given of those who request prayer for certain blessings. We hope our readers will understand the necessity for this and accept it graciously. They are all urged to repeat the requests already made at any later date if they have not already been granted, and earnest efforts will be made to find space for as many as possible.

"Words can never express our thankfulness to the Prayer League," writes Mrs. H. H. "Our prayers have most surely been answered. My husband has returned; all is well with us, and peace reigns." A South Carolina Mother thanks God that in answer to prayer two of her sons have been reclaimed; A New York Mother, that her son, for whom she asked prayers, has not taken liquor for a month; M. E. B., for conversion of her son and grandson.

Mrs. L. C. writes from Adare, Iowa: "I wrote some time ago asking prayers for a sick daughter. She was very ill with consumption. I want to confess to the Prayer League and the rest of the world that the Lord has heard our prayers and she is being restored to health, when the doctors had given up hope. A Reader from Trenton, N. J., writes: "Some time ago I asked prayer for my daughter. God answered better than I could ask or think." Mrs. A. A. S. writes: "I prayed earnestly for my only boy. He is converted. Praise the Lord!" I. H. N., Colorado, thanks God for answered prayer for the Billy Sunday evangelistic campaigns in Denver in which thousands were converted; Mrs. A. H. R., of Sebeka, Minn., acknowledges God's goodness in answering prayer for work; Mrs. B. S., Bingham, Me., for healing of nephew when doctors and nurses entertained no hope; Miss M. H., for healing from nervous trouble; J. W. L., San Rafael, Cal., for aversion of "a seemingly unpreventable calamity"; A. M. M., Pauling, N. Y., for restoration of daughter to health when physicians had given up hope.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from: Mrs. J. A., Arcata, Cal.; L. R. N., Memphis, Tenn.; Mrs. J. A. McC., Guelph, Ont.; Mrs. A. B., Tyrrell, Ohio; Mrs. D. W. D., Hanover, Ind. (that a brother-in-law and nephew have joined the church, also for other blessings); Mrs. E. M. C., Fairmount, W. Va. (that God has so wonderfully lifted a burden); S. L., Rockford, Ohio; E. F., Waco, Texas; Mrs. J. C. A., Cartersville, Va.; Mrs. C. S., Attica, Kansas; Mrs. I. R. J., New Cambria, Mo.; Mrs. J. W. M., Williamsport, Ind.; M. W., Annapolis, Ill.; Mrs. M. E. H., Richmond, Va.; Mrs. G. C. S., Dalton, Ohio; Mrs. L. L. S., Mahank, Texas; Mrs. E. K. L., Colorado City, Col.; L. L., Conewango Valley, N. Y.; Mrs. A. C. J., Richmond, Va. (for deliverance from great trouble); Mrs. H. J. S., Rochester, N. Y.; H. C. D., Pennsylvania (for wonderful deliverance from financial trouble); Mrs. G. W. E., Saratoga Springs, N. Y. (that her son has obtained a position and been very successful); H. L. R., Columbus, Ohio; Mrs. M. L., Union City, Ind. (for a spiritual blessing); A Reader, Sullivan, Ill.; Mrs. E. A. S., Patoka, Ill.; M. J. McK., Boise, Idaho; An Illinois Subscriber.

A sad letter comes from an aged woman, whose husband is a helpless invalid, asking prayer for relief from great mental distress, caused by severe nervous trouble; she also asks to be delivered from the tobacco habit. A Subscriber in Campbellton, N. B., asks prayer that a son who has gone to the European war may be brought back in safety and that he will place his implicit trust in his Saviour. A minister desires earnest prayer that he may have employment in the ministry soon. Mrs. G. W. S. (eighty-five years of age) that her sight may be strengthened; Miss M. L., for healing of two young friends who are blind; J. O., that a friend who was, she believes, treated unjustly in connection with some church work may be lifted above her disappointment. A good letter comes from Mrs. Sarah J. Johnson, of Roxbury, Mass., full of encouragement for the editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and urging prayer for the relief of the suffering widows and aged people of the warring nations of Europe, and for a speedy end of the war. A beautiful letter comes from H. P., Collins, N. D., thanking God for providing her with a quiet home and attractive garden and farm, where she is living in great peace, after suffering a severe affliction. She asks for enduement of the Holy Spirit that she may be made a blessing to the community. An Illinois Subscriber asks prayer that an operation may be successful and that she may live to care for her little child. C. H. W. asks prayer for special spiritual blessing. Mrs. T., that God will give wisdom and power that our government may devise laws to put down the high prices of food, thereby lessening the suffering among the poor, and for other reforms.

Prayers are asked for revivals at West Grove, Iowa; Trenton, N. J.; Davison, Mich.; Withee, Wis.; at two towns in Wyoming; How Cave, N. Y.; Bangor, Mich. (meetings under auspices of the United Brethren); Angelica, N. Y.; Jerroe, Texas; Esmont, Va.; Sylvester, Pa. (also for members of the Sunday school class); Mayo, Fla.; Clyde, N. C.; Oconee, Ill.; Lancaster, Pa.; Bearden, Tenn.; Chambersburg, Pa.; for blessing upon a church and Sabbath school at Greenwood, B. C.; for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Sebeka, Minn., and on a church at Chariton, Iowa, during special meetings; for members of a congregation and Sunday school at Nettly Lake, Man.; for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit in the churches of Petersburg, Pa.; for a revival at Vesta Avenue Church, Springfield, Mo.; for spiritual awakening in churches and community of McVeytown, Pa.; for outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pleasant Hill Church at Cowansville, Pa.; for conversion of the people of a settlement in Ontario; for God's blessing on a church in Greenup, Ill.; for blessing of the members of a church at Minaville, N. Y.; for spiritual upbuilding of another church. Three readers urge prayers for a turning to God in all our land, an outpouring of the Holy Spirit everywhere and the advancement of God's kingdom.

Thirty-four friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of mind for themselves or others.

Twenty-six friends ask prayer for restoration of sight, strengthening of sight, or prevention of blindness, for themselves or others.

THE STRENGTH OF THE HILLS

A TORTUOUS valley in the Breathitt Hills. The hills themselves, rising sheer and beautiful, fairy-like in the delicate dress of spring, rich and dark in the heavy verdure of summer, glorious in the gold and crimson of autumn, resplendent in the jewels of winter.

A western sky in the morning clad in the white mists, in the evening with the everchanging yet changeless glory of the sunset. Mild and gentle and life-giving, the light of the sun in the morning, fierce and angry at noonday, soft and gray at night when the sun is gone.

But mostly in the hearts of men, darkness.

A little mission has been built and over the stillness of the meadows rings out the vesper bell. The faithful teachers attend the midweek prayer meeting, but they go alone. No man joins them; they must not only go alone, but pray alone.

Five years later. The vesper bell has rung again. The evening service is over. The bright-eyed lad of sixteen, who has led the meeting, is talking with one of the teachers. For more than a year now the teachers have simply come to the midweek prayer meeting. It is always led by some native student; of late, no assistance has been given in the preparation of the program. The boy is saying, "I hope it will soon be my turn to lead again. I should not mind it if I had to lead every week, because I just love to do it." "Why, laddie," she answers, "if you like to do it so well as that, you will have to be a minister and have that for your life work."

"Who knows," the boy replies with flashing eyes, "but what I will?"

Another day and another boy. He speaks to his teacher in the schoolroom. The other pupils have all gone and they speak of the work he shall presently do in the world.

"I have not decided yet," said the young man; "I may go into business, I may farm, or I may preach; but whatever I choose, my life shall be the same."

"Do you mean," said the teacher—for she could speak the thoughts of his heart for him better than he could speak for himself—"do you mean that whatever you expect to do you will serve God in that thing—that in any event you are his man?

The boy squared his shoulders and lifted his head. "That is just what I mean," he said.

And still once more it is another. A youth, with patrician face and graceful build, is counting the cost of the life to which he has decided to give himself. He is not yet twenty, but not as the life of others has his life been. Through sorrow and pain and affliction he has walked. The Holy Spirit has led him through a most vibrant Christian experience. Deep down in his heart he has heard the voice of God saying: "I want you for my ministry. Will you serve me so?"

Together they make an inventory of his attainments and of what lies between him and ordination. They count off some eight study and endeavor years, in which he must not only study, but trust that the means of continuing this study will come from the hand of God. Yet he falters not.

"When the Son of man comes shall he find faith on earth?"

Wearied, the teacher leaves her typewriter and walks out on the porch of the dormitory. A boy is bent over a tablet, a boy still in short trousers. "What are you writing?" she asks. A flush mantles his features. "I am to lead the prayer meeting tomorrow night, and I think when we boys conduct the meetings, we ought to lead in prayer ourselves and not call on one of the teachers. But I am afraid I will be confused, so I thought I would write out a prayer and learn it by heart"—handing her the tablet. Written in a boyish hand, she read:

"Our Father, who art in heaven, wilt thou look down upon us tonight in the spirit of kindness? Help us to realize that without thee we are nothing, that without thee we are lost. Help us, O God, when we are tempted, and when we fall, wilt thou pick us up, and when we fail to ask thee, fail not thou to bless us as thou seest best? Go with us tonight and help us in tomorrow's work. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen."

No family altar ever sent up its incense from the home of any of these boys. Two of them are the only professing Christians in their homes; another, the only one in his community. They have hereditary traits of temper, the feudist spirit and the constant temptation to drink, to overcome. One, possibly two, may receive encouragement from home. The others will have mostly persecution for their portion.

The mountains are at one and the same time the most fascinating and fruitful, the bitterest and most disheartening mission field in the world. He who labors in their fastnesses must be firm of soul and full of faith. There are many hours of deepening darkness; but the black clouds are cleft by dazzling rifts. Often I am prostrate with discouragement; but in the illumination of such parted clouds I see such triumphs as are described in the above incidents, and I cry out from the depths of my soul, "Faint not, for the strength of the hills is His!"

Principal, Highland College, Guerrant, Kentucky.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

Ten friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or friends.

Forty-six friends ask prayer that sons, husbands or other relatives or friends be saved from the drink habit, including a mother, for three sons; another mother, for three sons; prayer that a father, who has deserted his wife and children, may give up the drink habit and return to his brokenhearted family; that a brother may give up drink and return home; that a son may be kept from the curse of drink, return home and be saved. Many of these letters also include definite requests for the conversion of their tempted friends.

Three friends ask that relatives or friends be cured of drug habits.

Fifty-eight friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives or friends—one for a relative who is in the clutches of sin and another relative who is not only in the clutches of sin but of the law as well.

Thirty-six friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons, four asking prayer for conversion of three sons each, one that her son may be converted and return home, several that sons' wives also be converted.

Twenty-seven wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Eighty-one friends ask prayer for the fulfilling of varied desires and needs, including "Constant Reader," that an estrangement between family and himself be removed; a wife to be reconciled to her husband; a mother that daughter and husband may be reconciled; Mrs. R. S. M., that a burden may be lifted and despondency removed: Miss M. B., that a great sorrow be removed; Mrs. J. W. F., that husband who left home in demented state November 15, 1913, may return.

"—but sore throat is only the beginning!"

AND when your throat or the throats of any of the children begin to get "sore," you cannot be too careful. For as your physician will tell you, sore throat is often only the beginning—the wedge that opens the way for tonsilitis and more serious ailments, and he may advise Formamint, the pleasant, harmless tablet which so thoroughly disinfects the throat, thereby checking infection.

But better still, you may wisely forestall sore throat altogether—keep the throat cleanly and reasonably free from irritating germs—care for it regularly just as you care for your teeth.

And this throat hygiene is so easily accomplished with Formamint. As you suck the tablet it sets free a germicide in the saliva, killing germs—even those in the uttermost recesses of the throat—and soothing away the inflammation.

Keep Formamint handy—take it yourself and make the little ones use the delicious tablets regularly whenever they are exposed to infection. It is so much more pleasant—and effective—than a gargle, both as a relief for sore throat and as a regular means of protecting the throat. Endorsed by over 10,000 doctors, too. At all druggists.

CARRYING RELIEF TO BELGIUM

BY THEODORE WATERS

In Charge of Our Relief Work in Belgium

I ARRIVED in London during the evening of Guy Fawkes Day, November 5, which holiday is given up to much rejoicing because said Fawkes failed to blow up Parliament some centuries ago. In other years the streets have blazed with bonfires and the electric lights have made the Strand, Piccadilly Circus, Leicester Square and other frequented spots as light as day. But on this November 5 there were no bonfires, the blazing signs were out, and even the globes of the arc lights were painted black on the upper half, so that the light might shine down upon the walks but not up in the air. For the fear of the Zeppelin is in the land and every precaution has been taken to discount its coming.

Across the sky at intervals swept the shafts of powerful searchlights and these are said to be followed in every direction by powerful guns, so that any Zeppelin that might happen to stray over London would get a warm reception. I fancied one running out of petrol and settling down slowly into Leicester Square. But I would hate to contemplate what would happen in that event to the aviators. The war spirit is rampant in London and everybody would demand a souvenir.

One sees soldiers everywhere, in the big and little hotels, on the streets, in the restaurants—Tommy Atkins is omnipresent. He is the hero of the day and it is a poor family of whatever degree that cannot exhibit a member in khaki or in kilt. Up and down the streets march the recruiting squads in service uniforms, and following in line tramp young men—some of whom look to be mere boys—who have succumbed to the urgent call for troops.

On the way to consult with American Ambassador Page I drove past Hyde Park, and where fashion was wont to loll in its limousine, horses and army wagons now drive slowly along, and on the lawns recruits are being drilled in large squads for service. In one place they were drilling hospital squads—teaching men how to lift wounded or dying comrades onto stretchers and carry them to the ambulances.

Signs urging men to enlist are plastered wherever it has been possible to place them: on dead walls, on the fronts of taxicabs, on the sides of wagons, on omnibuses. They are all to the point: "We want more men"; "Fall in"; "Enlist"; "100,000 men required for the war"; "England expects every man to do his duty"; "Enlistment for war only"; "Join the army now."

As I write this it is Lord Mayor's Day and in the street below a wonderful procession is passing. But it is significant that where in former years the Lord Mayor's show was a pageant, often representing centuries of achievement, today it is strictly a military turnout that evokes deafening cheers of enthusiasm from the people on the sidewalk. Still more wonderful to relate, the band that is passing is playing "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean." Maybe they have different words for it over here, but to me it is simply "Three Cheers for the Red, White and Blue"; and the little star-spangled banner which I carry in my buttonhole looks very dear to me indeed. Also in the emotion inspired by the old-time tune I can somewhat appreciate the cheers that greet the intrepid attitude of the "London Scottish" as they march by to the screech of the piper, and of the New Zealanders in their slouch hats, and now, loudest cheering of all, the Canadians. The Canadians are very popular here. They are encamped far out of London, but a big detachment takes part in this parade and, after all, I must confess that my heart warms to them—they are American.

Now on the sidewalk the people are massed twenty deep, and I am sure that in spite of their enthusiasm very few of them can see aught beyond a small forest of bayonets waving by. The people do not seem to realize the sinister aspect of this. They are caught by that psychological something that makes a crowd a big animal with emotions different from those of the individuals who compose it. Yet to me the bayonets and the hospital wagons that follow inspire a picture of those fine fellows lying one day prostrate in the trenches and harking back while they await the expected bullet to the cheering thousands of Lord Mayor's Day, to the loved ones at home, and those loved ones themselves living in daily dread of the fatal news that may tell them they have joined the ranks of the widow and the orphan, and that they will never see their soldier boys again.

I told Ambassador Page of the work the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family is doing; how our people are raising large sums for the Widows and Orphans of the European War; and his reply was appreciative.

"Well," he said, "that is just like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Still doing big things in a big way. But the amounts need to be big. I am credibly informed that over $30,000,000 worth of supplies will be needed to feed the stricken Belgians over the winter. Send your help in the form of food. Buy food and take it to them. Go see Dr. Henry Van Dyke, the American minister in The Hague, and Brand Whitlock, our minister in Brussels. They will give you much useful advice. The Belgian refugees in England are being taken care of. It is in Belgium that the need is greatest. Belgium and Servia. Servia is cut off, you know, and our people do not know how much she is suffering.

"And see the American Commission," he added, "which has just been formed to expedite the transportation of foodstuffs into Belgium. They will tell you how to get your food into the country."

He said much more of a kindly nature; how glad he was to see some one from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on such a mission, and he promised to help

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE spectacular event of the week has been the disaster to the British battleship Bulwark, the cause of which is at this writing enveloped in mystery.

The Bulwark was an old battleship of the pre-dreadnought class, built in 1902, of about 15,000 tons displacement, armored 9-inch belt and 12-inch guns, of 18 knots speed, and with four 12-inch and twelve 6-inch guns. Her loss is of little moment as regards the vessel, but as regards the nearly eight hundred men who perished with her is of the highest importance. Only fourteen men were saved. The scene of the disaster was the Medway near Sheerness, on the estuary of the Thames, where the river and sea meet.

As has been said, the cause is a mystery. The various accounts do not agree in details, and but little can be deduced from them. The official explanation is that an explosion took place in the magazine of the ship herself, unaided by any outside cause; she is said to have been loading ammunition at the time. There are some details, however, such as the time of day, the crew's being at breakfast, etc., etc., which would seem to cast doubt on this explanation. Until all the facts are substantiated and settled, it is idle to conjecture as to what really happened; possibly this will remain a mystery for all time, like the disasters to the Maine, the Jena, the République and other ships, not to mention the Audacious.

During the week the British fleet successfully bombarded the town of Zeebrugge on the Belgian coast. This town the Germans, since its capture, had attempted to make a base for a submarine fleet, which, it is said, was intended for operations against the British coast, and had brought submarines in sections thither by rail. When the bombardment took place they were engaged in putting the submarines together. According to accounts these partially completed vessels were destroyed and the town and its piers and docks pretty well ruined.

An allied fleet of aeroplanes made a daring attack on the German Zeppelin factory on Lake Constance at the beginning of the week. Considerable damage was done both to the factory and to the Zeppelins in course of construction, but all of the attacking aviators retired successfully, excepting one Englishman, whose machine was so badly damaged he was forced to alight and was captured.

Sufficient data have reached us during the week from various quarters of a generally reliable character to enable us to estimate with some degree of certainty the loss of the various combatants since the beginning of the war, though of course any estimate of this character cannot necessarily be more than an approximation. On November 15, then, the losses were about as follows: British, 68,000; Belgians, 75,000; French, 600,000; Germans, 945,000; Austrians, 360.000; Russians, 630,000; Servians, 45,000; Montenegrins, 7,000; Turks, 4,000; total, 2,734,000. If we include the naval losses it would add something like 10,000 more to the number.

Of course, all these are not permanent losses. About 750,000 are prisoners of war or interned in neutral countries. Computing by the usual method, the number killed outright or who have since died of wounds would be in the neighborhood of 375,000, and of the balance 1,600,000 (more than two-thirds) have probably rejoined their commands, or will very shortly do so.

Still, the dead in the first four and a half months of the war exceed in number the entire population of such well-known cities as Milwaukee, Cincinnati, New Orleans or Washington, or any city in Canada except Montreal. This comparison may bring home to my readers the terrific waste of lives to date.

BIG MILITARY CAMP AT YPRES, FRENCH INFANTRY AND RESERVISTS

TURKISH ARMED MILITARY BAND LEADING TROOPS

The Boer rebellion in South Africa may apparently be dismissed from further consideration. All the reliable news which reaches us indicates that the rebellious commandos have been broken up, many of their members captured or killed, and the remainder dispersed, while the two chiefs of the rebellion, Generals de Wet and Beyers are said to be in hiding. It would have been strange if this result had not been attained, in view of the generous treatment which has been given the Boers by Great Britain since the war.

In the Russo-Turkish campaign there is very little to chronicle. Various skirmishes have taken place between the two adversaries which the sensational press has dignified by the name of battles. The campaign seems to be moving on two lines—a Turkish attack on Batum with the idea of cutting off the Russian oil supply, and a Russian advance into Asia Minor. Neither of these seem to be making progress.

Skirmishes between the Turks and the British have taken place at various points near the Suez Canal, on the Persian Gulf, and toward the frontier of Egypt; but these are both inconsequential and non-sequential. The official proclamation of the Holy War was issued on November 27. The Sultan, the Sheik-ul-Islam and some twenty-eight dignitaries of the Moslem Church signed that document, which calls on all true believers throughout the Moslem world to make war on Great Britain, Russia and France. This official proclamation was delayed until the Sheik-ul-Islam reached Mecca and prayed at the tomb of the Prophet, and as on a mission of this character the Sheik cannot avail himself of the railroad, but must travel on the holy camel, a delay necessarily ensued.

That this proclamation will have some effect in Egypt, particularly in view of the attitude of the Khedive, is very probable, but how great the effect may be is doubtful. Great Britain has deposed the present Khedive and nominated another in his stead, a grandson of a former Khedive.

Outside of Egypt, the effect of this proclamation is also doubtful. In India it will probably fall flat. In Algeria and Tunis it may cause some trouble, as in parts of Persia. In Afghanistan the trouble will be real, and in a few weeks we shall probably hear of Afghan attacks on Russia, Turkestan and northwest India. The Afghans are a race of fanatics and unfortunately good fighters, so that their attitude is of some importance.

The principal South American countries have formed an alliance, using the word loosely, to endeavor to prevent further sea combats on their coasts, and also to try to open the steamer routes between South America and the United States, which have been closed of late chiefly on account of the activities of the German cruiser Karlsruhe. The idea is to have these waters declared neutral, and to forbid either fighting or the capture of merchant vessels therein. The plan hardly seems feasible in practice.

The Austrian campaign against Servia seems to be progressing favorably for the Austrian arms. Practically the whole of northwest Servia has been overrun by the Austrians and the Servians driven out of their positions with rather heavy losses. Belgrade, the capital, is seriously threatened, and according to London advices there does not seem to be much doubt that Servia, owing to the impossibility of aid from the Triple Entente reaching her, will be overwhelmed in the course of the next two or three months. None of the other Balkan States manifest any desire or intention of coming to Servia's support.

Portugal has finally made up her mind to enter the war on the side of the Allies, a vote to this effect having been made in the Portuguese Cortes during the week, and partial mobilization of her troops with that end in view has been ordered. This will hardly be of any very great importance, as at the most it will only bring some 30,000 troops of rather doubtful value to the battle line of the Allies.

The gossip about Japan's sending troops to Europe still continues. In fact, at one time these troops were announced to be on the way, though this report was afterwards denied. The spring, perhaps, will see Japanese troops in the battle line on the historic fields of Europe.

The Belgian situation to all intents and purposes remains unchanged, except that the need of outside help grows greater as the pinch of winter tightens on these unfortunate people. It is estimated that it will need one cargo of food per day to feed those who stand in absolute need of food in that devastated land. The British Government has given £100,000 to aid in this work, which does not seem enormous in view of the tremendous sacrifices Belgium has made for the benefit of France and Great Britain.

The British war loan, the largest loan ever offered for subscription, was successfully floated during the week, and will provide Great Britain with all the money needed for the prosecution of the war until the end of next July. Austria was also successful with her loan, and Germany has announced a new loan to be issued about Christmas. These loans run up into such figures as to be almost staggering.

There has been a little talk of peace overtures during the week by Germany, but an official statement has put an end to them. Germany states that she has no intention of making peace until she has achieved the object of the war, that is, freeing herself of the continual menace of France and Russia on the south and north, and thus insuring the permanent safety of her population.

The battle on the Franco-Belgian line has been much less fierce this past week. The weather has continued so bad that sustained movements have been impossible, and both sides have contented themselves largely with holding the positions already retained. The sufferings of the men in the trenches are said to be acute, and as the winter takes firmer hold will grow more intense. Both sides are suffering considerably from sickness, and as before remarked, this particularly applies to the East Indian troops which Great Britain has brought forward.

The sum of the fighting reduces itself to isolated artillery duels from time to time, without supporting infantry attacks, amounting, therefore, to merely feeling out the enemy.

Some fairly severe skirmishes have taken place on the Verdun-Toul line which have been fruitless in results. In the Vosges Mountains and towards Alsace fighting has been completely suspended owing to a blizzard's raging among the hills, two feet of snow having fallen in some parts, it is said. Both the Allies and the Germans have been reinforcing heavily; in fact, the Germans are said to be organizing a fresh army with a view, as soon as the weather improves, to resuming their atack on the western end of the line, with the object of breaking through the Allies' line to Calais and Boulogne.

Whether the objective of this movement is really Calais and Boulogne, I have always doubted. These two towns have a sentimental attraction, but I question whether the possession of Amiens would not be of greater practical advantage. This town controls the railroad communication between Paris and the coast, that is, with England, which would seem to be of paramount importance, and I should not be at all surprised if this place were the real objective.

The French Government has evidently reconsidered its determination to move the capital back from Bordeaux to Paris, which was announced for November 20. This is perhaps prudent, with the German lines not over fifty miles from Paris.

The situation in the campaign in Poland this last week has been an unending puzzle. Berlin sent out an official bulletin on Wednesday claiming a victory over the first, second and fifth Russian armies in Central Poland near Lodz, in which the German forces took 40,000 prisoners and a large quantity of munitions of war of various kinds; and the same day Vienna claimed to have defeated the Russians near Pellica, in South Poland, with a Russian loss of 29,000.

On Thursday Lord Kitchener announced in the House of Commons a Russian victory, with the heaviest losses the Germans had suffered so far during the war. Unofficial rumors from Petrograd confirm this, stating with some detail that in the fight near Lodz, an entire German army corps was cut off and forced to surrender, and that another was surrounded and could not escape.

At this writing there is absolutely no confirmation of this report, and the Petrograd official bulletin, usually so exuberant, is comparatively mild in its claims, merely asserting a check and also stating that the battle continues.

Under these circumstances it becomes a very hard matter to comment with any degree of certainty, so I shall content myself with saying that a very important battle is now going on in Central Poland, and that at this moment there is no certain result.

BELGIAN KING SALUTING PASSING FRENCH TROOPS

DENOMINATIONAL NOTES OF INTEREST FROM THE FIELD

—As to the future effect of the European War on missions, Dr. Snell, secretary of the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, says that from every field comes reassuring news that people, as never before, are turning to the work of God. Thousands heretofore indifferent are beseeching pastors and missionaries for prayers and protection. Many are asking for Bibles. There are nearly as many Baptists in Europe as in all the non-Christian lands combined, the latest record giving 1,215 churches, 2,483 preachers and 139,270 members with, perhaps, twice as many adherents and sympathizers. More than 275,000 converts have been baptized since the society began work in Europe. More than one-half of the membership is in warring countries.

—The long-continued rains of this fall are said by old Chinese to have been the heaviest and most disastrous for many years. They came at an unexpected time, when the skies are usually clear and there is ample time for harvesting the fall crops. In fact, there was not a single night when the harvest moon could be seen. The damage to crops and other property was very heavy. Many are left without food for the winter, and hundreds of families are without homes. Nearly all of the large village of Ping Li Tian was destroyed by floods from the river which passes near by. Less than one-third of the buildings are standing. Most of the people depended on their business for a living and are unable to rebuild. Women and children can be seen dwelling under small mat sheds and sleeping on the straw roofs of the fallen houses. The two adjoining villages, not so large as Ping Li Tian, are completely demolished. The greatest damage from floods in this part of the province is between the Sin and Hwai Rivers. The rains fell almost continuously for fourteen days, and the two rivers flooded all the territory between and for miles on each side. To make matters worse a heavy, steady north wind blew in a high tide from the sea, and this made the water rise higher than it otherwise would have done. The fall crops of the regions visited were entirely destroyed. One village, known as Siaokioantao, was completely destroyed. Not one house is left standing. Of the eighty families living there, numbering about 500 people, all were drowned except sixteen.—Charles A. Leonard, Laichowfu, Shantung Province, China.

—The second week in November was one of the most remarkable in the history of Methodism in our country, particularly New England. It brought together in Boston a most distinguished gathering of Methodist men. It was distinctively a gathering of men. Their purpose was to advance in various ways the cause of the church to which they belong. Nearly twenty of the bishops of the church were present, in addition to nearly three thousand men delegates. Bishop John W. Hamilton was honorary president of the convention. The meetings were most varied, the program being based on a careful study of the state of religion in New England as affected by social, industrial, immigrant, educational, missionary and general conditions. Some of the subjects discussed were "A Saloonless America in 1920," "The Uplift of a Race," "The Capture and Training of Youth." Representatives of other denominations gave addresses, Dr. O. P. Gifford representing the Baptists, Rev. H. A. Bridgman, editor of the Congregationalist, representing his denomination, while Bishop Lawrence spoke for the Episcopalians. A most interesting meeting was held on Boston's famous old common on the site of the tree known as Jesse Lee Elm, because it was here that he preached 124 years ago, when New England was not eager to give ready ear to the champions of Methodism. Boston's great Tremont Temple was crowded to the doors for the closing meeting. Bishop Henderson of Tennessee asked the great company of delegates present to stand and volunteer for personal evangelistic service in their various churches and communities. Nearly every man stood. The convention pledged itself to the hearty support of the campaign to raise a fund of $5,000,000 for conference claimants. Resolutions were adopted, deploring the increasing tendency to a general profanation of the Sabbath. One resolution read in part: "We heartily approve and will zealously protect our public schools from any weakening force from within and without." Back of all that was said and done was the high purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Methodist Church as a religious organization and a great community force.—J. L. H.

THINGS THAT CANNOT BE SHAKEN

A SERMON BY REV. ALBERT PARKER FITCH, D.D.[*]

"I shake not the earth only, but also heaven . . . that those things which cannot be shaken may remain." Heb. 12: 26, 27.

IT WAS Lessing who said that the object of all education is to make men see things that are large as large and things that are small as small. But there are other forces in the world, besides that of education, which also restore to mankind a just sense of values. Such a force, lurid, spectacular, ruthless and sinister beyond words, is this recrudescence of the pagan and brutal passions of the race before which the civilization of Europe has succumbed. The arts of peace, the ways of industry and commerce, the insecure ethical idealism, the phrases of religion, the houses of learning, the homes of faith, the young men, the begetters of a coming generation, all are being laid low. Such a breakdown of civilization as we are now witnessing challenges anew the ideals and convictions of men and compels a reappraisement of all human values.

We listen to the naïve and ridiculous polytheism of world rulers; we see the glorification of force, the lust for plunder, the fierce joy in destruction, the exploitation and torture of the body. All the ancient evils which we thought we had outgrown are being set up again. Over against the attempted idealizing of our origin and destiny rise once more the eternal skeptical queries as to the practicability of the Christian ethic, the value or the significance of a human being. Both the earth, which men have toilsomely fashioned for themselves, and the heaven, which by the sweat of their minds and spirits they have conceived and projected, are being shaken today. And surely at the beginning of another fall and winter, ushered in at such a time as this, there is a solemn urgency in our asking: is there anything which, since it cannot be shaken, shall remain?

A Renewing Needed

AND the moment that question is fairly propounded, we at once perceive that there are certain fundamental truths, easily obscured in a practical and prosperous age, which are today receiving new and terrible confirmations. For one thing it is being made unmistakably clear to us that, whether or not those expressions of the religion of Jesus to which our Western world has now for two thousand years been accustomed are either potent or practical, yet the redemption and the renewing of the world to which that religion bears witness are most awfully needed. The situation of our world today is the most awful indictment of Christendom that history has ever seen. It is also the most tragic revelation of Christendom's need of Christianity. No ardent but superficial humanism, no monistic philosophy, no mystic and idealizing cults can disguise today the fact that we live in a tragic world of warring forces, mutually irreconcilable passions, reckless and conscienceless tendencies and ideals. How futile to deny now that human life is full of irremediable sorrow, intolerable injustice, deliberate and brazen sin! The beautiful and the noble are being cut off in their prime, the defective and the useless will live on to cumber the earth in their old age. Over all the plains of Europe now children are suffering, women weeping, and the smoke of the sacrifice of innocence is going up. More significant yet, great principles and ideals of the sacredness of personality, the right of freedom, brotherhood, and progress are being ground into the dust.

Errors That Stand Revealed

WHO can fail to see today the measureless woe of the world, its inscrutable injustices, its unmerited sorrows, its stubborn wrongs? Who would now deny the need of the race, unchanging and profound, for spiritual renewing and victorious moral regeneration? Two thousand years have not sufficed to educate Europe out of her follies. What our so-called Christian world still needs is to be redeemed out of its sins. We face a frankly brutal, quite ruthless civilization where, not merely in the military world, but in the social and industrial order as well, might is right and restraint means hindrance, and humane and ethical considerations are to be abandoned, and we are to give rein to impulse and desire. Moving over the face of this materialistic and imperial civilization is the spirit of Jesus, and on the whole he is making it kinder and more decent with each succeeding generation. But the first great shock which has come to us, who have hitherto accepted Christianity as a matter of course and have regarded it as being widely and actively operative in modern society, is to find out how little of it at any time has been in the world and how comparatively little there is now. The world doesn't believe in it, but the world needs it, and it is clear enough today that the office of religion has not been superseded. That office is not primarily to ease the exterior life of man, to better his environment and enlarge his temporal opportunities. It is to redeem his soul, cleanse his motives, renew his power to do right, satisfy if it may be the desperate spiritual tragedy, the moral anarchy of this mortal world.

Again the shaking of our world today is revealing that this need can never be met by the mere expansion of knowledge, an increased intellectualism. It did not need a European war to teach us that, but the conflict adds dreadful confirmation to the lesson and gives it a ghastly illustration. The last half of the nineteenth century made it terribly clear that the learning and science of mankind, where they are divorced from piety, unconsecrated by a spiritual passion, and largely directed by selfish motives, can neither emancipate nor redeem the race. Consider for a moment the enormous expansion of knowledge which the world has witnessed since the year 1859. What prodigious accessions to the sum of our common understanding have we seen in the natural and the humane sciences; and what marvelous uses of scientific knowledge for practical purposes have we discovered! We have mastered in these latter days a thousand secrets of nature. We have freed the mind from old ignorances and ancient superstitions. We have penetrated the secrets of the body, and can almost conquer death and indefinitely prolong the span of human days. We face the facts and know the world as our fathers could never do. We understand the past and foresee the future.

But the significant thing about our situation is this: How little has this wisdom, in and of itself, done for us! It has made men more cunning, rather than more noble. Still the body is ravaged and consumed by passion. Still men toil for others against their will and "the strong spill the blood of the weak for their ambition and the sweat of the children for their greed." Our torn and shaken twentieth century needs, in order to make life tolerable, just what the first century needed—the sacrifice of love, the devotion of the spirit, the redemption of the will, the humbling of the soul before its God.

Has Christianity Failed?

AND again, we are being solemnly reminded today that the other-worldliness of religion, its concern with future, super-temporal things is its characteristic and most precious contribution to the world. We are seeing today how every great human problem, social, economic, ethical, when pressed to its ultimate issue becomes theological. Ours is an age devoted to the practical, the obvious and efficient things of life. The passion for immediacy, and the glorification of the present, rules in the modern world. And we have been asking of the church that remedial and preventive service here and now should chiefly occupy her. We have wearied of severe thinking on eternal, speculative themes. To produce clean and amiable living, to make this present world to blossom, to idealize time, this we have almost accepted as our office.

And then there has suddenly come upon us all one of those irrevocable and irremediable disasters for which time has no word of hope, for which it can offer not the slightest compensation. All our temporal and mortal values have suddenly been wiped out. We see the whole fabric of a civilization dissolved. Something more than temporal salvation and human words of hope are needed here. What have they to say and do for the soldiers lying in the quicklime of the burial trenches? Is there anything in this world sufficient now for English and French, Belgian and German widows and orphans? for the cripples returning with helpless bodies to their devastated fields? Nay, if the church has only moralizings and hospitals and reliefs and charities and pleasant social activities; if she has only amiable and futile machinery for cleaning, decorating and gilding the physical frame of the human spirit, then she stands revealed as the colossal failure and the supreme imposture of the generations. What Europe wants to know now is why and for what purpose this holocaust. Is there anything beyond, was there anything before? If in this world only, cries the voice of Europe, we have hope, then we are of all men the most miserable! Today we are being shaken and tested indeed to see if we have any message of faith, any vision of eternal, super-temporal realities for the spirit. Indeed, men have never been content to receive from us merely plain and sensible counsel on practical and homely affairs; they have demanded of a church that it lead them into the mysteries of divine and human nature and offer prophetic counsel and spiritual consolation.

The Church That Shall Remain

I TURN, then, to you, whose renewed activity as a church begins again next week for the winter. May you remember that these are solemn and testing hours. Who knows but that you may have come to the kingdom for such a day as this? Now are the times to make men see how glorious and transcendent a thing religion is. How infinitely greater it is than any of its social or personal manifestations! Never again confound religion with mere amiable living or mechanical believing. Never think of it as being concerned only, or chiefly, with the issues of this present life. Religion maintains itself in perennial power because men have never been willing to believe that they belonged only to this present life, and have never been able to satisfy themselves with anything or everything which this life has to give. For always, when men have looked abroad upon their world, they have seen the inextricable mingling of good and evil, the mystery of its strife and pain and injustice. And always, when they have looked within, upon themselves, they have faced the inexpressible sorrow, shame and loneliness of human life. Thereby they have been forced to concern themselves with the solemn questions which have to do with the origin and the meaning and the destiny of the race. Where did we all come from? Did we come from anything? What are we here for? Where are we all going? Is there anything after this life which can possibly compensate for it? If a man die, shall he live again?

It is the office of the church to answer these questions. To be able to say: We know from whence we came. We came out from an eternal life, a loving and a gracious spirit. And we know where we are going. We shall return to that from which in the beginning we came. In God we live and move and have our being. In God we now exist and shall exist forever and ever. He is our refuge, underneath are the everlasting arms.

And so I close this sermon with a plea for your renewed, inward and spiritual loyalty to this part of the Church of Jesus Christ in the present world. That church was never more needed, nor ever had a larger and more difficult opportunity than now. Let us acknowledge with sincerity and shame her many and obvious defects. For long she conceived of herself as an ark of salvation to which the elect withdrew from a perishing and somewhat contemptible world. Sometimes she has lived off the community, rather than for it; and has been more concerned with the conserving of her prestige and the perpetuation of her organization than with the service of her day and generation. To the social and industrial strife of the moment she was not over-ready to apply the teaching of Jesus, nor, as she contemplated the comfortable, bourgeois aristocracy which filled her pews, was she eager to socialize her ethics. But also now let us boldly reaffirm that today, as in every day, she is doing patiently and steadfastly the indispensable work of the community. She is bringing to the modern state what no other organization can bring—its spiritual dynamic, its renewed motives, that vision which is the hope of the soul in its struggle against time—the vision of a purified and glorified humanity made one with itself in God. Down through the centuries for all her pride of place and lust for power, for all her follies and mistakes, the church alone has been able, in dark days like these, to say to men: You, too, our very human race, shall sometime see of the travail of its soul and be satisfied. Let us then stand by her, as she has ever stood by our fathers and by us!

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, December 13. John 8: 24. "I said therefore unto you, that ye shall die in your sins: for if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." The chasm which separates the Lord from his hearers might have been bridged over for them, if they had accepted the Lord's statements concerning his personality. "Believe that I am," says Christ, "and all that divides us will vanish." Am what? Why, all he has declared himself to be. The faith which wipes out the distance at which natural man stands from God is faith in Jesus. Faith that accepts Jesus as the great reality in the life of the human race, and that values him in full accord with every fact he has stated concerning himself, finds that Jesus is the Son of God, the living water, the true bread, the light of the world. Such faith takes man out of the state of death into which he has sunk by reason of sin, being spiritually dead to all that is divine. It starts with the confident acceptance that a person's sin has been removed by Jesus, that the gulf between him and God has been filled, that the door to the Father's house has been thrown open to the prodigal. And this faith contains, in the form of glorious promises, the germ of the life eternal. It has overcome spiritual death, and it will conquer physical dying when the hour comes. It forges ahead, stimulated by the victorious hope of Christians, to the deathless life beyond. But where such faith is refused, there remains the gloom of the old, unregenerate condition; the burden of sin remains on the conscience; the soul remains dead in trespasses, and the person ultimately dies in his sins.

MONDAY, December 14. John 8: 25, 26. "Even the same that I said unto you from the beginning. I have many things to say and to judge of you: but he that sent me is true; and I speak to the world those things which I have heard of him." Our Lord's appeal: "Believe that I am," drew from his hearers the sarcastic question: "Who art thou?" As if he had never before given them a clear statement about himself, they sneeringly ask to be told in plain terms what unfathomable mystery there might lie hidden in his personality. This explains our Lord's reply, which is really a stern refusal to repeat what he had said so often. He has nothing new to communicate to them. He has told them from the beginning who he is, and many have without difficulty grasped his meaning. He will say nothing more to them about himself, but he has still something to say about them which he dare not withhold, no matter how distasteful his words may prove. These words foreshadow the terrible indictment of the malicious character of the Jews' opposition to him, which the Lord is about to utter. The judgment which he will pass on them has its origin with the Father, who sent him upon his mission of mercy to these people. He meets with no surprise in noticing their extreme hostility. Undismayed by their cavil and sarcasm, he will speak the truth to the end, and by revealing the real character of his enemies, will arm his church for all time to come for the conflict that is still being waged against his divine Sonship and his redeeming work. These conversations, which our Lord during the last months of his life on earth conducted with his enemies, are an arsenal from which the believers of our own time are supplied with trusty weapons in the war with those who still deny the divine and the redeeming Christ.

TUESDAY, December 15. John 8: 28. "When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things." Up to this point of the conversation Jesus had referred to the Father by the phrase "he that sent me." John tells us that the hearers of our Lord had not understood his reference. Their hostility to Jesus was so passionate and the excitement of these moments so intense that they missed the plain meaning of statements which they had understood on other occasions. The Lord now uses the name "Father" in speaking of God, but he refers to himself by the term "Son of man." Even in his assumed humanity he claims that close relation to God which exists between father and son. And he now indicates the last decisive evidence that will be afforded his present hearers to establish his claim: he will be "lifted up," first, to the cross of shame, after that, to the throne of glory. The wonderful events of his death, resurrection and ascension will effect a mighty reversal of men's opinions concerning him. In this very city where he is now speaking to men who spurn his claims with every mark of contempt, there will be thousands who will declare: "Verily, he is what he said he was." They may for a season decline his heavenly ambassadorship of love, but they will not be able to suppress the fact of his ambassadorship. The cross and the crown at the end of his career will prove that "he did nothing of himself, but even as the Father taught him, those things he spoke." Jesus the Messiah reigns today, and all the world is again preparing to celebrate with rejoicing his coming into the world, to seek and save that which is lost.

WEDNESDAY, December 16. John 8: 29. "And he that sent me is with me: the Father hath not left me alone; for I do always those things that please him." To earth-bound minds like those of his present hearers the exalted remarks of our Lord must have sounded like the voice of a very distant speaker. Their frequent interruptions seem like the angry growls of a drowsy person who does not want to be roused. "Where is your Father?" they had asked him. "How many miles from here does he live?" Jesus tells them: "He is right here. His interest in my work is so great, so intense, so uninterrupted, that there is not a minute since my coming among you that the Father has not been with me. His mighty presence has borne me up through all the strife and worry of my ministry, and he has been the joy and comfort of my quiet hours. He has been a delighted witness of all my doings. My life hitherto has been spent in pleasing him, and he has not failed to corroborate my messages by signs and wonders of such magnitude and multitudes as have never been seen before." It has been correctly said that "this self-consciousness of Christ is one of the loftiest and most unique phenomena recorded in history. This absolute confidence with reference to his whole course lifts our Lord to a pinnacle of the loftiest elevation." Let us remember that he taught us to say: "Our Father who art in heaven." The believer in Christ who in his humble way seeks to do always the things that are pleasing to God enjoys in a lesser degree, nevertheless in a very real manner, the presence of the Father with him in all his earthly activities. For the sake of his beloved Son the Father graciously is with us, strengthening us for every task and comforting us in every sorrow.

THURSDAY, December 17. John 8: 31, 32. "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Once more the scene has changed: Jews "who had believed in Christ" are now engaged in a conversation with him that ends quite sadly. These persons had accepted Christ as the Messiah, however, for the most part upon their own premises. The nation needed a deliverer; Christ answered the requirements more nearly than any one they knew; so they had begun to believe in him, and were now awaiting some great manifestation from him that would show they were not mistaken. Our Lord's remarks to these persons indicate that their discipleship was not genuine. Its true and indubitable mark was still missing: they had come in contact with his teaching, but they had not made his word their home and dwelling-place. The words and teaching of others still had considerable weight with them. These foreign elements in their knowledge hindered them from knowing the whole truth and made them slaves to other men. Christ cannot do his whole work for any person until that person moves over entirely to the territory of Christ's teaching, and accepts that teaching on any matter as final. Christ's is the last word on all questions relating to sin, the removal of sin, the old life, the new life, and the life everlasting. All information on these matters derived from other sources does not enrich our knowledge, but keep true knowledge out and, instead of giving us greater freedom of thought and action, creates an intellectual and spiritual bondage for us. It is either Christ altogether and forever, or no Christ at all.

FRIDAY, December 18. John 8: 34. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin." The "believing" Jews had repelled the charge implied in our Lord's remarks, viz., that they were not free. They claimed that they were free-born descendants of Abraham, members of the race to whom Jehovah had promised an everlasting kingdom and a rule extending over the whole world under their king Messiah. Their present political plight they considered a mere trifle. In a most impressive manner our Lord assures them that the liberty of which they were thinking was not the liberty to which he had referred. Their political Messiah was a Jewish dream and his magnificent government a fiction of sanguine Jewish nationalists. The true Messiah is the Holy One of Israel, who comes to set up his spiritual rule in the hearts of men where sin holds despotic sway over all the thoughts and intents that lie back of men's actions. There is where Messiah breaks down strongholds of wickedness; there is where he crushes oppression and sets captives free. And there is where he rears his white throne of chastity, purity, holiness. Men may claim allegiance to Christ, but refuse to permit him to govern their lives. Such people are only nominally followers of the holy Jesus, while in reality they are servants to sin. When the claims which Christ makes upon them become fully known to them they recoil from Christ as from their worst enemy, thus revealing the astonishing fact that though Christ was the theme of their lip-professions and the center of their worldly hopes and schemes, he was not the master of their hearts.

SATURDAY, December 19. John 8: 35, 36. "And the servant abideth not in the house for ever: but the Son abideth ever. If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." It was a dangerous conceit that these Jews were nursing, who boasted to Christ their natural descent from Abraham and their external membership in the commonwealth and church of Israel. Filled with the superstitious hopes that were common among the Jews of that age, and submitting to the soul-tyranny which the Scribes and Pharisees were exercising, these people were not children in God's house, the true church of the covenant of grace, at all. Their status in the church was like that of Ishmael in the home of Abraham: they were slaves, not sons. The whole theocracy of Israel, its church and state, had been erected for Christ, as an institution by which the Jews were to be prepared for receiving the future Messiah. Now he is come. He is the Son of God's house and any man's membership in God's holy family on earth can be obtained only through him. He must make men free from error by his teaching, from the power and tyranny of sin by his grace. No one is truly free who has not accepted the terms of liberation which he offers to sinners. But there is freedom indeed—a joyous, glorious life, in which the Spirit of God is busy in a human heart, working the divine will concerning man without let or hindrance—where men have passed under the sway of the word of Jesus and acknowledged him their liberator from sin and all its dire effects. Let no man deceive himself: there is no declaration of independence written for the souls of men except that which Jesus has written with his blood. Those who take their stand on his word remain in the house of God. The rest are Ishmaelites, who are made to hear in the end the terrible order: "Cast out the son of the bondwoman."

GOSPEL NOTES FROM HERE AND THERE

MINISTER-EVANGELIST H. C. GRESHAM, of Parker, Kan., desires to thank the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for their very generous gifts of books in response to an appeal published some time ago in this paper.

THE INSPIRATION which Albert Marquardt got as the corresponding secretary of the Floating Christian Endeavor Society on Dewey's flagship, the Olympia, which led in the attack on Manila, led him to become a missionary among the miners in Colorado. He often rides one hundred miles on his motorcycle on Sunday to reach his congregations. The motorcycle was presented to him by the Hartford, Conn., Camp of United States Spanish War Veterans, of which he was a former chaplain.

TO PUT PASTORS in touch with accredited evangelists, to extend evangelistic effort wherever possible, to place singers with evangelists or pastors, and to do all that is consistent and possible in promoting evangelistic campaigns, the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists has appointed the Rev. Parley E. Zartmann, D.D., as its extension secretary. For the last three years Dr. Zartmann has served as secretary of the extension department of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, and previous to that he was associated with the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., in the direction of the work of the General Assembly's Committee on Evangelistic Work. Headquarters for the association have been established at Winona Lake, Indiana, and pastors should feel free to correspond with the secretary. The officers of the association now are: President, Herbert C. Hart; vice-presidents, William E. Biederwolf, Milford H. Lyon, William A. Sunday, J. Wilbur Chapman, and Charles R. Scoville; a board of directors, and the following extension committee: M. B. Williams, Henry W. Stough, Herbert C. Hart, I. E. Honeywell and George T. Stephens.

CIVILIZING THE ALASKAN INDIAN

ALEUTIAN BASKET WEAVER

THE native population of Alaska is made up of the Eskimo of the far North, of the so-called Indian of the southerly portion and of the Aleuts, who inhabit the Aleutian Islands off the coast of Alaska. The bureau officially designates them all as Indians. It is still a mystery where in the dim ages of the past this native population came from. What their future is ought to gravely concern us, as we got them from Russia with the land, and, like Russia, until recent years we have all but ignored them.

According to the government statistics the natives of Alaska are about 26,000 in number and they are spread over more than 350,000 of the 590,000 square miles of the territory. Their small settlements extend along 10,000 miles of coast and on both sides of the Yukon River and its tributaries, for a distance of more than 2,500 miles. One of the supervision districts contains a full 100,000 square miles, the others average more than 65,000 square miles each. Of the natives of Alaska, approximately 11,000 belong to six tribes of Indians in southeastern and southern Alaska, and in the valley of the Yukon. About 11,000 are Eskimos on the western and northwestern coasts, along the Bering Sea, the Bering Straits and the Arctic Ocean. Something more than 3,000 are Aleuts and mixed races through the Aleutian Islands.

"Until recently the natives of Alaska lived wholly by hunting and fishing," says Commissioner P. P. Claxton of the Bureau of Education, who has charge of the education of the Indians and who made an extended trip among them. "They are a peaceable, law-abiding, faithful and trustworthy people. They have never rebelled against the government or the authority of the United States, and no money has been spent in Alaska in defending white settlements against attacks by the natives. The government teachers, often single women, live in their scattered villages, far from white settlements and from the protection of forts and police force, unharmed and unafraid."

Commissioner Claxton estimates that there are 5,405 native children in Alaska, and of these 3,500 are in government schools, 300 in six mission schools, 60 in two schools supported by the Department of Commerce and about 150 in government boarding schools in the States, leaving approximately 1,400 not in school anywhere.

There are sixty-seven United States public schools in Alaska and the Aleutian Islands, five district superintendents, ninety-five teachers, men and women, seven government physicians and eight women nurses.

William T. Lopp, superintendent of education of natives of Alaska, describes the educational work thus:

"Every teacher is a social worker, who, in addition to performing the routine work in the school room, strives in every possible way to promote the physical, moral and industrial welfare of the natives, adults as well as children. Instruction in carpentry, cooking and sewing is emphasized. Many of the buildings contain, in addition to the recitation room, an industrial room, kitchen, quarters of the teacher, and a laundry and baths for the use of the native community. The school room is available for public meetings and social purposes.

"In the native villages the teachers and nurses give instruction in sanitary methods of living. Natives are encouraged to replace their filthy huts by neat, well-ventilated houses. In some sections the natives have been taught to raise vegetables, as an addition to their usual diet of fish and meat."

D. W. Cram, in charge of the school at Barron, in Arctic Alaska, the northernmost school in the world, says: "The Eskimo child differs from the average white child in that at an early age he is thrown upon his own resources as far as trading and bartering are concerned. Even at the time he enters school, and in some cases before that, he is allowed to do much as he pleases with whatever comes into his possession. For instance, there came into the harbor last fall, just before the close of navigation, a whaling schooner. One evening after school about a dozen of the boys, between the ages of nine and fourteen, got into a native canoe and went over to the ship. The crew of the ship was composed mostly of Eskimos from Siberia. These schoolboys in some cases traded the very clothes they had on their backs, custom-made goods, shipped from Seattle in the summer time; hats, caps, coats, suspenders, shirts, undershirts, not to mention pocket knives, mouth organs and various other articles, for things the Siberians had to trade. After it was all over they came back to the schoolhouse and during the evening hour entertained us with a recital of their experiences, laughing and joking at the deals they had made, and I could see that they had driven some shrewd bargains with the Siberians."

One of the largest schools is at Sitka, conducted by Miss Cassia Patton, and in one of her reports she says: "During the year we had a successful cooking class, much interest being shown by the elder women. Many women bring their tubs and their washboards to make use of the hot water. I consider this our best settlement wedge, for thus the mothers become co-workers with us."

Little by little the Indians are being taught to work the soil, which in the southern portion of Alaska is fertile, and many of the Indians are already possessors of small farms, which they work advantageously, and reindeer herders have garden patches in connection with their work. There were 47,268 reindeer in Alaska at the close of the last fiscal year.

Governor J. F. A. Strong of Alaska, in his report, just made public, says that the white population of Alaska is 39,000, and that health conditions among the whites "continue to be excellent."

"Among the native population, however," he says, "diseases of various kinds are widespread, this being especially true in remote sections. . . . Tuberculosis is the principal disease and there is no doubt that if not eradicated in the near future it will exterminate the natives within the present century. The case is not hopeless, nor will it be if prompt steps be taken."

[illegible] not be Mrs. Carew, and [illegible] a beautiful automobile waiting for them.]

"OH, MY, is it yours?" asked Pollyanna, detecting the unmistakable air of ownership in her hostess's manner. "How perfectly lovely! Then you must be rich—awfully—I mean exceedingly rich, more than the kind that just has carpets in every room and ice cream Sundays, like the Whites—one of my Ladies' Aiders, you know. (That is, she was a Ladies' Aider.) I used to think they were rich, but I know now that being really rich means you've got diamond rings and hired girls and sealskin coats, and dresses made of silk and velvet for every day, and an automobile. Have you got all those?"

"Why, y-yes, I suppose I have," admitted Mrs. Carew, with a faint smile.

"Then you are rich, of course," nodded Pollyanna, wisely. "My Aunt Polly has them, too, only her automobile is a horse. My, but don't I just love to ride in these things!" exulted Pollyanna, with a happy little bounce. "You see, I never did before, except the one that ran over me. They put me in that one after they'd got me out from under it; but of course I didn't know about it, so I couldn't enjoy it. Since then I haven't been in one at all. Aunt Polly doesn't like them. Uncle Tom does, though, and he wants one. He says he's got to have one in his business. He's a doctor, you know, and all the other doctors in town have got them now. I don't know how it will come out. Aunt Polly is all stirred up over it. You see, she wants Uncle Tom to have what he wants, only she wants him to want what she wants him to want. See?"

Mrs. Carew laughed suddenly.

"Yes, my dear, I think I see," she answered demurely. Her eyes carried — for them—a most amused twinkle.

"All right," sighed Pollyanna contentedly, "I thought you would; still it did sound sort of mixed when I said it. Oh, Aunt Polly says she wouldn't mind having an automobile so much if she could have the only one there was in the world, so there wouldn't be anyone else to run into her; but—my, what a lot of houses!" broke off Pollyanna, looking about her with round eyes of wonder. "Don't they ever stop? Still, they'd have to be a lot of them for all those folks to live in, of course, that I saw at the station besides all these here on the streets. And of course where there are more folks, there are more to know. I love folks. Don't you?"

"Love folks!"

"Yes, just folks, I mean. Anybody—everybody."

"Well, no, Pollyanna, I can't say that I do," replied Mrs. Carew coldly, her brows contracted.

Mrs. Carew's eyes had lost their twinkle. They turned rather mistrustfully, indeed, on Pollyanna. To herself Mrs. Carew was saying: "Now for preachment number one, I suppose, on my duty to mix with my fellow men, à la Sister Della!"

"Don't you? Oh, I do," sighed Pollyanna. "They're all so nice and so different, you know. And down here there must be such a lot of them to be nice and different. Oh, you don't know how glad I am so soon that I came! I knew I would be, anyway, just as soon as I found out you were you—that is, Miss Wetherby's sister, I mean. I love Miss Wetherby, so I knew I should you, too; for of course you'd be alike—sisters, so—even if you weren't twins, like Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Peck—and they weren't quite alike, anyway, on account of the wart. But I reckon you don't know what I mean, so I'll tell you."

And thus it happened that Mrs. Carew, who had been steeling herself for a preachment on social ethics, found herself, much to her surprise and a little to her discomfiture, listening to the story of a wart on the nose of one Mrs. Peck, Ladies' Aider.

By the time the story was finished the limousine had turned into Commonwealth Avenue, and Pollyanna immediately began to exclaim at the beauty of a street which had such a 'lovely big long yard all the way up and down through the middle of it," and which was all the nicer, she said, 'after all those little narrow streets."

"Only I should think every one would want to live on it," she commented enthusiastically.

"Very likely, but that would hardly be possible," retorted Mrs. Carew, with uplifted eyebrows.

Pollyanna, mistaking the expression on her face for one of dissatisfaction that her own home was not on the beautiful avenue, hastened to make amends.

"Why, no, of course not," she agreed. "And I didn't mean that the narrower streets weren't just as nice," she hurried on, "and even better maybe, because you could be glad you didn't have to go so far when you wanted to run across the way to borrow eggs or soda, and—oh, but do you live here?" she interrupted herself as the car came to a stop before the imposing Carew doorway. "Do you live here, Mrs. Carew?"

"Why, yes, of course I live here," returned the lady with just a touch of irritation.

"Oh, how glad, glad you must be to live in such a perfectly lovely place!" exulted the little girl, springing to the sidewalk and looking eagerly about her. "Aren't you glad?"

Mrs. Carew did not reply. With unsmiling lips and frowning brow she was stepping from the limousine.

For the second time in five minutes Pollyanna hastened to make amends.

"Of course I don't mean the kind of glad that's sinfully proud," she explained, searching Mrs. Carew's face with anxious eyes. "Maybe you thought I did, same as Aunt Polly used to sometimes. I don't mean the kind that's glad because you've got something somebody else can't have; but the kind that just—just makes you want to shout and yell and bang doors, you know, even if it isn't proper," she finished, dancing up and down on her feet.

The chauffeur turned his back precipitately and busied himself with the car. Mrs. Carew, still with unsmiling lips and frowning brow, led the way up the broad stone steps.

"Come, Pollyanna," was all she said, coldly.

It was five days later that Della Wetherby received the letter from her sister, and very eagerly she tore it open. It was the first that had come since Pollyanna's arrival in Boston.

"My dear sister," Mrs. Carew had written. "For pity's sake, Della, why don't you give me some sort of an idea what to expect from this child you have insisted upon my taking? I'm nearly wild—and I simply can't send her away. I've tried three times, but every time, before I get the words out of my mouth, she stops them by telling me what a perfectly lovely time she is having, and how glad she is to be here, and how good I am to let her live with me while her Aunt Polly has gone to Germany. Now, how, pray, in the face of that, can I turn around and say: 'Well, won't you please go home? I don't want you'? And the absurd part of it is I don't believe it has ever entered her head that I don't want her here, and I can't seem to make it enter her head, either.

"Of course if she begins to preach and tell me to count my blessings I shall send her away. You know I told you, to begin with, that I wouldn't permit that. And I won't. Two or three times I have thought she was going to (preach, I mean), but so far she has always ended up with some ridiculous story about those Ladies' Aiders of hers; so the sermon gets sidetracked—luckily for her, if she wants to stay.

"But, really, Della, she is impossible. Listen. In the first place she is wild with delight over the house. The very first day she got here she begged me to open every room, and she was not satisfied until every shade in the house was up, so that she might 'see all the perfectly lovely things,' which, she declared, were even nicer than Mr. John Pendleton's—whoever he may be, somebody in Beldingsville, I believe. Anyhow, he isn't a Ladies' Aider. I've found out that much.

"Then, as if it wasn't enough to keep me running from room to room (as if I were the guide on a 'personally conducted'), what did she do but discover a white satin evening gown that I hadn't worn for years and beseech me to put it on. And I did put it on—why, I can't imagine, only that I found myself utterly helpless in her hands.

"But that was only the beginning. She begged then to see everything that I had, and she was so perfectly funny in her stories of the missionary barrels which she used to 'dress out of' that I had to laugh—though I almost cried, too, to think of the wretched things that poor child had to wear. Of course, gowns led to jewels, and she made such a fuss over my two or three rings that I foolishly opened the safe, just to see her eyes pop out. And, Della, I thought that child would go crazy. She put onto me every ring, brooch, bracelet and necklace that I owned, and insisted on fastening both tiaras in my hair (when she found out what they were), until there I sat, hung with pearls and diamonds and emeralds, and feeling like a heathen goddess in a Hindu temple, especially when that preposterous child began to dance round and round me, clapping her hands and chanting, 'Oh, how perfectly lovely, how perfectly lovely! How I would love to hang you on a string in the window—you'd make such a beautiful prism!'

"I was just going to ask her what on earth she meant by that when down she dropped in the middle of the floor and began to cry. And what do you suppose she was crying for? Because she was so glad she'd got eyes that could see! Now, what do you think of that?

"Of course this isn't all. It's only the beginning. Pollyanna has been here four days, and she's filled every one of them full. She already numbers among her friends the ashman, the policeman on the beat and the paper boy, to say nothing of every servant in my employ. They seem actually bewitched with her, every one of them. But please do not think I am, for I'm not. I would send the child back to you at once if I didn't feel obliged to fulfil my promise to keep her this winter. As for her making me forget Jamie and my great sorrow—that is impossible. She only makes me feel my loss all the more keenly—because I have lost instead of him. But, as I said, I shall keep her until she begins to preach. Then back she goes to you. But she hasn't preached yet.

"Lovingly but distractedly yours,

"RUTH."

"'Hasn't preached yet,' indeed!" chuckled Della Wetherby to herself, folding up the closely written sheets of her sister's letter. "Oh, Ruth, Ruth! and yet you admit that you've opened every room, raised every shade, decked yourself in satin and jewels—and Pollyanna hasn't been there a week yet. But she hasn't preached—oh, no, she hasn't preached!"

"ANYWAY, I LIKE OLD DUFFERS

CHAPTER IV

Pollyanna Takes a Walk

IT WAS on the first Saturday afternoon that Pollyanna took her memorable walk. Heretofore Pollyanna had not walked out alone, except to go to and from school. That she would ever attempt to explore Boston streets by herself never occurred to Mrs. Carew, hence she naturally had never forbidden it. In Beldingsville, however, Pollyanna had found—especially at the first—her chief diversion in strolling about the rambling old village streets in search of new friends and new adventures.

On this particular afternoon Mrs. Carew had said, as she often did say: "There, there, child, run away; please do. Go where you like and do what you like, only don't, please, ask me any more questions today!"

Until now, left to herself, Pollyanna had always found plenty to interest her within the four walls of the house; for, if inanimate things failed, there were yet Mary, Jennie, Bridget and Perkins. Today, however, Mary had a headache, Jennie was trimming a new hat, Bridget was making apple pies and Perkins was nowhere to be found. Moreover, it was a particularly beautiful September day, and nothing within the house was so alluring as the bright sunlight and balmy air outside. So outside Pollyanna went and dropped herself down on the steps.

For some time she watched in silence the well-dressed men, women and children who walked briskly by the house, or else sauntered more leisurely through the parkway that extended up and down the middle of the avenue. Then she got to her feet, skipped down the steps and stood looking. first to the right, then to the left.

Pollyanna had decided that she, too, would take a walk. It was a beautiful day for a walk, and not once yet had she taken one at all—not a real walk. Just going to and from school did not count. So she would take one today. Mrs. Carew would not mind. Had she not told her to do just what she pleased so long as she asked no more questions? And there was the whole long afternoon before her. Only think what a lot one might see in a whole long afternoon! And it really was such a beautiful day. She would go—this way! And with a little whirl and skip of pure joy Pollyanna turned and walked blithely down the avenue.

Into the eyes of those she met Pollyanna smiled joyously. She was disappointed—but not surprised—that she received no answering smile in return. She was used to that now—in Boston. She still smiled, however, hopefully: there might be some one, some time, who would smile back.

Mrs. Carew's home was very near the beginning of Commonwealth Avenue, so it was not long before Pollyanna found herself at the edge of a street crossing her way at right angles. Across the street, in all its autumn glory, lay what to Pollyanna was the most beautiful "yard" she had ever seen—the Boston Public Garden.

For a moment Pollyanna hesitated, her eyes longingly fixed on the wealth of beauty before her. That it was the private grounds of some rich man or woman she did not for a moment doubt. Once, with Dr. Ames at the Sanatorium, she had been taken to call on a lady who lived in a beautiful house surrounded by just such walks and

THE CHURCH AND THE WORKINGMAN

EMINENT AMERICANS DISCUSS THE PROBLEM OF BRIDGING THE CHASM BETWEEN THE TWO

NORMAN HAPGOOD

LYMAN ABBOTT

IN THIS issue we present the second instalment of contributions by leaders of American thought on the great question: "How Can the Church Win Back the Working Classes?" which was begun in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. These letters supply abundant food for thought on what is now everywhere regarded as a vital problem. A third instalment will appear in a subsequent issue.

The Ministry Has Failed to Understand Labor Conditions and to Apply Christ's Teachings to Their Solution, Writes Dr. Lyman Abbott

THE condition of the workingman of to-day is, on the whole, better than at any other period in history, but there is in his condition abundant reason for the public discontent.

The congregations in our Protestant churches are, with rare exceptions, largely made up of the employers of labor. The ministry has failed to understand the conditions of the working people on the farms, in the mines, railroads, factories and homes, and has failed to interpret and apply to present conditions the spirit of Jesus Christ and the principles which he inculcated. This failure has contributed to present conditions because it has created the impression among wage-earners that the church is an organization of employers and is committed to the interests of the employers. It has tended to make the church of Christ a class church.

I do not share the opinion that the church should lay less emphasis on spiritual matters. But spiritual life is spurious—not real—unless it tends to inspire in those who think they possess such life a real and dominating desire to improve the social conditions of their less fortunate fellow men. An essential characteristic of the religion of the Bible is its insistence that loyalty to God necessarily involves service for man.

I know of no better way to combat specific industrial evils than to apply to present conditions the principles inculcated by Jesus Christ.

Whether the institutional church is or is not a great help toward solving the problem depends upon the kind of work which the institutional church does, and partly upon the community where the church is located. No uniform rule, as to methods to be pursued, can be laid down which is applicable to all churches and all communities.

The regenerative power of a spiritual Christianity can only be counted upon in case it is wisely guided and courageously and specifically applied in a practical dealing with present conditions. LYMAN ABBOTT.

Editor of "Harper's Weekly" Says the Church Must Interest Itself in the Welfare of the Laborer

I THINK the church has a very interesting and a very difficult problem before it. It ought to keep out of partisanship, yet it cannot keep out of industrial and economic questions, if it is to be a growing force. It would, I think, be impossible to lay down any rule except that, while just to all classes, its strongest sympathy ought to be with those who need help most. In other words, without being against anybody, it ought to be particularly interested in improving the welfare of the laboring majority.

Reintroduce the Carpenter of Nazareth in the Modern Church, Writes Hon. John B. Lennon.

MY SUGGESTIONS are that the church must reestablish the attitude of the Carpenter at Nazareth toward the working classes that he exercised when in Palestine. His social creed is set forth fully in the parable of the good Samaritan, and when the organized church gets really in touch with and active in carrying out the essentials involved in that parable I have absolutely no doubt as to the result being all that any Christian man or woman can desire.

The fact that in the industrial life of today men and women and children are being robbed of their birthright and of their opportunity by the power of organized wealth, I think no one will dispute; whenever this is seen, no matter who is guilty, the church should take a firm stand in favor of the working class as the Samaritan did in favor of the man who was robbed on the road to Jericho. It gives me much satisfaction to know that a great many pulpits stand for this principle absolutely and without any reservation, and when the organized church also falls in line the dawn of a real Christianity will be with us.

The Church Must Carry Out the Master's Teachings, Writes David Jayne Hill, Historian, Diplomat, Philosopher

THE problem that faces the church today is essentially the same that has in the past always confronted it, namely, to convince men that it is really a divine and not merely a human institution. There is only one solution of this problem, a nearer approach to the source of Christianity, the teachings and example of the Master. There is in these something that along the good work as much as lay in his power. Mr. Page is himself a member of the American Commission. So I went down into the London Wall district and had an interview with the chairman, Mr. Herbert Hoover, an American business man living in London.

From him I learned that the formation of a commission to feed non-combatants in Belgium had become a necessity. The soldiers had taken up all the ready food and the cloth in the country and with winter coming on hunger and cold are terrifying factors that loom larger day by day. Add to this the fact that nations at war will not allow food to go into a stricken country if there is any chance of it falling into the hands of hostile soldiers. It was necessary to get the written consent of all parties to the conflict in order to provide safe conduct for the food, which moreover must come from a neutral country.

The following is a copy of the official permit for relief supplies sent by the German governor of Belgium to Mr. Brand Whitlock, American minister in Brussels, one of the honorary chairmen of the Commission for Relief:

"The Central Government in Belgium,
"BRUSSELS, October 16, 1914.

"My dear Mr. Minister:

"In answer to your courteous letter of today I have the honor to reply with all respect that I welcome with lively satisfaction the undertaking of the Comité Central de Secours et d'Alimentation and do not hesitate formally and distinctly to give assurance that foodstuffs of all kinds imported by the committee under your Excellency's patronage for the use of the civil populace of Belgium shall be kept exclusively for the use of the Belgian populace; that these foodstuffs shall hereafter be exempt from requisition by the military authorities and finally that they shall remain entirely at the disposal of the committee.

"With assurance of my highest consideration, I am Your Excellency's most obedient servant,

"BARON VON DER GOLTZ,
"General Field Marshal."

Now Holland has no more than enough, if enough, food on hand to supply her own needs. So naturally the commission turned to the United States. The commission itself does not engage to raise funds, but only to insure means of transportation. And to keep to the terms of the general agreement the cargoes raised in the United States must be consigned to Dr. Henry Van Dyke, American minister in The Hague.

But it would take some time to get food from the United States, and in the meantime the Belgians were starving. So, for emergency purposes, the British Government agreed to allow a limited number of cargoes of food to be sent across the Channel, provided they were replaced by other cargoes to England within six weeks. The commission engaged to see to that. The immediate thing to do was to buy food and send it over to Dr. Van Dyke, who would reship it to Brussels, where it would be distributed over the country, under the direction of Brand Whitlock, American minister in Brussels.

It was just at this moment that the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD called on the Commission and when the immediate need was explained offered to help out by purchasing a cargo and going with it to see it distributed in Belgium. The matter was quickly arranged. The steamer Jan Blockx was chartered and loaded. I shall have the satisfaction of seeing the food distributed to the hungry. Depots have been arranged all over Belgium and those who are entitled to food receive tickets for a week's supply. The food is handed out every day as the tickets are punched. Our tickets will be given to widows and orphans exclusively and our people will have the satisfaction of knowing that their succor goes directly and practically undiminished to the poor people for whom it was intended.

Since the foregoing letter was written the CHRISTIAN HERALD relief steamer has reached Rotterdam in safety and the cargo of 600 tons of food is now in process of distribution in Brussels. On November 20, charity was supplying 300,000 totally destitute Belgians in Brussels with two meals daily—the meals consisting of potato soup, a portion of rice and a piece of bread. This is believed to be the biggest bread line in the world. There is a prospect that even with all the help that can come the line will soon include the whole Belgian population of the capital.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

ENDEAVORERS PEACEABLY INCLINED. Believing that their coming convention of over 4,000,000 pledged Christian Endeavor members who have subscribed to the motto that has the principle of Christian Endeavor, constitute a mighty army of international peace, the United States Committee for Coöperation in a World-wide Peace Union composed of all leading officials of the Endeavorers who sign a pledge reading: "As a follower of the Prince of Peace, I will seek to promote good will among men, and, praying to establish on earth the will such as I have opportunity to fulfill its condition of war, and will endeavor to cement the fellowship of peoples of all nations and denominations throughout the world."

EUROPE SOWS MILITARISM

THE WORLD A BIT POORER. Dr. Robert J. Burdette died in Pasadena, Calif., November 19 after a long illness, having been unconscious almost continuously since November 6. This famed humorist was born in Greencastle, Pa., in 1844. He won the world to his wholesome humor and humorously-stated sound common sense. His fame is said to have been largely due to the encouragement given him by his first wife, an invalid for whose sake he "brought up" many of his first efforts at fun-making. He became pastor of the Temple Baptist Church, Los Angeles, some years ago.

THE WAR AND A NEW JUDEA. The possibility of Palestine becoming again the home of a Hebrew nation as a result of, or as one of the world changes to be caused by, the war in Europe is being widely discussed by the Hebrew race. The English prophet H. G. Wells has written to a leader in the Zionist movement, Israel Zangwil, asking "What is to prevent the Jews leaving Palestine and restoring a real Judea?"

NOW LET'S STOP THE DERAILMENTS. The National Association of Railway Commissioners recently in convention at Washington, D. C., [illegible] its committee on rail and equipment that "no cars are now offered suspecting wooden ones, except those of ore and other carrying practically ceased, many thousand main-line rails one record." There were [illegible] derailments of trains in the ten years from 1904 to 1913 inclusive, 60 per cent. of which were due to defective roadway and equipment, 3,727 were due to rail breaks. Defects in the rails, increased rail and other causes were given for the derailments.

FIRST AID TO SANTA CLAUS. The Post Office Department is again on the warpath for the scalps of those unthinking beings who defer their Christmas purchases and consequently the sending thereof until close to the day itself, declaring that this practice may subject to non-delivery through unavoidable congestion. The Director of Posts says the department will positively decline, "depend upon their being invited to do so," to assume Christmas duty; early mailing and insurance is urged. In the circular letter to all post offices, in which the above warnings are contained, the department states that last year the public service handled the largest quantity of holiday mail in its history and successfully because of co-operation which has so far the public. This year, [illegible] greatly exceed anything heretofore known. The possibility of the parcel post service [illegible] is great. There [illegible] a store clerk in the country who can be [illegible] from the department. There isn't a [illegible] person who won't heed the call to be [illegible].

THE WORLD COURT [illegible] FIELD CORN." From [illegible] the country [illegible] that [illegible] a number of years [illegible] financial advisor to the British Treasury, Chancellor [illegible] has taken an active interest in helping to solve the [illegible] problems of the present moment. In framing his department's [illegible] the Chancellor [illegible] has been of opinion that the [illegible] should be [illegible] to this country [illegible] to [illegible] a number of people connected [illegible] with the [illegible] of Cotton. During the year the United States will have [illegible] prosperity, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

OBSERVING THE PASSOVER LITERALLY

IT IS claimed that the Passover Supper is now observed exactly after the original manner by only the Samaritans. The Samaritan Passover of 1914 was made memorable by a series of events. At the World's Sunday School Convention at Zürich, a committee was appointed, headed by Mr. E. K. Warren, which proposes to give the Samaritan people at Nablus new homes, better schools and a synagogue somewhere in the vicinity of their present ancestral dwellings. Mr. John D. Whiting of Jerusalem was appointed a member of the Samaritan Committee, and made arrangements to attend the Passover this year.

Mr. Henry Morgenthau, United States ambassador to Turkey, and his party of six, being in Jerusalem at that time, planned also to be on Mount Gerizim at the same date. As a result the high priest and the Samaritan community had a more distinguished company of guests than usually assembles on such an occasion.

The visitors were treated with every possible courtesy. Questions were freely answered, affairs of the community explained. Mr. Whiting was accompanied by the American Colony photographers, who were allowed to take a series of daylight and flashlight pictures of this ancient ceremony from five o'clock in the afternoon until after midnight. The community now numbers less than three hundred souls, and presents the strange sight of a surplus of boys for whom the community has no prospect of providing brides. An unsuccessful attempt was made a few years ago to obtain help for this needy people from the Jews of Palestine. The matter came before the chief rabbi of London, but the request was refused, ceremonial law still decreeing that the Jews "have no dealings with the Samaritans."

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them."

The kingdoms of this world have put Strength, Genius, Wealth and Beauty to lead the march of mankind. Children have been left to trail behind as they might. The Divine Kingdom puts the child in the van of progress, and tells us to become as little children, This does not imply childishness, but child-likeness. The virtues which are apparent in child-nature are Unselfish Giving, Affectionate Love, Humility, Purity, and Obedience. These are the qualities which will conduct our world into the golden age. But how are they to be generated in human hearts save by the Spirit of God? We all need, like Naaman, to dip seven times in the crystal river which flows from the throne of God, that our flesh may come to us as the flesh of a little child. Man has been endeavoring to produce a universal peace by means of arbitration, treaties, and conferences, and he may yet try by a confederation of States; but the Peace that shall fall like a benediction on nature and on the race can only come when the prince of this world is bound, and the Prince of Peace takes to himself his great power and reigns.

The Reign of Peace

By Arthur H. Howland, B.D.

A CHOICE of lessons is given for this Sunday—"The Ascension," or "The Reign of Peace." The ascension rounds out the story of the life of Jesus. He could not die again; he could not remain on earth in his limited physical form. The earth is only one small speck in the measureless universe. The Saviour, having done his work for this planet, or rather having begun his work for it by his teachings, his death and resurrection, and by his choosing of a few friends who could be trusted to carry on his work after his departure, has gone out into that greater universe, passing by his supernatural power away from the physical limits of this world. But his Spirit is here, helping his followers to finish his work.

The alternate lesson is from Isaiah, a prophecy of the sweet time to come when all the world shall be at peace. The study of this lesson (Isa. 11: 1-10) is full of interest. After describing the Messiah who is to come, the prophet declares: "With righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth. He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins." Righteousness, equity, sternness, faithfulness, these are to characterize the work of earth's Peace-bringer.

Then follows the description of the coming Peace, peace so perfect that even the wild animals shall forget their nature and shall dwell together in harmony. Not only God's chosen people, but the Gentiles, that is, the nations, all of them, shall come seeking this Peacemaker. "And his rest shall be glorious."

Two lessons in this peace study should be driven home. The peace must be based on righteousness and justice. Jeremiah rebukes those who cry "'Peace! Peace!' when there is no peace." Jesus not only pronounces the word Peace, but he shows the world how it may come to pass, the only way. That is by learning righteousness and justice. This note is sounded in Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1: 46-55). She welcomes the heavenly messenger but recognizes that he is to bless the world by overthrowing what is evil. So not only abroad, where the nations are clashing, but here in our own land, where restless factions are chafing, the way of justice and right must be found before the place of peace is reached.

The other fact is that real peace is to come to the world, man by man, heart by heart, life by life. As Christ brings his personal peace to the individual soul, the atmosphere of peace will widen till it takes in all the world. "His rest shall be glorious"; his rest is glorious now, for all who, by faith, will enter into it. And as with world peace, so with heart peace, it must be based on righteousness. The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever."

Expediency of Christ's Departure

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

[Golden Text: "He was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight." Acts 1: 9.]

AFTER our Lord had promised his disciples the enduement of power he placed his hands upon them and blessed them. While they were gazing at his form, white with light, as at the Transfiguration, suddenly the Saviour seemed to be growing taller; his feet no longer touched the ground. See, the heavenly attraction is upon him, stronger than gravitation! What a further evidence of his divinity, as they watch him rise, not as Elijah did, who was caught up in a chariot of fire. Christ is alone, unattended. Soon a cloud, the presence of the Infinite, enveloped him. Not as a distant speck in the sky, but in full form and beauty, just as he will appear at his second coming, when every eye shall behold him. How sublime the parting, how much more glorious will be the reunion at his return!

There are many reasons why it was expedient that Christ should go away. His visible presence confined him to narrow limits, while the Gentile world waited to hear the glad Gospel news. If Jesus had remained upon earth his followers would not have felt that responsibility and authority which was placed upon them by his departure.

Again, Christ is now our Mediator. We approach the throne of heavenly grace in his all-prevailing Name. We ask and receive, that our joy may be full, for he ever liveth to make intercession for us.

In our life of trial, bereavement and suffering, we look to the home whither the Forerunner hath entered, knowing that he is preparing a place for us, "beyond the smiling and the weeping." What a comfort to the dying to know that they are going to Jesus; not going away from him.

Our Lord's absence is also a great incentive to faith. Mary exclaimed, "If thou hadst been here, my brother had not died!" The early church demanded the personal presence of the Master, rather than his omnipresence. Men would have sent for Jesus from great distances, or made extended pilgrimages to him if he had remained upon earth. Since his ascension every soul can, by faith, touch the hem of his garment and be made whole.

The greatest reason is that the Comforter will not come until Christ has ascended on high. The full mission of the Holy Spirit could not be inaugurated until Christ's work was accomplished. Now that Jesus is glorified, the Holy Ghost is given.

Returning to Jerusalem, the disciples waited for the promised power. When the Pentecostal baptism fell upon them they had blessed proof that Jesus had entered the glorified presence of the General Assembly on high. They knew that he was yet alive and that forever more.

It is not for us to be gazing into the heavens, seeking to pry into the future, to know when our Lord is to return. We are not to know the times and the seasons, which God hath in his power, but we are to wait and pray for the Spirit's power; power to do, to be, to witness and to suffer for him.

The resurrection and the ascension are the hinges to the door opening into immortality and eternal life. Some day we will be caught up together with him and so be forever with the Lord. Jesus went away, that he might come nearer to humanity, that he might pervade the hearts of earth's millions with his blessed presence, and that he might come again in the power and majesty of his eternal kingdom.

We know his words are true, "Lo, I am with you alway"; he is here in the midst. He could not be any nearer, though ascended into the heavens.

He descended into suffering before he ascended. Without Calvary there could be no Easter or Olivet. If we suffer and toil with him we shall be found ready and watching when he cometh to ascend with him to glory.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

THE reign of peace. More than once the imperial power of the world has fallen without hope, but this vision of peace has never faded from the mind of the race. Nothing could have seemed more unlikely in the black night of Isaiah's prophecy than the dawning of a new day, yet he foresaw it coming, and sang of righteousness, peace and glory. Six months ago men from all round the world were gathering in Germany for a "peace congress," and just as they met the storm broke and Europe was deluged with blood. But Christianity has not broken down. Defective forms of it have crumbled into dust, but God's righteousness has also been revealed, and we cling to the belief that he can bring permanent good out of what is apparently only ill. The terror, and loss, and despair of this awful strife will sicken and disgust men with the very name of war and do more to bring about universal peace than perhaps a century of sermons and peace congresses could have done.

No one has heard of the wild animals conspiring to attack and destroy civilization. The tame animals never did better in serving man than at this time of human history. Only civilized human beings are at each other's throats with tooth and claw.

A few years ago, when Lord Dufferin became viceroy of India, among his gifts was a young elephant whose tusks had been sharpened and who had been taught to open the daily mail of his master. Oriental rulers in all ages sought collections of wild animals whose savage instinets have in some way been overcome and made to do the bidding of man. In 1897 the people of Beirut saw a wonderful collection of tamed animals sent by the Negus of Abyssinia to the former Sultan of Turkey. I once helped tame a small bear from Mount Hermon until he was as playful as a kitten though not easily handled by reason of his strength. The promise in this reign of peace is not the extirpation of predatory animals, but having their habits and instinets changed.

Instead of overcoming each other men shall overcome the evil in themselves, and once eradicated from the nature of man, evil will disappear from among the lower animals, and men shall realize the truth of this Bible idea of the close connection of nature with the fall and redemption of man.

IN MEMORY OF GEORGE WHITEFIELD

MEMORIAL days and services should be last neglected and forgotten. Feeding on lives and deeds immortal, we grow strong in exalted resolve and actions divine. Let December 27, 1914, be a memorial day, reminding us that on December 27, 1714, two hundred years ago, the glorious life of George Whitefield dawned upon this gloomy world. As we recall his career, the evangelistic note will ring more clearly in our souls. He was a pioneer in evangelism, as Washington was in democracy, and Cromwell in human freedom.

George Whitefield's life began in an environment most uninviting. He was born in an inn. His father was an innkeeper. At his father's death Whitefield, a lad, mixed and sold drinks over the bar. In this work he never gloried. To him it soon became an intolerable burden. His conscience was quickened by a study of the Bible. Frequently at night late did he sit perusing its contents, over the room where during the day he sold intoxicating drinks. He who lingers long to read His word will soon long to rid himself of sin. No book like the Bible, as a microscope, so reveals the least of sins, and as a telescope the greatness of the minutest. It not only reveals the deadliness of sin, but convinces the unsaved man that he is a sinner hopelessly lost without the saving grace of Jesus Christ. It so convicted Charles G. Finney and Whitefield. Convicted of sin and seeking light, Whitefield was doubly fortunate while a student at Oxford to fall in with the Wesleys. The three with others formed what was called the "Holy Club." Together they toiled upward through prayer and meditation into the light in Christ that knows no dimness.

Repenting, converted, Whitefield had a longing that would not leave, to lead others to the Master. A minister of the Gospel he became. His message was, "Men are dead in trespasses and sins," "He that believeth not shall be damned," "The wages of sin is death," "Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins," "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." Proclaiming sin, eternal death through sin, and salvation through Jesus Christ, he had a hearing and produced conviction. As on the day of Pentecost, men were pricked in their hearts, and cried out, "What shall we do?" They did not hear, "Be good," "Take absent treatment"; but "Repent or be lost." Jesus saves and Jesus only. This has been the foundation of evangelistic preaching since Pentecost. It is a true church builder. It is Biblical. It first displeases, then pleases men; it convicts, leads to conversion, then salvation. Let us remember the passing of two hundred years, the keynote of the conquering preacher and evangelist—George Whitefield. May we not, in these rosewater and delicate-tinted days, with profit in soul-winning, emulate his example? A little of future retribution from the pulpit with all help from the throne of mercy is good medicine now as then for the sin-sick soul.

Plain pentecostal preaching disturbed the sense of propriety of the formal, veneered churches of his day. They said, "He is undignified; we will have nothing to do with him, he is mad." They closed the doors of their churches in his face, but by so doing they failed to close his mouth. As the doors of the churches were closed the doors of the groves—God's first temples—were opened. The Word of God he must present to dying men. The man with a vision of lost men must preach, if not in the church, then outside. Multitudes heard him everywhere and were profoundly impressed. No preacher ever faced larger audiences. They were composed of all classes and conditions of men. The common people heard him gladly, so the uncommon. Lady Huntington, Benjamin Franklin and Chesterfield were among his most ardent admirers. The infidel Bolingbroke was by him profoundly moved. His was the eloquence irresistible, the eloquence, speech and manner of a man with a consuming passion for souls. Such a passion makes the illiterate speak with power. God give us such a yearning.

Whitefield's preaching in the fields and parks was after the method of the Master. After no synagogue bade Him welcome, the fields were his temples. Whitefield did more than preach. On board the ship bearing him the first time across the sea, he won the hearts of the captain and crew, not by first preaching, but by his care for the sick and general service. In the New World, and later in the Old, orphan asylums he built and established. He visited the sick, fed the hungry, clothed the naked, cared for the orphan, while preaching repentance and breaking the bread of life, while multitudes were converted and led to lead true lives; by him many were helped to bear the common burdens of everyday life.

The work of Whitefield was untiring, almost herculean. He burned out. On an average he preached three times daily in addition to his other multitudinous cares. The field of his efforts was the world. Seven times did he cross the ocean. In the New World was he when the end came. His bones as well as his spirit thus became our heritage. After preaching two hours, weary he lay down to rest. Ere the morning came the hand of the Lord outstretched, lifted him up to rest, higher service and richer joys.

C. G. JORDAN.

WHITEFIELD made seven visits to America. He brought great blessings to our land. Whittier wrote of him thus:

> The flood of emotion, deep and strong,
> Troubled the land as it swept along,
> But left a result of holier lives.

In Philadelphia he preached with such effectiveness that the dancing-rooms were discontinued, and the ball and concert rooms were shut up "as inconsistent with the Gospel."

Benjamin Franklin tells that in Philadelphia 30,000 heard him with ease. Ben was caught with the matchless delivery of his sermons. "I happened in a meeting in the course of which I perceived," writes he, "that he intended to finish with a collection, and I silently resolved that he would get nothing from me. I had in my pockets a handful of copper money, three or four silver dollars, and five pistoles in gold. As he preached I began to soften, and concluded to give the coppers; another stroke of his oratory made me ashamed of that and determined me to give the silver; and he finished so admiringly that I emptied my pockets wholly into the collection-dish—gold and all."

At Boston he said: "I insisted much on the doctrine of the new birth and also on the necessity of a minister being converted before he could preach aright; unconverted ministers are the bane of the Christian Church." It was in Boston he went with the governor in his coach to the Commons, where he preached to 30,000 people.

Whitefield died September 30, 1770, at Newburyport, Mass., where his body lies buried in a vault at the foot of the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church.

Whitefield was a very devout and serious man. "I preach," he said, "as Apelles painted—for eternity." Whitefield was singularly passionate and tender. "You blame me for weeping," he said to the people once, "but how can I help it when you will not weep for yourselves, although your immortal souls are on the verge of destruction?"

Whitefield as a Methodist is best seen in his own words: "The only Methodism I desire to know is a holy method of dying to ourselves and living to God."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LEADERSHIP TRAINING

Lincoln). Cradle Roll pamphlet No. 2 (M. E. Board of Sunday Schools, 1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago). Chapter 5, The Superintendent and His Work (Brown).

III. Method Material. Organization.

(1) The Superintendent.

Appoint as superintendent the teacher of the Beginners' or Primary class if workers are few. It is better, however, to appoint a separate superintendent, possibly one of the primary assistants, one who can give time to visitation of the home and who will work in close relation with the teacher of the Beginners' or Primary Department.

2. How to Start.

(a) Cards to enroll a baby brother or sister should be given out to the younger children.

(b) The pastor should speak of the department in the church service and the superintendent in the Sunday school service and enrolment Cradle Roll cards distributed.

(c) The pastor in his calling rounds can carry Cradle Roll enrolment cards with him.

3. Plan of Recognition of New Member.

(d) A Cradle Roll certificate of membership, such as is published by denominational and Sunday school supply houses, should be presented to the mother.

4. Plans to Promote Department Interest.

(a) Enroll baby's name on a Cradle Roll Chart, this chart to be hung up in the Beginners' or Primary room.

(b) Ask the mother for the baby's picture, and group this with other pictures in a frame, then hang in one of the rooms just referred to.

(c) Keep a "Heavenly Cradle Roll" for the names and dates of death of the babies who have passed away.

(d) Prayer for the babies and their parents should be made in the opening exercises of the Beginners' or Primary class or department.

(e) The baby's birthday should be recognized by a simple letter, intended for the mother, of course. A birthday card for the baby or some little gift like a home-made scrap-book of pictures pasted on a muslin background.

(f) Opportunity should be given to have the parent send a birthday offering for the little one.

(g) In case of sickness or death of the baby the visit of the Cradle Roll superintendent will be of special value.

(h) Literature for mothers should be collected and distributed to the mothers in these calls.

(i) The pastor should call upon Cradle Roll parents whether members of the church or not. In an Ohio town one pastor added three hundred of the Cradle Roll parents to his church in one year as the result of using this pathway to the parents' heart.

(j) An occasional birthday party for all the Cradle Roll babies and their parents will be anything but a quaker meeting, but will serve a good social purpose.

(k) On special days such as Easter, Children's Day and Christmas special provision should be made for the babies, such as a Christmas tree and party for the Cradle Roll.

(l) If the school should have a week-day anniversary march in the summer the Cradle Roll babies and parents should have a place behind their Cradle Roll banner. The baby gocarts or carriages can be decorated with flowers, flags or bunting.

(m) When the baby is promoted to the Beginners' or Primary Department a pretty certificate of promotion should be presented to the child.

(n) A class of Cradle Roll children may be formed when they reach two or three years of age. These babies can sit in low chairs about a low table and with crayon and paste and pictures can be kept happily busy filling out some lesson design which shall carry a very simple truth.

(o) A class of Cradle Roll mothers should be formed to be taught the International Lesson in the same room with the tots. This class can be promoted with the children and made the mothers' class in the new department. In the Moody School of Chicago there are 75 young mothers and fathers in such a class.

(p) Copies of pictures of babies from great artists, such as the "Sistine Madonna," or Raphael's "Madonna of the Chair," or Andrea del Sarto's "Madonna of the Sack" may decorate the walls of the Sunday school and may properly be the gift of this mother's class.

(q) A Mothers' Association, composed of mothers of the Cradle Roll, Beginners' and Primary Departments, is an interesting method of promoting the strong interest of the parents. This will be treated later.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them."

The kingdoms of this world have put Strength, Genius, Wealth and Beauty to lead the march of mankind. Children have been left to trail behind as they might. The Divine Kingdom puts the child in the van of progress, and tells us to become as little children, This does not imply childishness, but child-likeness. The virtues which are apparent in child-nature are Unselfish Giving, Affectionate Love, Humility, Purity, and Obedience. These are the qualities which will conduct our world into the golden age. But how are they to be generated in human hearts save by the Spirit of God? We all need, like Naaman, to dip seven times in the crystal river which flows from the throne of God, that our flesh may come to us as the flesh of a little child. Man has been endeavoring to produce a universal peace by boards of arbitration, treaties, and conferences, and he may yet try by a confederation of States; but the Peace that shall fall like a benediction on nature and on the race can only come when the prince of this world is bound, and the Prince of Peace takes to himself his great power and reigns.

The Reign of Peace

By Arthur H. Howland, B.D.

A CHOICE of lessons is given for this Sunday—"The Ascension," or "The Reign of Peace." The ascension rounds out the story of the life of Jesus. He could not die again; he could not remain on earth in his limited physical form. The earth is only one small speck in the measureless universe. The Saviour, having done his work for this planet, or rather having begun his work for it by his teachings, his death and resurrection, and by his choosing of a few friends who could be trusted to carry on his work after his departure, has gone out into that greater universe, passing by his supernatural power away from the physical limits of this world. But his Spirit is here, helping his followers to finish his work.

The alternate lesson is from Isaiah, a prophecy of the sweet time to come when all the world shall be at peace. The study of this lesson (Isa. 11: 1-10) is full of interest. After describing the Messiah who is to come, the prophet declares: "With righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth. He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins." Righteousness, equity, sternness, faithfulness, these are to characterize the work of earth's Peace-bringer.

Then follows the description of the coming Peace, peace so perfect that even the wild animals shall forget their nature and shall dwell together in harmony. Not only God's chosen people, but the Gentiles, that is, the nations, all of them, shall come seeking this Peacemaker. "And his rest shall be glorious."

Two lessons in this peace study should be driven home. The peace must be based on righteousness and justice. Jeremiah rebukes those who cry "'Peace! Peace!' when there is no peace." Jesus not only pronounces the word Peace, but he shows the world how it may come to pass, the only way. That is by learning righteousness and justice. This note is sounded in Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1: 46-55). She welcomes the heavenly messenger but recognizes that he is to bless the world by overthrowing what is evil. So not only abroad, where the nations are clashing, but here in our own land, where restless factions are chafing, the way of justice and right must be found before the place of peace is reached.

As Christ brings his personal peace to the individual soul, the atmosphere of peace will widen till it takes in all the world. "His rest shall be glorious"; his rest is glorious now, for all who, by faith, will enter into it. And as with world peace, so with heart peace, it must be based on righteousness. The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever."

Expediency of Christ's Departure

The resurrection and the ascension are the hinges to the door opening into immortality and eternal life. Some day we will be caught up together with him and so be forever with the Lord. Jesus went away, that he might come nearer to humanity, that he might pervade the hearts of earth's millions with his blessed presence, and that he might come again in the power and majesty of his eternal kingdom.

We know his words are true, "Lo, I am with you alway"; he is here in the midst. He could not be any nearer, though ascended into the heavens.

He descended into suffering before he ascended. Without Calvary there could be no Easter or Olivet. If we suffer and toil with him we shall be found ready and watching when he cometh to ascend with him to glory.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

THE reign of peace. More than once the imperial power of the world has fallen without hope, but this vision of peace has never faded from the mind of the race. Nothing could have seemed more unlikely in the black night of Isaiah's prophecy than the dawning of a new day, yet he foresaw it coming, and sang of righteousness, peace and glory. Six months ago men from all round the world were gathering in Germany for a "peace congress," and just as they met the storm broke and Europe was deluged with blood. But Christianity has not broken down. Defective forms of it have crumbled into dust, but God's righteousness has also been revealed, and we cling to the belief that he can bring permanent good out of what is apparently only ill. The terror, and loss, and despair of this awful strife will sicken and disgust men with the very name of war and do more to bring about universal peace than perhaps a century of sermons and peace congresses could have done.

No one has heard of the wild animals conspiring to attack and destroy civilization. The tame animals never did better in serving man than at this time of human history. Only civilized human beings are at each other's throats with tooth and claw.

A few years ago, when Lord Dufferin became viceroy of India, among his gifts was a young elephant whose tusks had been sharpened and who had been taught to open the daily mail of his master. Oriental rulers in all ages sought collections of wild animals whose savage instincts have in some way been overcome and made to do the bidding of man. In 1897 the people of Beirut saw a wonderful collection of tamed animals sent by the Negus of Abyssinia to the former Sultan of Turkey. I once helped tame a small bear from Mount Hermon until he was as playful as a kitten though not easily handled by reason of his strength. The promise in this reign of peace is not the extirpation of predatory animals, but having their habits and instincts changed.

Instead of overcoming each other men shall overcome the evil in themselves, and once eradicated from the nature of man, evil will disappear from among the lower animals, and men shall realize the truth of this Bible idea of the close connection of nature with the fall and redemption of man.

IN MEMORY OF GEORGE WHITEFIELD

MEMORIAL days and services should be last neglected and forgotten. Feeding on lives and deeds immortal, we grow strong in exalted resolve and actions divine. Let December 27, 1914, be a memorial day, reminding us that on December 27, 1714, two hundred years ago, the glorious life of George Whitefield dawned upon this gloomy world. As we recall his career, the evangelistic note will ring more clearly in our souls. He was a pioneer in evangelism, as Washington was in democracy, and Cromwell in human freedom.

George Whitefield's life began in an environment most uninviting. He was born in an inn. His father was an innkeeper. At his father's death Whitefield, a lad, mixed and sold drinks over the bar. In this work he never gloried. To him it soon became an intolerable burden. His conscience was quickened by a study of the Bible. Frequently at night late did he sit perusing its contents, over the room where during the day he sold intoxicating drinks. He who lingers long to read His word will soon long to rid himself of sin. No book like the Bible, as a microscope, so reveals the least of sins, and as a telescope the greatness of the minutest. It not only reveals the deadliness of sin, but convinces the unsaved man that he is a sinner hopelessly lost without the saving grace of Jesus Christ. It so convicted Charles G. Finney and Whitefield. Convicted of sin and seeking light, Whitefield was doubly fortunate while a student at Oxford to fall in with the Wesleys. The three with others formed what was called the "Holy Club." Together they toiled upward through prayer and meditation into the light in Christ that knows no dimness.

Repenting, converted, Whitefield had a longing that would not leave, to lead others to the Master. A minister of the Gospel he became. His message was, "Men are dead in trespasses and sins," "He that believeth not shall be damned," "The wages of sin is death," "Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins," "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." Proclaiming sin, eternal death through sin, and salvation through Jesus Christ, he had a hearing and produced conviction. As on the day of Pentecost, men were pricked in their hearts, and cried out, "What shall we do?" They did not hear, "Be good," "Take absent treatment"; but "Repent or be lost." Jesus saves and Jesus only. This has been the foundation of evangelistic preaching since Pentecost. It is a true church builder. It is Biblical. It first displeases, then pleases men; it convicts, leads to conversion, then salvation. Let us remember the passing of two hundred years, the keynote of the conquering preacher and evangelist—George Whitefield. May we not, in these rosewater and delicate-tinted days, with profit in soul-winning, emulate his example? A little of future retribution from the pulpit with all help from the throne of mercy is good medicine now as then for the sin-sick soul.

Plain pentecostal preaching disturbed the sense of propriety of the formal, veneered churches of his day. They said, "He is undignified; we will have nothing to do with him, he is mad." They closed the doors of their churches in his face, but by so doing they failed to close his mouth. As the doors of the churches were closed the doors of the groves—God's first temples—were opened. The Word of God he must present to dying men. The man with a vision of lost men must preach, if not in the church, then outside. Multitudes heard him everywhere and were profoundly impressed. No preacher ever faced larger audiences. They were composed of all classes and conditions of men. The common people heard him gladly, so the uncommon. Lady Huntington, Benjamin Franklin and Chesterfield were among his most ardent admirers. The infidel Bolingbroke was by him profoundly moved. His was the eloquence irresistible, the eloquence, speech and manner of a man with a consuming passion for souls. Such a passion makes the illiterate speak with power. God give us such a yearning.

Whitefield's preaching in the fields and parks was after the method of the Master. After no synagogue bade Him welcome, the fields were his temples. Whitefield did more than preach. On board the ship bearing him the first time across the sea, he won the hearts of the captain and crew, not by first preaching, but by his care for the sick and general service. In the New World, and later in the Old, orphan asylums he built and established. He visited the sick, fed the hungry, clothed the naked, cared for the orphan, while preaching repentance and breaking the bread of life, while multitudes were converted and led to lead true lives; by him many were helped to bear the common burdens of everyday life.

The work of Whitefield was untiring, almost herculean. He burned out. On an average he preached three times daily in addition to his other multitudinous cares. The field of his efforts was the world. Seven times did he cross the ocean. In the New World was he when the end came. His bones as well as his spirit thus became our heritage. After preaching two hours, weary he lay down to rest. Ere the morning came the hand of the Lord outstretched, lifted him up to rest, higher service and richer joys.

C. G. JORDAN.

WHITEFIELD made seven visits to America. He brought great blessings to our land. Whittier wrote of him thus:

> The flood of emotion, deep and strong,
> Troubled the land as it swept along,
> But left a result of holier lives.

In Philadelphia he preached with such effectiveness that the dancing-rooms were discontinued, and the ball and concert rooms were shut up "as inconsistent with the Gospel."

Benjamin Franklin tells that in Philadelphia 30,000 heard him with ease. Ben was caught with the matchless delivery of his sermons. "I happened in a meeting in the course of which I perceived," writes he, "that he intended to finish with a collection, and I silently resolved that he would get nothing from me. I had in my pockets a handful of copper money, three or four silver dollars, and five pistoles in gold. As he preached I began to soften, and concluded to give the coppers; another stroke of his oratory made me ashamed of that and determined me to give the silver; and he finished so admiringly that I emptied my pockets wholly into the collection-dish—gold and all."

At Boston he said: "I insisted much on the doctrine of the new birth and also on the necessity of a minister being converted before he could preach aright; unconverted ministers are the bane of the Christian Church." It was in Boston he went with the governor in his coach to the Commons, where he preached to 30,000 people.

Whitefield died September 30, 1770, at Newburyport, Mass., where his body lies buried in a vault at the foot of the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church.

Whitefield was a very devout and serious man. "I preach," he said, "as Apelles painted—for eternity." Whitefield was singularly passionate and tender. "You blame me for weeping," he said to the people once, "but how can I help it when you will not weep for yourselves, although your immortal souls are on the verge of destruction?"

Whitefield as a Methodist is best seen in his own words: "The only Methodism I desire to know is a holy method of dying to ourselves and living to God."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LEADERSHIP TRAINING

Lincoln). Cradle Roll pamphlet No. 2 (M. E. Board of Sunday Schools, 1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago). Chapter 5, The Superintendent and His Work (Brown).

III. Method Material. Organization.

(1) The Superintendent.

Appoint as superintendent the teacher of the Beginners' or Primary class if workers are few. It is better, however, to appoint a separate superintendent, possibly one of the primary assistants, one who can give time to visitation of the home and who will work in close relation with the teacher of the Beginners' or Primary Department.

2. How to Start.

(a) Cards to enroll a baby brother or sister should be given out to the younger children.

(b) The pastor should speak of the department in the church service and the superintendent in the Sunday school service and enrolment Cradle Roll cards distributed.

(c) The pastor in his calling rounds can carry Cradle Roll enrolment cards with him.

3. Plan of Recognition of New Member.

(d) A Cradle Roll certificate of membership, such as is published by denominational and Sunday school supply houses, should be presented to the mother.

4. Plans to Promote Department Interest.

(a) Enroll baby's name on a Cradle Roll Chart, this chart to be hung up in the Beginners' or Primary room.

(b) Ask the mother for the baby's picture, and group this with other pictures in a frame, then hang in one of the rooms just referred to.

(c) Keep a "Heavenly Cradle Roll" for the names and dates of death of the babies who have passed away.

(d) Prayer for the babies and their parents should be made in the opening exercises of the Beginners' or Primary class or department.

(e) The baby's birthday should be recognized by a simple letter, intended for the mother, of course. A birthday card for the baby or some little gift like a home-made scrap-book of pictures pasted on a muslin background.

(f) Opportunity should be given to have the parent send a birthday offering for the little one.

(g) In case of sickness or death of the baby the visit of the Cradle Roll superintendent will be of special value.

(h) Literature for mothers should be collected and distributed to the mothers in these calls.

(i) The pastor should call upon Cradle Roll parents whether members of the church or not. In an Ohio town one pastor added three hundred of the Cradle Roll parents to his church in one year as the result of using this pathway to the parents' heart.

(j) An occasional birthday party for all the Cradle Roll babies and their parents will be anything but a quaker meeting, but will serve a good social purpose.

(k) On special days such as Easter, Children's Day and Christmas special provision should be made for the babies, such as a Christmas tree and party for the Cradle Roll.

(l) If the school should have a week-day anniversary march in the summer the Cradle Roll babies and parents should have a place behind their Cradle Roll banner. The baby gocarts or carriages can be decorated with flowers, flags or bunting.

(m) When the baby is promoted to the Beginners' or Primary Department a pretty certificate of promotion should be presented to the child.

(n) A class of Cradle Roll children may be formed when they reach two or three years of age. These babies can sit in low chairs about a low table and with crayon and paste and pictures can be kept happily busy filling out some lesson design which shall carry a very simple truth.

(o) A class of Cradle Roll mothers should be formed to be taught the International Lesson in the same room with the tots. This class can be promoted with the children and made the mothers' class in the new department. In the Moody School of Chicago there are 75 young mothers and fathers in such a class.

(p) Copies of pictures of babies from great artists, such as the "Sistine Madonna," or Raphael's "Madonna of the Chair," or Andrea del Sarto's "Madonna of the Sack" may decorate the walls of the Sunday school and may properly be the gift of this mother's class.

(q) A Mothers' Association, composed of mothers of the Cradle Roll, Beginners' and Primary Departments, is an interesting method of promoting the strong interest of the parents. This will be treated later.

PERSONALLY CONDUCTED

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

EVERY once in a while my desk gets crowded up with letters that interest me greatly—questions that are a real joy to answer, suggestions that are well worth considering. At such times when I sit back in my chair and gaze at the accumulated envelopes I am prone to sigh and say: "I wish that all of my pen-and-ink friends could have the pleasure of reading these!"

Not long ago I was looking over a paper that has a space once a day for the exchange of ideas. It was called a Personally Conducted column, because the subscribers of the paper sent in the items that made it up. The idea took me by storm, and so after this—every few weeks—I am going to let you personally conduct our friendship page.

Miss Lena Bliss has sent in a little idea that may help some school teachers in lonely, out-of-the-way districts. I will quote directly from her letter:

"The teacher in a little country school among the mountains was feeling discouraged and listless. The children were backward and hard to discipline, the district was poor and could afford few books. Two pictures adorned the walls, and there was little incentive to enthusiasm.

"'Whatever is done I must do myself,' she said; 'but I have no money to spend. I will write to my former Sunday school teacher and see if she can send me some up-to-date magazines. That will at least help towards a school library.' The parcel post brought her by return mail a package of CHRISTIAN HERALDS. She took them to the school room and laid them in a neat pile on the front corner desk.

"There was a rush and scramble for them, to see which would get the most and the first, but when she made them understand that they could have only one at a time when their work was done, the charm began to make itself felt.

"She cut the beautiful pictures from the front and put them up in the room. They added fifty per cent. to its cheerfulness. Others she gave to the children to take home as a reward for good behavior. This helped much in the discipline. Some pictures she cut and pasted on paper and the children made language stories of them.

"Then she found much information inside the pages that could be used to supplement the daily work, especially in the line of current events. She is now willing to recommend THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as an educator."

This letter comes from a dear missionary who is trying to take a little of God's sunshine to the natives in Madagascar. Her letter is long, so unfortunately I can only publish a small part of it:

"Twenty-five years ago our pioneer missionaries fought their way through from the west coast and located here in the Onilaky Valley, with an eye on the Tanosy and Hahafaly tribes. What the pioneer missionaries in a wild, heathen country have to contend with is surely not unknown to you, so I shall quietly pass it by. Another side of the story shall be treated likewise: the results of a very unhealthy climate, caused by a hot, tropical sun, the fever mosquito, and the swamps. Our cemetery tells the story.

"The natives are a very superstitious people, and as such have had their priests, sorcerers, witch-doctors, etc., in great numbers. As their chief aim has been to get rich quick you can readily understand the practice. The people's wealth lies not in money or property, but in cattle. They really seem to live and die for their cattle, very often even building their houses in the midst of the cattle pen.

"Of their many heathen beliefs I shall mention only one, and that is their fear from faith in good and evil days. All babies that are born on evil days are sacrificed alive to appease the gods. The longer they suffer the greater the blessings that will fall on the parents. In one district alone the number killed was over a thousand a year."

This letter is from one of my Middle Western girls. She lives in a small town where she helps her mother keep house, tunes pianos and teaches music to children. She says:

"You think you can imagine how busy I've been this summer? Eighteen pupils can use up lots of time, besides my tuning and other work. The last six weeks 'me and my children' have been preparing a program to entertain these country folk. The affair 'happened' last night, and I am glad to report that all reports are—that it was a perfect success.

"By the way, I am going to play in a large concert soon. I am memorizing my music now—there's seventeen pages of it!"

My little friend from Mexico writes me in her own attractive dialect. The last year has been hard for her:

"It was after a month that I receive your kind letter," she tells me. "How many things pass in this time! Now I am a little tranquillized for one side because it seems there is only a peri!. a fight in the capital, but at the end, probably the peace. While as appeared at the close of April we have no way but that of death and desolation. Here there is not anti-American sentiment, but the Mexicans know how defend their country. All will be arranged between the two nations is said here."

The next letter is from a dear lady who lives in California. Speeding across the continent, her letters make the miles seem very short and insignificant. She says:

"I was in San Francisco two weeks ago and visited the fair grounds. The buildings are beautiful, especially some of them—for nearly all are finished and ready to receive their exhibits. As the exposition covers over 635 acres, you can readily see how large it is, and how tired you would get if you attempted to walk all around it. The grounds and flowers are so beautiful, however, that you wouldn't mind the tiredness."

The next letter is from a Canadian girl. She is full—full up to the eyes—of war with all its horrors, for Canada has sent troops to the front.

"We have been busy with Red Cross work, and two or three afternoons a week we meet together for that purpose in a hall near by. It's all so dreadful—this slaughter of human life—and one cannot imagine where it will end. Our men have sailed for Europe, and hundreds of our homes are sad ones."

Last of all comes a little note from a little lady who lives not far away. The letter is just happy, and she ends it: "With sunshine and blue sky always in my thoughts for you!"

Friends o' mine—when you have any question that you want to ask, any incident that you want to tell, any suggestion that might interest the girls, I would like to have you send it in. For I want you to "personally conduct" this column again. And always, as you write, I hope that your thoughts of me will be as brimming over with sunshine as mine will be of you!

PIONEER WORK IN PANAMA

IN THE town of Chitre, about two hundred miles from Panama City, a pioneer Protestant missionary work has been carried on by Rev. E. L. Latham, who, after missionary service in Cuba, felt the call to service in the Canal Zone. In 1909 he entered a section of Panama containing 250,000 people, to whom he was the only Protestant missionary. His Gospel work was at first bitterly opposed, but he persevered, building with his own hands a mission chapel and a small house for himself. His faithfulness and kindness won the confidence of the natives, and many have received the Gospel of grace from his lips or from printed Gospels and tracts he has distributed. The work has been based on faith, and help has more than once come in unexpected ways. On his recent visit north Mr. Latham married a consecrated Christian worker, Mrs. Anna Wood, of Brooklyn, who will return with him to this pioneer work. They are members of the Church of God, or Winebrenner communion.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORKINGMAN

appeals to every man's conscience, but it is neutralized by every form of insincerity. The church today needs nothing so much as implicit and loyal belief in its divine mission. Wherever this faith is the dominant motive, as distinguished from pride of position, love of power, and ambition for the praise of men, it is doing and will continue to do the work it was intended to accomplish. Jesus Christ, the carpenter, had no difficulty in reaching the hearts of men. Our trouble is that we wish to attain similar results without accepting similar conditions. DAVID JAYNE HILL.

Publisher Holt Warns Against Rash Experiments

AS I understand it, the church has long recognized the fact that men are made of very different degrees of capacity. If a man is made of inferior degree it is his business to do what he can to improve himself and increase his production, and not his business to claim a part of the production of men whom, to use the language of the church, God has seen fit to create with capacities superior to his. Why God created them so—or why Nature evolved them so—is a question too deep for me. But thievery, under the disguise of inflated currency, or of violence which will lead to the recall of judges if they interfere; or of any other of the humbugs that demagogues are preaching, is not going to remedy the matter.

The Church Should Aim to Prevent Evils Rather than Operate Through Charity, Writes Robert U. Johnson, Author and Sociologist

THE most important service which the church can render is to stand like a rock against all forms of lawlessness and in favor of the right of every man to work for a wage which may be agreed upon between him and his employer. At the same time it should bring moral pressure to bear upon the employing classes to make sure that their attitude toward their workmen is one of sympathy and humanity. I am more and more convinced that entirely too much money is spent in remedial charities and that the church can be of enormous service in directing these funds more proportionately into the channels of preventive work. I think there is an increasing conviction among thoughtful people that there is great waste of financial resources by reason of the lack of unity in church effort—a complication of work which would not be tolerated in any other practical activity. Whatever may be the changes of attitude toward the doctrines of the church, I believe that it has still before it the mission of being the greatest instrumentality in the progress of the world. ROBERT UNDERWOOD JOHNSON.

The Church Should Help the Movement for Labor Legislation, Writes Prof. Henderson of Chicago University

THE resolutions of the Garden City Conference, whose president was Dr. John R. Mott, represent my views, as I drew them up for the committee. I do not believe that the churches can, either directly or through representatives, vote on a subject so complicated and technical, but they can do a great deal in the way of impartial education and opportunities for friendly discussion. I have expressed the same views in my little book, Social Duties from a Christian Standpoint.

The best thing the churches just now can do would be to help sustain such organizations as the American Association for Labor Legislation, which is conducted by experts.

trees and flower beds as these. Pollyanna wanted now very much to cross the street and walk in those grounds, but she doubted if she had the right. To be sure, others were there, moving about, she could see; but they might be invited guests, of course. After she had seen two women, one man and a little girl unhesitatingly enter the gate and walk briskly down the path, however, Pollyanna concluded that she, too, might go. Watching her chance she skipped nimbly across the street and entered the garden.

It was even more beautiful close at hand than it had been at a distance. Birds twittered over her head, and a squirrel leaped across the path ahead of her. On benches here and there sat men, women and children. Through the trees flashed the sparkle of the sun on water, and from somewhere came the shouts of children and the sound of music.

Once again Pollyanna hesitated; then, a little timidly, she accosted a handsomely dressed young woman coming toward her.

"Please, is this—a party?" she asked.

The young woman stared.

"A party!" she repeated, dazedly.

"Yes'm. I mean, is it all right for me—to be here?"

"For you to be here? Why, of course. It's for—for everybody!" exclaimed the young woman.

"Oh, that's all right, then. I'm glad I came," beamed Pollyanna.

The young woman said nothing, but she turned back and looked at Pollyanna, still dazedly, as she hurried away.

Pollyanna, not at all surprised that the owner of this beautiful place should be so generous as to give a party to everybody, continued on her way. At the turn of the path she came upon a small girl and a doll carriage. She stopped with a glad little cry, but she had not said a dozen words before from somewhere came a young woman with hurrying steps and a disapproving voice; a young woman who held out her hand to the small girl and said sharply:

"Here, Gladys, Gladys, come away with me. Hasn't mama told you not to talk to strange children?"

"But I'm not strange children," explained Pollyanna in eager defense. "I live right here in Boston now, and—" But the young woman and the little girl, dragging the doll carriage, were already far down the path, and with a half-stifled sigh Pollyanna fell back. For a moment she stood silent, plainly disappointed; then resolutely she lifted her chin and went forward.

"Well, anyhow, I can be glad for that," she nodded to herself, "for now maybe I'll find somebody even nicer—Susie Smith, perhaps, or even Mrs. Carew's Jamie. Anyhow, I can imagine I'm going to find them; and if I don't find them, I can find somebody!" she finished, her wistful eyes on the self-absorbed people all about her.

Undeniably Pollyanna was lonesome. Brought up by her father and the Ladies' Aid Society in a small Western town, she had counted every house in the village her home and every man, woman and child her friend. Coming to her aunt in Vermont at eleven years of age, she had promptly assumed that conditions would differ only in that the homes and the friends would be new, and, therefore, even more delightful, possibly, for they would be "different"—and Pollyanna did so love "different" things and people! Her first and always her supreme delight in Beldingsville, therefore, had been her long rambles about the town and the charming visits with the new friends she had made. Quite naturally, in consequence, Boston, as she first saw it, seemed to Pollyanna ever more delightfully promising in its possibilities.

Thus far, however, Pollyanna had to admit that in one respect, at least, it had been disappointing: she had been there nearly a week and she did not yet know the people who lived across the street, or even next door. More inexplicable still, Mrs. Carew herself did not know many of them, and not any of them well.

"They do not interest me, Pollyanna," was all she would say, and with this Pollyanna—whom they did interest very much—was forced to be content.

Today, on her walk, however, Pollyanna had started out with high hopes, yet thus far she seemed destined to be disappointed. Here all about her were people who were doubtless most delightful—if she only knew them. But she did not know them. Worse yet, there seemed to be no prospect that she would know them, for they did not, apparently, wish to know her. Pollyanna was still smarting under the nurse's sharp warning concerning "strange children."

"Well, I reckon I'll just have to show 'em I'm not strange children," she said at last to herself, moving confidently forward again.

Pursuant of this idea Pollyanna smiled sweetly into the eyes of the next person she met and said blithely:

"It's a nice day, isn't it?"

"Er—what? Oh, y-es, it is," murmured the lady addressed, as she hastened on a little faster.

Twice again Pollyanna tried the same experiment, but with like disappointing results. Soon she came upon the little pond that she had seen sparkling in the sunlight through the trees. It was a beautiful pond and on it were several pretty little boats full of laughing children. As she watched them Pollyanna felt more and more dissatisfied to remain by herself. It was then that, spying a man sitting alone not far away, she advanced slowly toward him and sat down on the other end of the bench. Once Pollyanna would have danced unhesitatingly to the man's side and suggested acquaintanceship with a cheery confidence that had no doubt of a welcome; but recent rebuffs had filled her with unaccustomed diffidence. Covertly she looked at the man now.

He was not very good to look at. His garments, though new, were dusty, and plainly showed lack of care. They were of the cut and style (though Pollyanna of course did not know this) that the State gives its prisoners as a freedom suit. His face was a pasty white, and was adorned with a week's beard. His hat was pulled far down over his eyes. With his hands in his pockets, he sat idly staring at the ground.

For a long minute Pollyanna said nothing; then hopefully she began:

"It is a nice day, isn't it?"

The man turned with a start.

"Eh? Oh—er—what did you say?" he questioned, with a curiously frightened look around to make sure the remark was addressed to him.

"I said 'twas a nice day," explained Pollyanna in hurried earnestness; "but I don't care about that especially! That is, of course I'm glad it's a nice day, but I said it just as a beginning of things, and I'd just as soon talk about something else—anything else. It's only that I wanted you to talk—about something, you see."

The man gave a low laugh. Even to Pollyanna the laugh sounded a little queer, though she did not know (as did the man) that a laugh to his lips had been a stranger for many months.

"So you want me to talk, do you?" he said a little sadly. "Well, I don't see but what I shall have to do it, then. Still, I should think a nice little lady like you might find lots nicer people to talk to than an old duffer like me."

"Oh, but I like old duffers," claimed Pollyanna quickly; "that is, I like the old part, and I don't know what a duffer is, so I can't dislike that. Besides, if you are a duffer, I reckon I like duffers. Anyhow, I like you," she finished, with conviction.

BUSY DOCTOR

Sometimes Overlooks a Point.

The physician is such a busy man that he sometimes overlooks a valuable point to which his attention may be called by an intelligent patient who is a thinker.

"About a year ago my attention was called to Grape-Nuts by one of my patients," an Ohio physician writes.

"At the time my own health was bad and I was pretty well run down, but I saw at once that the theories behind Grape-Nuts were sound and that if the food was all that was claimed, it was a perfect food.

"So I commenced to use Grapes-Nuts with cream twice a day and in a short time I began to improve in every way and I am now much stronger, feel better and weigh more than ever before in my life.

"I know that all of this good is due to Grape-Nuts and I am firmly convinced that the claims made for the food are true.

"I have recommended, and still recommend, Grape-Nuts to a great many of my patients with splendid results, and in some cases the improvement of patients on this fine food has been wonderful.

"As a general food, Grape-Nuts stands alone." "There's a Reason."

THE C. S. BELL CO., Hillsboro, Ohio

What Was It?

THAT surely was a tryin' day, or I'm too weak to live; a friend in trouble come to ask such help as I could give.

I'd troubles quite a plenty of my own—that made it worse. Then came the man my friend owed an' began to rant an' curse.

Wal, I was short of money an' poor John was shorter still; an' he jest had to hev some fer to settle that old bill, else he'd be sold out, sartin', farm an' crops an' stock an' all; 'sides that, his wife was sickly an' his kiddies mighty small. It hurt so, thinkin' 'bout it, when I couldn't spare a cent—I had my int'rust fer to meet, an' you know what that meant.

I wanted, bad, to help John, but I couldn't see no way 'less there would come a miracle 'fore noon of the next day.

I went to bed from habit; didn't 'spect to sleep a wink—John's fix had got me worried—'spected to jest toss an' think. I'm nothin' but a sinner, but I knelt there by my bed to tell the Lord John's trouble; but I don't know what I said, 'ceptin' that I asked His mercy an' jest left it in his hands—fer if I couldn't say much I knew he would understand.

Sounds strange; but I felt easy an' I didn't think no more. Slept sound as any boy till some one pounded on the door an' told me John was waitin' an' they guessed he had some news. I hustled out to see him without waitin' fer my shoes. I s'posed he'd come to tell me that he'd have to let things go, an' didn't wait fer him to speak—he allus does talk slow—but started in by sayin': "John, jest bring your fam'ly here an' make yourselves at home as long's your work don't interfere."

He s'prised me then by squeezin' at my hand till it was blue an' thankin' me for somethin' that 'most anyone'd do.

Then he goes on to tell me that, last night along 'bout ten, the man he owed had called him out an' told him, there an' then, he needn't worry 'bout that bill; if he'd jest do his best an' pay part he'd not push him, but wait, patient, fer the rest.

Finds It a Spiritual Help

I have enjoyed the "Do You Know Your Bible?" contest, and have been able to answer correctly almost all of the questions this year. I hope this contest will continue another year. The Meditations, sermons, and in fact the paper as a whole is fine. A. T. B.

Let the Domestic carry

Your Christmas Greetings to the Homemaker

It's an ideal gift upon any occasion, but at this Christmas Season especially it will bring "Good Cheer" to any home.

See That Lever?

That is our exclusive device for throwing the Sweeper Brush into action and out again. That's why so many women insist upon having a DOMESTIC

The Original Vacuum Sweeper

A woman appreciates—as no man can—what it means to have the Sweeper Attachment under easy and quick control—operated by a touch of the toe. This attachment should be used only when the vacuum nozzle has failed to take up any surface litter. A Sweeper Brush in constant action raises and scatters dust, which is always unsanitary and unnecessarily wears the rug or carpet.

Order a Domestic today for that Christmas Remembrance. If your dealer cannot supply you, accept no other, but write to our nearest office.

Questions and Answers

R. C. S., Austin, Texas. What should be a Christian man's guide in matters of conscience? Is the Bible sufficient? Is conscience sufficient? What part do the following play: Reason, authority, experience, instinct, custom, common sense, advice of friends?

Common sense and reason may be considered fallacious, because if a person is unbalanced mentally, he is unable to receive correctly the messages from the Bible, the Holy Spirit, or friends. This is why it is so necessary that people who are eager to obey the Master literally and to please him in all things must take care that their brains and nerves are kept normal and strong. Many people who are greatly distressed over some spiritual problem need first of all a wise physician and careful treatment for their bodies before they are in a condition to consider them seriously. It is to men that Jesus would say: "Come ye yourselves apart unto a desert place, and rest a while." None of the things you mention in the last sentence of your question can be trusted alone. Common sense, reason and instinct make a basis; experience and custom help; advice of friends, particularly Christian friends, is important. Authority is, for the Protestant, probably least important of all, for the very principle of Protestantism is that each soul deals directly and freely with God. A safe rule is to get our guidance from three main sources, and defer action until those three agree—the Bible, the voice of the Spirit (or conscience) and the counsel of our closest spiritual companions. The Bible must be interpreted to us by the Holy Spirit, and it is part of the plan of God that we should receive help from our companions in Christ in prayer and counsel. Above all, in deciding on matters of conduct we must remember that Christ wishes to be our Friend rather than our Master; that he wants our love. The motive in every decision ought to be a desire to please him and to help others. Often a problem which is very difficult when approached from the standpoint of self becomes easy when we remember that it is he who must be pleased, and others, not ourselves, who must be helped and made glad.

M. A. M., Stanton, Del. What would be the present value of the "thirty pieces of silver" which Judas received for betraying the Saviour? This question was talked over in our Bible class.

The thirty shekels of silver, it is estimated, would equal about $20 of our money, a shekel being worth about 62 cents. Thirty shekels equaled 120 denarii, and a denarius was the price of a day's work, so that the whole amount Judas received would probably be equal in purchasing value to between $2000 and $3000 of American money today.

C. E. L., Harpersfield, N. Y. That hymns were in use in the Christian Church in apostolic days, we gather from Matt. 26: 30; Mark 14: 26; Acts 16: 25; Heb. 2: 12, etc. These were probably adaptations from the old Hebrew psalms. The hymn which Jesus and his disciples sang at the Last Supper is believed to have been the latter part of the Hallel—the psalms sung by the Jews on the night of the Passover and which included parts of Psa. 113, 114 and 118. But it is made clear, by other passages, that very early in the history of the Christian Church, another class of vocal music came into use in worship (see Eph. 5: 19; Col. 3: 16). These "psalms, hymns and spiritual songs" were what Professor Schaff has termed "a lyrical discourse to the feelings"—a universal form chosen for the expression of experiences that would create pious emotions and draw the hearts to the source of joy and blessing. Do our gospel hymns, as we know it today, fairly set forth the early Christian spiritual song, which it may be reasonably supposed had both the Gospel of a free salvation through Christ and the joy and reward of heaven as compensation for the sorrow and suffering of the persecuted believers here on earth?

"Penman," St. Augustine, Fla. 1. According to McClintock & Strong, as far as is known, Bishop Siricius (fourth century) was the first to use the word "pope" as a title. He zealously promoted the power of the Church of Rome. He succeeded in attaching East Illyria to the See of Rome and induced the bishop of Thessalonica to acknowledge himself dependent on the seat of Rome for that province. 2. The early church writers are not agreed either concerning the fact or the time of Peter's journey to Rome. Eusebius (Chron. 1: 12) says Peter went to Rome in the second year of Claudius Cæsar, and Jerome adds that Peter remained in Rome 25 years. Both statements are extremely doubtful, however, and cannot be reconciled with the record of Peter's doings in the book of Acts. Eusebius seems to have relied upon Clemens Alexandrinus for his information, who in turn is said to have misinterpreted a remark of Justin Martyr on the subject, which referred to a visit to Rome by another Simon altogether. These incidents seem to have been the only basis for the alleged Roman journey of Peter and his residence there under Claudius. On the other hand it should not be forgotten that Irenæus writes of Peter and Paul being together in Rome, founding a church there and suffering martyrdom together—this version of the story resting solely upon an account by Dionysius. As a matter of policy, the Church of Rome has accepted as authentic all of these statements in order to establish the claim of the papal primacy of Peter, although no careful historian mentions them without the necessary qualification as to their origin.

Paperweights which Secretary Bryan had made from condemned swords

THE SWORD'S FATE

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

SWORDS they were, made of the finest of steel,
Keen were they—so that the foeman might feel Pain of the sharpest—with death standing near—
Terror, and horror, and torture, and fear.

Swords they were—bright with a silver-blue light,
Cold as the moonlight on ice in the night,
Merciless—hewing at flesh and at bone,
Killing in thousands—or killing alone.

Swords they were—then in a moment of peace,
Men laid them down for a bit of release
From all the fighting—and they were alone,
Dull and forgotten as fragments of stone.

Swords they were, but in the fire's red heat
They for the first time have suffered defeat,
Poured into molds by a calm-loving race;
They have come out with a plow's noble grace.

Oh that the swords of the nations might be
Melted in fires, that over the sea
Victors might say of their blood-reddened spoil:
"Swords they were—now they are tilling the soil!"

S. C. S., Syracuse, N. Y., writes: "I would like to add to the 'Morning Prayer' sent in by J. Irwin Taylor, Chester, Pa., the one that has stood on my desk for the last three years:

> "'Now I get me up to work;
> I pray the Lord I may not shirk;
> If I should die before the night,
> I pray the Lord my work's all right.'"

Mrs. F. M. T., Sterling City, Calif., and J. F. R., Hatfield, Pa. 1. "Hades" is a Greek word which means literally "unseen" or "out of sight," hence "the unseen world." It was used long before the Christian era to designate the invisible world. It was also used by the interpreters as an equivalent for "Sheol," the grave. 2. Kingdom of God and Kingdom of Heaven are identical in many passages in the New Testament, in the sense of meaning that kingdom which Christ came to set up in the hearts of his followers throughout the world. The kingdom is in the heart of every true believer, here and now. Having, through Christ, laid hold of eternal life, that life goes on endlessly. 3. The word "leaven" is used with a latitude of meaning; sometimes it is the leaven of righteousness, again it is the leaven of evil. In Matt. 13: 33, our Saviour adopts it as illustrating the growth of the kingdom of heaven in the individual heart and in the world at large. The use of leaven was rigidly forbidden among the Jews on certain special occasions, as in the meat-offering, the trespass-offering, the consecration-offering, and more particularly at the feast of the Passover, when they were forbidden on pain of death to eat leavened bread and even to have leaven in their houses. The shewbread in the temple was unleavened. Leaven was used as a figure of the inherent corruption of man, and its secret, penetrating, effusive power was emblematic of moral influence generally, whether good or bad.

C. W. D., Pensacola, Fla. Balaam, first mentioned in Num. 22: 5, belonged to the Midianites. Pethor, where he dwelt, was in Mesopotamia, a considerable distance from Moab. He himself speaks of "being brought from Aram out of the mountains of the east" (Num. 23: 7). Josephus, the historian, calls him "a diviner" (soothsayer), a man of great skill in prediction and magic. Balak's language to him in Num. 22: 6 was meant to flatter him and make him compliant with his will. It is evident, however, that Balaam had knowledge of the one true God. One commentator writes: "He was possessed of high gifts and had the intuition of truth—in short, he was a poet and a prophet. He himself confessed that he derived his gifts from God. But he, elated with his success, had become proud and believed the gifts were his own and could be used for his own purposes, to make merchandise and acquire riches and honors. But when he received the message of the elders of Moab and Midian, and was tempted to seize the great opportunity to his own advantage, he was divinely warned that his actions would be overruled. As the Bible story shows, God did interfere and the genius of the self-willed stubborn prophet, under divine influence, became the instrument through which came a message of great power and beauty, bearing upon the destiny of the Jewish nation, and which is cherished by the church throughout the world.

J. F. G., Bridgeport, Wash. The passages to which you refer are probably Matt. 24: 5-24. To get an adequate idea of the causes that led to the downfall of the Roman empire, you should read one of the many standard histories. Even the heathen historians admit the corruption, the cruelty, the sensuality, the monstrous and unnatural wickedness of the period which immediately preceded Rome's dissolution. Niebuhr, the great historian, wrote: "We see things had come to a point at which no earthly power could afford any help." The general condition of the people was one of great misery. Probably half the population were slaves, there was great inequality of wealth, there was practically no middle class, no institutions for alleviating distress, and an inhuman tone of feeling and practice prevailed generally, human life being held at a very low estimation. Instruction was neglected, and "except the Jewish, there was not a single religion which was felt by the more enlightened part of its professors to be real."

Miscellaneous

W. M. D., Birchtree, Mo. As far as we know, no such attempt to prove the solidity of the earth has ever been seriously made.

Miss A. D. B., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Peter's name was originally Simon. The change came when Jesus said: "Thou art Simon, the son of Jona; thou shalt be called Cephas."

Miss H. P., a struggling artist away out in Catlin, N. D., who sends a gift to the Widows and Orphans Fund, writes: "I am holding down a claim out here alone; not a family living in sight. I am trying to make a home for myself. There is very little chance to make money here, but this is a little offering from an order that came to me. I am painting Christmas novelties. When I sit down to eat a good meal, how I wish I could share it with those poor starving people!"

E. A. S., Tilton, N. H. 1 and 2. Both the subjects you mention in these questions are controversial. 3. The body dies, the physical functions cease, but the spirit which returns to God who gave it, lives on. As one commentator writes: "If man consist of body and spirit, death may prove but his birthday into another and more important state of being." Those who love God and are justified and forgiven through Christ have "already passed from death into life." 4. Jesus set up his kingdom in the hearts of men, and his followers, for the extension of the kingdom, established the church as a means of practical co-operation for the spread of his Gospel (see Acts, 1st chapter).

C. H. F., Scranton, Pa., writes: "To pray for the unconditional ending of the war seems as absurd as to pray that all diseases abate at once. Both are the culmination of man's sins. We should pray that men's hearts may be touched, and that God's will may be done in regard to the war, to his own glory and to the lasting benefit of mankind." We believe that the great majority of the Christian churches are today praying for good results to spring out of the war; that the hearts of men everywhere, rulers and subjects included, may be convinced of the terrible wickedness of war, and that out of all the slaughter and suffering a new and better world may emerge, which will seek more earnestly God's glory and the good will of their fellow men.

THE following letter, which may be suggestive to many of our readers, has been received by the Bowery Mission, from the head of one of the large real estate firms in New York City:

NOVEMBER 24, 1914.

The Bowery Mission, 227 Bowery, New York City.

GENTLEMEN: I am going out of town today, and as is customary with me will spend Thanksgiving with my people "down East."

I am going to enjoy my dinner with more happiness by knowing that you have accepted the check for $25, which I enclose herewith, and which I hope you will use in providing Thanksgiving dinners for some worthy families. If not too much trouble will you please see that the check is used for families where there are one or more children? I am anxious to know that some "kiddies" have been made a little happier on Thanksgiving Day.

I sent you a contribution last year at the suggestion of ex-Sheriff Foley. No acknowledgment of this check is necessary, because I know it will be properly used.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE important event of the week in both a military and political sense has been the capture of Belgrade, the capital of Servia, by the Austrians, which, by a curious coincidence, took place on the sixty-sixth anniversary of the accession of the present Emperor Franz Joseph to the throne. The city had been besieged intermittently from the other side of the Danube by the Austrians since the beginning of the war four months ago, but its capture was finally brought about by an Austrian invasion from the northwest which took the city by storm. While this attack on Belgrade was proceeding, the larger portion of the Austrian army on reaching the Morava River turned south in the valley down which it is now marching with Chupria and then Nish as its objectives. Some time ago the capital, which had been moved from Belgrade to Nish, was again moved from Nish to Uskub, a city well to the south in territory which fell to Servia as a result of the Balkan Wars.

KING GEORGE, QUEEN MARY AND LORD KITCHENER INSPECT TROOPS

The condition of the Servian army, which has suffered very heavy losses, by some computed as high as two-fifths of its total effective at the beginning of the campaign, and the bulk of its artillery, does not lead one to believe that it can interpose serious or long-continued resistance to this advance, and therefore it is probable that Servia will soon be completely subjugated. The political results to Austria of the complete conquest of Servia would be so extremely important as to be worthy of present consideration.

As my readers are aware, the attitude of Rumania and Bulgaria toward this war has been much in doubt. Their geographical position, bordering on Austria and Turkey as well as on Russia, and their fairly large and well-equipped armies, make them extremely valuable as allies to either group of combatants. Joined with Turkey in aid of the Triple Alliance Powers, these two could throw an army of about a million into South Russia and create a new and serious problem for that Power to solve. Joined to the Allies, the two could attack Turkey, and probably conquer that country, and at the same time strike a serious flank blow at Austria by invading Transylvania.

These two Powers have been courted by both since the war began, with promises of territory by each side as a reward for participation. But neither side was in possession of the territory promised—it was to be given when and as conquered—and both Bulgaria and Rumania, neither to be moved by sentimental reasons but solely for territorial and other political advantage, have not up to the present time seen a sufficient certainty of their receiving the offered compensation.

But if Austria succeeds in conquering Servia, she will be in possession of well-located territory abutting on the western boundaries of both of these countries to offer them immediately in return for their aid. The political possibilities in this situation are worth attention and remembrance.

Servia has had a most turbulent history since the date of her practical independence in 1829. Of nine sovereigns, including the present, two have been assassinated and four have been forcibly dethroned. The predecessor of Peter himself was assassinated.

PRINCE OF WALES

Continual trouble with her neighbors, Austria, Bulgaria and Rumania, has left her no friend among the Powers in Europe, except Russia, and Russia's friendship was and is purely for political reasons. So it may be very seriously doubted whether, in the event of the triumph of the Allies, they will take very much interest in her subsequent fate one way or the other.

The scheme of the South American republics to create a permannt neutral zone along the coasts of the two Americas, while good in principle, does not seem to be opportune at the present moment. It would involve an almost complete change in the international law governing the high seas, a proposition which could not now have that calm consideration its importance necessitates, three of the principal nations, without whose cooperation the scheme would be a farce, being at war.

The week presented the unusual spectacle of the chiefs of six nations simultaneously at the front with their troops: King George, the Kaiser, the Czar, the President of France, and the Kings of Belgium and Montenegro; leaving only the Sultan, the Emperor of Austria, and the King of Servia at home. This is the first time that a British king has been with a British army in the field since the battle of Dettingen, June 16, 1743, when King George II was with the troops.

The Paris press is conducting a campaign to force Great Britain to call on Japan to send troops to Europe, and suggests that in return for her so doing the port of Hamburg be given her. Both in France and in Belgium there is complaint that Great Britain has not sent enough troops to the Continent, but this complaint seems unfounded, because when the Triple Entente was entered into France well knew that Great Britain was not a military but a naval nation.

In this connection it is interesting to consider what France's position would be today if it were not for the navy of England. Her commercial fleet could hardly sail the seas as now, practically untroubled, nor would her north coast cities and towns be in her own possession. It might also be doubted if the retreat in August would have had as happy an issue as it did, had not the small army Great Britain then had at the front sustained the brunt of the fighting. The agitation for the coming of Japanese troops will hardly result in much at present, though it will not be surprising if they appear in the spring.

The much-discussed "Holy War" up to the present writing seems rather barren of results, actual or even potential, and it looks as though the rising of the Moslems was more or less in the nature of a bugaboo. During the week General De Wet, the only man of real ability among the rebels in South Africa, was captured. That rebellion has been weakening for some time, and this blow in all probability completely finished it. The Italian Parliament met during the week and the premier, Signor Salandra, stated that there was no reason to change Italy's position of neutrality at the present time, which disposes of that question for a while.

The news from London points to the coming of conscription in a very short time. The recruiting has not increased, and the need for new men, if England is to take the field in force in the spring, is deemed urgent. Owing to the peculiar aversion to this word in England, some other form of expression will no doubt be found, but the thing will be the same, compulsory military service for all men.

In order to be able to handle such situation as may hereafter arise in Egypt, the British Government has landed portions of the Canadian, Australian and New Zealand contingents there. Their training can be completed under more favorable circumstances in Egypt at this season of the year than in England, and if troops were wanted there they would be on the spot.

We are now commencing to get scientific medical reports from trained observers as to the organization and particular difficulties of the military hospitals in this war. From all sources comes the statement that there is an abnormal development of tetanus, or lockjaw, among the wounded. Dr. Kreuter of the military hospital at Erlangen notes that men injured by shrapnel, by being run over and by being kicked by horses, are exposed to special danger from this insidious disease, the bacillus of which "does not induce suppuration, so that the aspect of the wound does not even hint at its presence." The mortality among those attacked is very high, and the disease does not seem to yield to any known treatment.

One very curious result of the fighting is that there are many totally unwounded soldiers at the various military hospitals, who have, nevertheless, been stricken deaf, dumb or blind by the explosion of shells near them, and cases of amnesia, resulting from the same cause, are also reported. Some of the deaf and dumb, as well as those stricken with amnesia, will undoubtedly recover in the course of time. Among this class of injuries is that of nervous prostration, a large number of cases being reported, mostly of men above the average in intelligence.

Many cases of nervous prostration, some of which have developed into positive insanity, are also reported among the officers and men of the British blockading fleet in the North Sea. There is probably no more nerve-racking duty than this watchful waiting, one's faculties always at high tension to anticipate an attack from the sea, from the clouds, or from beneath the waves. In former warfare the soldier had at least the excitement of actual combat to sustain him, but in this war thousands have been killed without seeing or even hearing the enemy. The new pneumatic gun the Germans are now using makes no sound, sends up no smoke, and the first its victims know of its activity is when its messenger of death explodes among them to take its toll.

The reports of the campaign between the Turks and the Russians during the last week have been remarkable in this: that the Russian cables all dealt in the Russian advance on Erzerum in Asia Minor, and the Turkish builetins dealt only with the Turkish advance on Batum. As a result each has an unbroken chain of successes, and as there is no way under the circumstances to find out what has really happened, I shall have to content myself with giving the situation as above set forth.

There is considerable excitement in Persia, and there is no news of importance as regards the projected Turkish attack on the Suez Canal or Egypt; the whole campaign there seems halting. The German general Baron von der Goetz, field marshal, is, at the request of the Sultan, to assume command of the Turkish army, which will probably mean considerably greater activity on its part.

The campaign in Poland, East Prussia and Galicia has been the center of interest during the week. At the beginning of the week there were continual reports, or better, rumors, of a crushing German defeat, the greatest of the war and one of the greatest in history, in Central Poland. More than one hundred thousand Germans were reported prisoners, with an enormous number of killed and wounded; in fact, the whole German army was said to be cut to pieces and the survivors flying in ignominious disorder toward the German frontier, hotly pursued by the Russian cavalry. From day to day, as the week progressed, however, the reports of the extent of the supposed Russian victory grew less and less, until finally at the end of the week there appears to be no victory at all.

PLACING LATEST GERMAN GUNS IN POSITION

What happened sems to be as follows: About ten days ago [I am writing on December 4], the German advance succeeded in establishing itself on a north-and-south line roughly running from Plock on the northern side of the Vistula, through Lowicz, Lodz and thence to Sieradz on the Warthe. This position was thereafter attacked by the Russians in numerically much superior force, and a severe battle took place lasting a week or thereabouts which resulted in a draw, as far as any material change in the German position goes. There were heavy losses on both sides, but the line held firm, and now the reports are that the invading army has recommenced its offensive towards the east. The Grand Duke Nicholas Nicholavitch, as a result of this non-success, has relieved General Rennenkampff of his command, and it is said that several other Russian generals will shortly receive the same punishment. Perhaps, however, the fault is not altogether theirs.

If Germany should succeed in the object of this offensive, which is to establish herself on a line running southeast from Novogeorgievsk through Warsaw and thence along the right bank of the Vistula through Ivangorod to Lublin, she will gain control of the terminals of three of the four lines of railway by which Russia can transport troops from the interior to the front, and consequently greatly hamper her for the rest of the war; but whether this will be done or not is, of course, an open question.

In East Prussia the campaign remains in almost the same position as it was last week, and it is not probable that there will be any serious movement by either side here until the more important campaign in Central Poland is decided one way or the other. For much the same reason quietness prevails to a very large degree in the campaign in Galicia, in spite of the reports of the besieging and burning of Cracow and the surrender of Przemysl, neither of which, by the way, are true at this time, nor is there any reasonable prospect of their being true for some time to come.

The Russians have started an invasion of Hungary through the passes of the Carpathian Mountains from Galicia, but up to the present time this has not been remarkably successful. The whole German-Russian campaign now depends on the issue of the battles in Central Poland; none of the movements chronicled in other parts of the frontiers will have any really serious effect on the general issue of the campaign.

During the week a daring attempt was made by British aviators to destroy or damage the Krupp works at Essen. An attack was made and numerous bombs dropped, but up to the present time it is not known how great the damage was, if any.

Trouble again occurred in the concentration camps in both Holland and England. In England the uprising caused the guards to fire upon the riotous men, and in Holland the Dutch guards were obliged to fire on the Belgian interned soldiers they were in charge of, and several lives were lost.

Considerable agitation has been caused both in the newspapers and among the people in Italy by the discovery of numerous posters all over the kingdom on which a large cucumber was represented, with the mysterious figures 57 in one corner, and a German name in the other. Early in the war it will be remembered that the French discovered that certain innocent-looking posters of German origin advertising a soup were in fact guides for the German army, and the Italians have had precisely the same idea in relation to the cucumber posters, and deputies have even interpellated the government on the subject. Americans will appreciate the joke when they learn that the German name in the corner is Heinz.

The Franco-Belgian battle line has been very quiet all the week. Occasional cannonading unaccompanied by infantry movements practically comprise all the activities. The lines have not varied from their last week's position.

FRENCH ABOUT TO BIVOUAC IN A FARMYARD

Mr. Theodore Waters, secretary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has secured abroad the exclusive right to publish a wonderful series of photographs just taken of scenes in the stricken sections of Belgium. As soon as received in this country these tragic pictures will begin to appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE COMMUNITY CHRISTMAS TREE

BY D. H. STEFFENS

FOLLOWING the example of New York, Baltimore, along with many other cities and towns last year, had a Community Christmas Tree. What is the meaning of the Community Christmas Tree, and its enthusiastic reception by the cities and towns of this country? The American people has hitherto attempted a negative and destructive criticism of its great holidays. It did this on the one hand by refusing to generally observe them, and on the other by attempting to substitute new festivals for those already accepted. So far as any general observance is concerned, Arbor Day, Columbus Day, Children's Day, Mother's Day and these other days are failures. They, at most, appeal only to a part of the community and take no hold upon the popular imagination.

The character of certain holidays has been changed. Thanksgiving Day has largely lost its meaning as a church festival and become an occasion for family reunions. In certain sections of the country, Christmas has also become a family rather than a church festival. The community spirit, expressing itself through general churchgoing, has disappeared. It is now asserting itself through these general Community Christmas Tree celebrations.

This tendency first became apparent when we attempted to arrange community celebrations of the Fourth of July, thus returning to the ways of our fathers, who had used it as an occasion for the inculcation of lessons on the privileges and duties of citizenship. We had laughed at their spread-eagle orations, until we forgot that they were delivered on the village green before the schoolhouse in which the town meetings were held. We are now beginning to realize the important connection between these things. While we have not yet succeeded in arranging satisfactory community celebrations of Independence Day, especially in our great cities, we are moving in the right direction. If our public schools are to train our future citizens, I expect to see the privilege of citizenship conferred upon their pupils, who have attained their majority, at some public function on the Fourth of July. We are missing an opportunity, which will some day be supplied by an intelligently planned community celebration of Independence Day.

The first practical result upon our social life of the community Christmas tree will be the earlier closing of business on Christmas Eve in order that everybody may have an opportunity to take part in the exercises connected with the lighting of the tree. In Baltimore, the Consumers' League and the Federation of Labor urged that all stores be closed at 7 o'clock. The committee in charge of the celebration received a letter whose writer signed herself "Shopgirl," pleading that the committee request the merchants of the city to give their tired employees an opportunity to gather around the tree before going home to prepare for their own celebrations. These requests failed to receive any general response. People stood in their market stalls and behind their counters until 12 and 1 o'clock at night, before they went home to make a few hurried preparations and get a little much-needed rest before celebrating Christmas Day itself. These requests, like the plea for early shopping, will become more insistent. Before long the American spirit of fair play will demand that they be heard. The early closing of business will be the result. The illumination of the home windows, the ringing of church bells and the playing of carols from the church towers, as urged by the Community Tree Committee, means that having adopted the Christmas tree itself, we are now preparing to adopt customs and usages connected with the observance of the festival, the most impressive feature of which, besides the solemn stillness of Christmas Eve, is its dedication to the simple pleasures of the Christian home. I recall how the celebration in Baltimore opened in the presence of 25,000 people, who stood hushed and expectant, until just at dusk the lights flamed up and the trumpeters burst forth into Luther's hymn "Ein Feste Burg." Why the committee selected that I cannot say. Perhaps we have not yet learned how to put things together. This most plainly appears in the band concert programs. The program of vocal music, however, is not open to this criticism; "Silent Night" and "Adeste Fideles" were the great favorites. Everybody knew, if not the words, then the air of these stately old hymns.

The effect of these Community Christmas celebrations upon the church will, I hope, be a wholesome one. For one thing, there is a frank recognition of the church year by the entire community. In some of our States Good Friday is a legal holiday. The business men of the country must reckon with Easter. Now, entire communities arrange Christmas celebrations, and newspapers talk like this: "Take a look at the community tree when you pass the Courthouse Plaza today; go a block out of your way to do so, if necessary. . . . Hum the carols over to yourself or get your daughter to play them over for you on the piano. Go to church tomorrow."

This frank recognition of the church year and the claims of religion cannot fail to influence the attitude of the community toward the church.

In discussing the Community Tree we must not overlook certain indications, which point to the ever present danger of its perversion from its original purpose. Whenever a community leaves the erection of such a tree to its municipal authorities, permitting them to appropriate public funds for the purpose, and quietly acquiesces in the arrangement of a program by that ecclesiastical body which annually celebrates a military mass near the White House grounds, as well as an "official" Thanksgiving Day service, then the Community Christmas Tree will have lost its community purpose.

On the other hand, this community celebration should not be made an occasion for unseemly political or denominational bickerings. Nor should it tempt us to relax our efforts to celebrate what always was and always will be a church festival in our churches and homes with all possible beauty and fervor. The community celebration was inspired by the church. It can neither replace nor supplement the church's services. It must of necessity be something apart—something in which the several churches can have and should have a sympathetic interest, but which must be left to the community at large. If that is done, the church will be free to raise its voice in warning or protest wherever the necessity appears.

"THANKS!"

THANKSGIVING AT THE BOWERY MISSION

ONE hour after midnight, on Thanksgiving morning, the doors of the Bowery Mission opened to receive the guests of the Bread Line. Probably nowhere throughout the land was such intense thankfulness felt and manifested as by this motley crowd.

The workers of the mission anticipated a largely increased gathering this year. Throughout the summer months the congregations at the nightly meetings had never dwindled in the least. On the hottest days and nights there had never been a vacant seat. The Free Labor Bureau, too, had given significant signs of a vastly increased number of unemployed men in the city. But when at midnight, an hour before the time of opening, a huge line formed which, two deep, encircled a whole city block, it was seen that the most dire forebodings had been far exceeded.

"A nipping and an eager air" made the waiting crowd long for the doors to open. Punctually at 1 the janitor, John McGuinness, and an equally smiling police officer, swung back the large gate, and into the warm and brightly lighted room the long line trooped. Here they were received by the friendly Bread Line staff. Charlie Noble, the engineer who throughout the summer saw to the welfare of the little ones in the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, now faced a totally different crowd. Beside him at the counter were Jim Walsh, the coffee man; the faithful John McCann, the bun man, and Tom Black, the cup man, all converts of the mission, who two or three years ago were themselves in the "Line." Everything proceeded so methodically that within an hour the thousand men for whom provision had been made had partaken of their first Bread Line meal.

It was unmistakably evident to onlookers that the proportion of able-bodied men who were the victims of misfortune rather than of deliberate wrongdoing was much larger than in former years. This is the great object-lesson that the Bowery Mission Bread Line has been teaching the community throughout the eleven years of its existence, viz.: that there are tens of thousands of men in our great cities who are suffering all the unspeakable horrors of homelessness and hunger through no fault of their own. Many CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have the satisfaction of knowing that they have, through the ministry of the Bread Line, saved thousands of men from starvation.

ENJOYING THEIR THANKSGIVING MEAL

At 9 A. M. came the distribution of dinner baskets to poor families. Here Business Manager Hunt found himself face to face with another eager crowd of quite a different type. The devoted men that for several weeks had been scouring the East Side to find the very poorest and the most needy, had reported an appalling condition of affairs, and there was a feeling of the most painful helplessness felt by the workers as they realized such a huge need on the one hand and such a limited supply on the other. Two hundred and seventeen baskets were given, each containing chicken, vegetables, bread, butter, milk, coffee, tea, sugar, salt, etc.

But oh, the joy and gratitude felt and shown by the fortunate ones! It was pathetic beyond description.

Then in the evening there was the meeting. And what a meeting it was! One of Mother Bird's ideal "home gatherings of our Family circle," as she loved to call it, and at which for so many years Dr. Klopsch was the regular annual guest of honor. It was presided over by Senator Gledhill of Brooklyn, who after prayer by Superintendent Hallimond, and the singing of the doxology, called for "America," and never was the national anthem sung with more animated spirit and patriotic feeling.

Tom Davies, in charge of the religious work at the Labor Settlement, led off with an experience of frontier days in Indian Territory, vividly realistic. Mr. Hunt, secretary, followed with a simple tale of boyhood days from Massachusetts, the mother of Thanksgiving. Charles Balevre, leader of the Brotherhood, was next, with honor to President Wilson's State. Charles Thompson, oldest convert of the mission, recalled his Civil War experiences with Sheridan at Winchester; Alexander Glass outlined his boyhood experiences in Brooklyn and described Lincoln's funeral in New York; while William Church detailed his New York City experiences from the time when a lad he was "bound out" as a tinsmith's apprentice up to the present day—a truly remarkable recital. "Jack" Leary referred to his first meeting with Dr. Klopsch ten years ago at the Mission on a similar occasion, and recalled some memories of his "little red schoolhouse days" in Pennsylvania. He was followed by Mr. Putnam, who also related incidents of boyhood pranks, after which "Billy" Williams completed the Home Circle with an excellent rendition of his former famous theatrical success, entitled, "Remember that the Poor Tramp's Got to Live."

"GOOD LUCK!"

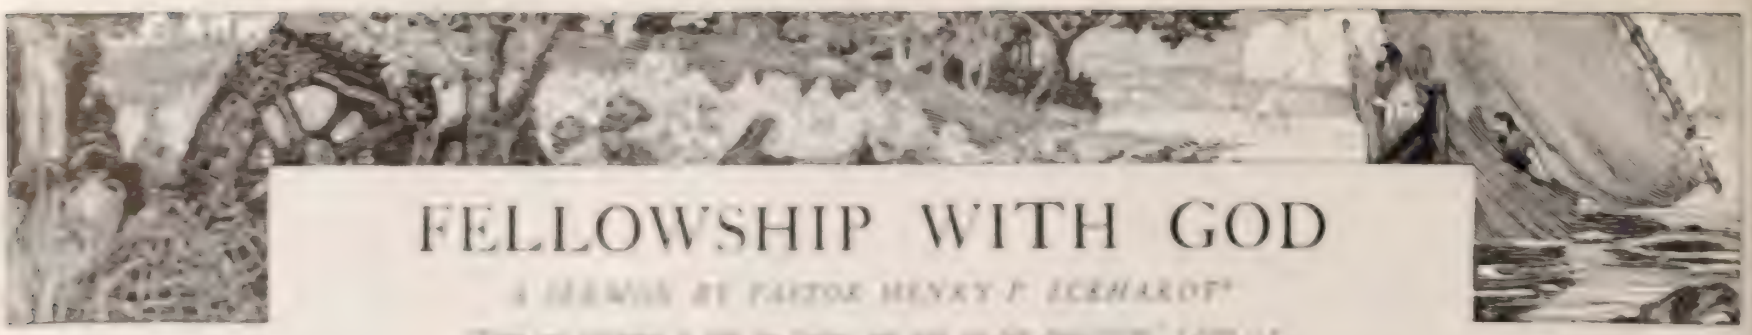
Dr. Hallimond, in closing, referred feelingly to the memorable act of Dr. Klopsch in preserving the mission at a critical period in its history and also made mention of the noble manner in which Mrs. Klopsch took up the work after her husband's death.

A HARD WINTER PROBLEM

This Thanksgiving Day has found the Bowery Mission plunged into the most arduous work in its history. Whilst the generous heart of America is deeply stirred by the sufferings of the war victims in Europe, the Bowery Mission is battling desperately to save a vast mass of American citizens from perishing from starvation. These victims of that appalling industrial condition, which necessitates the existence of a great army of unemployed men, have no kind of hope or redress. So far as any governmental action is concerned, national, State or local, there is no provision for them.

Upon the Bowery Mission and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has the duty fallen of feeding and caring for this famished multitude at home. The trustees of the Mission feel confident that the friends of this Christlike work will not fail to give it their generous support at this difficult time.

NEAR THE END OF THE MEAL



FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD

A SERMON BY PASTOR HENRY P. ICKHAROT

"That ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." I John 1:3

THESE words are from the pen of John. The venerable apostle had passed the three score and ten milestones of his life. The pastor's and was rapidly drawing near. He looked back—daily over the years past by. And wherever he looked he saw One standing and where all else—even the heroes—were lost from the beginning" he had found him with the old eyes. He had come him with the hand. He had walked him with the very hands, even the Word of Life.

And now, after all these intervening years, after preaching Christ, after suffering for Christ, now John writes this epistle. The last episode recorded his Gospel history of Jesus' contact his life—his message, his works, his inspiring deeds and glorious resurrection. How he writes this letter, by arrangement that verged not into the world and down the ages.

And what is it over all he has to say to the listening and distant ones and the end of his life is beginning to see? What message has he to give to the world in this epistle? Has he taken his pen in hand to review his life? Has he found himself overtaken in the earlier weakness of Christ? Has he a new message to give the world before passing out of it? No, rather. On the contrary the very opposite characterized all his message to this: "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life."

And now having come through faith into fellowship with the Father and the Son, we have all things common with him: no share in this great salvation. It is all ours. How much of it? As every man hath need—until the wells of salvation shall be exhausted. Whom will that happen? Whom you ashamed, and empty the fullness. And so you can go there daily and drink freely, for are you not to fellowship with the Father and the Son Jesus? "He, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." Isa. 55: 1. It is all yours. And then, as another thing, we shall share in the grace and power to help in every need.

All Things in Common

I LIFT up mine eyes unto the hills, the everlasting hills, the dazzling glare of the Almighty. Whence cometh my help, the only help I shall experience on life's pilgrimage. My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth. Every good gift is from above. It cometh down from the Father of lights. But is there help for me? Are there gifts for me? If so, how much?

I see the Son down in the grave of his flesh going about helping, healing the sick, relieving the suffering, healing the hungry, drying the tears of the mourning, refreshing and strengthening the weary. Is there grace and help for me? If so, how much?

Oh, what a wish! Through faith we have come into fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus. We have all things common with him. He has taken us into partnership with him that we may share in all his grace, love and power to help—for Jesus' sake. It is all ours to use. I hear his voice coming down from the hills: "Call upon me in every trouble, and I will deliver thee." "Cast all your care upon me; for I am caring for you." And I hear the voice of Jesus calling to me: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." And as we can go to him daily with all our daily needs and trials, all our troubles, cares, and problems, and draw on the immense heart of his almighty power and grace. We can go to him to help his comfort, his guidance, his strength. How much? As much as we have need. And how long? Until the treasure house of the Almighty shall be exhausted. All glory, then and honor to Christ, who hath brought us into this glorious fellowship and hath enriched us beyond measure!

When Fellowship Was Lost

AND then, in the third place, we shall share in the great inheritance of our Father over yonder. For the Father has an inheritance over there, a blessed inheritance. Says Christ, who brought us into fellowship with the Father and with himself: "In my Father's house are many mansions: I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." John 14: 1-3. Of course we shall be with him, for did he not invite us into fellowship with himself? "As the branches are with the vine, and as the members of a body are with the body itself, so we shall be where he is—one room in the Father's house. There are many mansions in the Father's house—a great and glorious inheritance. We shall have our share. Glory to God. I shall have my portion, for he has given. There is a place there for you and for me. If we only will, through Christ.

Mr. Moody tells that one Sunday morning, while going with a friend to preach, a young man drove up in front of them. He had an aged woman with him.

"Who is that young man?" Mr. Moody asked.

"Do you see that beautiful meadow?" said his friend, "and that land there with the house upon it?"

"Yes."

"His father drinks that all up," he said. Then he went on to tell about that father. He was a drunkard, squandered his property, died, and left his wife in the poorhouse. "And that young man," he continued, "is one of the finest young men I ever knew. He has toiled hard and earned money, and bought back the land and the house. He took his mother out of the poorhouse and drove her back to the old home and said: 'Mother, I bought it back; I paid for it myself; it is all yours as long as you live, mother.'"

That is an illustration of what we lost through sin and sin, and got back through Christ and fellowship with him. Man had an inheritance with God, a beautiful inheritance: paradise and eternal life. Man sinned. Through sin he broke the sweet fellowship and communion with God. And he lost paradise and life and all. Then Christ came. He loved and labored and suffered and died. And he through bought it all back for us. He removed sin and brought us into fellowship again with God so that we again have all things common with him. The inheritance is ours. Paradise is ours. Life is ours, world without end.

Believed, what an amazing truth! Fellowship with the Father and the Son Jesus Christ! All things common with him! Salvation full and free; power and help; an inheritance yonder—all is ours.

Workers Together With God

BUT let us not forget that fellowship with God includes not only such blessed privileges, but also obligations and duties. In these epistles of the New Testament you will note again and again that the apostles place over against a Christian privilege and blessing a corresponding obligation and duty. So, then, if we are in fellowship with God and have all things common with him, we must also be partners with him in the great work and service of upbuilding his kingdom on earth, in order that others may be brought to enjoy the blessings of this fellowship.

If you will just glance at the life and work of Christ, you will note the full and unbroken fellowship with the Father in his work, thereby giving us the pattern. The Father loved the world so that he gave his only-begotten Son. And the Son also loved the world and gave himself. The Son was willing to save the world. And the Father was willing to save. The Son was building up his blessed kingdom of grace for the salvation of the world. And the Father also was building. There was perfect fellowship. And so, if we are in true fellowship with the Father and with Jesus we shall also be partners with him in work and service. His interests will be our interests. His triumphs will be our triumphs. We shall work with him. We shall fight with him. We shall endure with him, and, if need be, suffer with him, that we may be glorified with him. In fellowship with our Lord and Saviour we must yield ourselves unreservedly to him and his service, ever asking: "Lord, what will thou have me to do?"

Does he want our personal service for his kingdom's work? We must answer, "Speak, Lord, and I will listen." Does he want the son of ours as a laborer in his vineyard? Does he want our gold and silver? More of it than we have been giving? We must yield it unto him. For so are in blessed fellowship with him. Oh the joy of this fellowship with the Father and with Jesus! The inexpressible joy of saying from sad grace and mercy, as each one hath used! And then the joy of serving God in love and gratitude! No greater and more lasting joys in life than these. And the closer the fellowship with God, the deeper the joys. "These things write we unto you, that your joy may be full," says John.

There is joy in every blessing, every grace, every mercy that comes from him. There is also joy in every work, every service, be it ever so small, rendered him, with whom we have fellowship through Jesus Christ. Blessed be his name.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, December 20. John 8: 37, 38. "I know that ye are Abraham's seed; but ye seek to kill me, because my word hath no place in you. I speak that which I have seen with my Father: and ye do that which ye have seen with your father." When a person claims merit for himself on the ground of his pedigree, his claims should at least be supported by the reappearance in him of some of the noble ancestral traits that distinguished his great forefathers. Otherwise his claims will only invite unfavorable comment. Jesus acknowledges the Abrahamic relationship of his company, but denies their spiritual kinship with the "father of the faithful," with whom the history of their nation starts. They are a degenerate race; their plotting to remove Christ would cause Abraham, if he could see them now, to recoil from them with horror. Jesus reveals his heavenly origin by his heavenly speech and action. So do his hearers reveal their parentage by what they say and do. But Abraham is not the person with whom such an attitude toward Christ as that which these Jews displayed began. Faith in the future Messiah who should spring from his race is the greatest glory of Abraham and every true child of Abraham.

MONDAY, December 21. John 8: 39-41. "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham. But now ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which I have heard of God: this did not Abraham. Ye do the deeds of your father." The sentiment which our Lord expresses by these words is plain from the preceding meditation. But there is an instructive suggestion contained in the remark: "Thus did not Abraham." This implies that the Lord endorses the example of his saints as a guide to such as claim fellowship with the saints. There is much saint-worship, even outside of the Roman Church. The best kind of saint-worship is to do as the saints did, and to refuse to do what the saints did not do. The lives of the saints are object-lessons of the workings of divine grace in a human heart. They exemplify, and thus help to enforce, the teachings of Scripture on a given point. Beyond that, the saints can be of no benefit. The Jews prided themselves on their descent from Abraham. Jesus tells them: Abraham was a good man, indeed; but you are not. Your unhappy relation to the most cherished object of Abraham's devotion—to me—is a disgrace to Abraham, who must of necessity acknowledge you his natural offspring. "Thus did not Abraham." Substitute for Abraham the name of any other saint, more nearly related to you, and apply the lesson. Indulge not in stupid ancestor-worship, but reproduce the ancestors in your own lives, or rather, let the Spirit that was active in the ancestors be the determining factor in your own lives. Then shall you add luster to their fair name in the church of God, and not cheat men with a stolen glory.

TUESDAY, December 22. John 8: 42, 43. "If God were your Father, ye would love me: for I proceeded forth and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me. Why do ye not understand my speech? even because ye cannot hear my word." The Jews, always misinterpreting the spiritual tenor and bearing of the Lord's remarks, had understood Jesus as denying their Hebrew extraction. That would mean that they were pagans. Revolting thought! They turn upon our Lord, strenuously insisting that they "have one Father, even God." Jesus tells them that he is best qualified to tell God's offspring, because he himself came forth from God. He is the Son of God by eternal generation, "begotten of the Father from eternity." He became man, being "born of the Virgin Mary." All Christendom in these days rejoices over this blessed fact. According to the flesh, he is our kith and kin. And by his remarks in our text, he fairly invites this thought. He tells the Jews, in effect, that if they were God's children, he would know them as his brothers, and they would know him. The family tie would in some way assert itself. But it does not: they stumble at his speech. He does not speak their vernacular. They hear his words, but always manage to put a meaning into them that he did not intend. The reason is because they do not hear his word, they fail to grasp the divine communication that is conveyed by his speech. Oh, may the King of heaven, the great Lord Omnipotent, not be forced to say such words as these to us! As we come to worship him again with the host of the faithful in all zones and climes at the impending memorial of his blessed nativity, may he greet every one of us as his brother, and may we look up to him, the incarnate Son of God, our Elder Brother, our Protector against every foe.

WEDNESDAY, December 23. John 8: 44. "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it." In such terrible terms the Lord expresses the climax of this speech in which he has repudiated the claim of the Jews that their historical and religious kinship with Abraham linked them forever with the Father in heaven, the true God. Truly, "there is no more terrible rebuke in the whole compass of revelation." John—the same writer who has recorded the words before us—has declared: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." At the opening of his public ministry Jesus had defeated the onslaught which the spirit of darkness made upon him personally. His whole ministry had been devoted to revealing the deceptive and destructive character of the operations of the devil among men. The present incident, which happened in the holy city, in the shadow of the great temple, in the presence of the representatives of the Jewish church, is one of the greatest unmaskings of the vicious disposition of the evil one and his fell power over men, which the Lord has undertaken. It is genuine Saviour's work which he has performed by this awful arraignment of the haughty representatives of a decadent faith. We shudder at the words, but we thank the Speaker with all our heart for uttering them. It was for such deeds too that he came into this world. His incarnation was heaven's declaration of war upon the spirit of age-long murder and the father of lies. At the sight of the manger of Bethlehem the legions of hell must quail.

THURSDAY, December 24. John 8: 45. "And because I tell you the truth, ye believe me not." To the class of men with whom Jesus had to do in this conversation he could not have commended himself in any other way than by telling falsehoods. Living as they did in a state of estrangement from God, having wilfully surrendered themselves to the powers of darkness, and having made opposition to God and his Word their vital element, they could not listen to Jesus with patience and profit. Without directly attacking them, he spoke things that they must resent. He could not speak anything but truth, and they could not but hate him for it. One of our American poets has sung regarding the miracle of the nativity: "And in the darkness shineth the Everlasting Light." The heavenly Visitor who came to pitch his tent among the dwellings of men entered upon no pleasant situation. The supineness and stupidity which men revealed at the place and hour of his birth foreshadowed their attitude toward him to the end of his life. He knew all this in advance, but that did not stop him from coming. He came to set the torch of truth ablaze in the midst of this world's darkness of ignorance, falsehood and superstition—a darkness that had crept up from the infernal regions. We love and worship Jesus our Lord as the heavenly Truth-bearer. He came, as Isaiah had prophetically foreseen, to Zabulon and Nephthalim and Galilee of the Gentiles, and thence to every part of this world; and wherever he has come, the people which sat in darkness have seen a great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up. We believe him, because he tells us the truth. Thank God for that!

FRIDAY, December 25. John 8: 46. "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" The Man who thus challenges the closest scrutiny of his life by his bitterest enemies would have spoken recklessly if, being a mere man, he had asserted his sinlessness. For "there is not a just man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not." But also this word of Jesus is truth. Let the investigation be carried to his very origin. The season fairly invites this. The Babe born in Bethlehem is hailed in one of the oldest Christmas songs thus:

> The serpent's wound he beareth not,
> Yet takes our blood, and shares our lot.
> Our human flesh he enters in,
> But bears no single taint of sin.

In the person of Jesus Christ a sinless man has once more appeared on earth. He is "that holy thing," as the angel Gabriel expressed it; he is not "flesh born from flesh." And, unlike Adam, he retained his perfect sinlessness to the end. "He knew no sin," though he bore all sin. A sinless life was given to reclaim sinners. That is God's splendid Christmas gift to the whole world.

> Now praise we Christ, the Holy One,
> The spotless Virgin Mary's Son,
> Far as the blessed sun doth shine,
> E'en to the world's remote confine.
> All honor unto Christ be paid,
> Pure offspring of the holy maid,
> With Father and with Holy Ghost,
> Till time in endless time be lost.

SATURDAY, December 26. John 8: 46, 47. "And if I say the truth, why do ye not believe me? He that is of God heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God." The reason why men do not believe in Christ is not because he has not sufficiently revealed himself, or because there is some moral crookedness in him. He has told men the truth faultlessly, and he is himself faultless. The reason is because the holy, truthful Jesus and sinful, lying men, like the Jews in the present instance, belong to two different races. Any one who is of God, that is, any person who by repentance and faith has been born into that new life which makes him a child of God by the Spirit of grace, has no difficulty in understanding and believing what Jesus says. That is one of the marks, perhaps the greatest and noblest mark, of a regenerate person: that he "hears" God's word—hears it not with his outward ears only, but with the inward ear of faith, so as to give his cordial assent to all that the Word of God says to him, and to rest his full confidence in every matter of doctrine, as regards every rule of conduct, in every situation of life, on the statement which the Word of God makes to him. It is the voice of his heavenly Father that he hears speaking to him at all times out of the Holy Scriptures: now it teaches him, now it warns him, now it reproves him, now it comforts him, now it encourages him and makes him strong. He loves to hear that voice, for by continuous hearing it has become so familiar to him that he would understand it even if it were to be uttered in a faint whisper and conveying a vague suggestion. With the new birth he has received a child's instinct to readily grasp what his Father says to him.

DENOMINATIONAL NOTES OF INTEREST FROM THE FIELD

ON TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, the executive committee of the American Lutheran Publicity Bureau met at its permanent office, Redeemer Church, 422 West Forty-fourth Street, New York, Rev. Karl Kretzmann in the chair. The secretary, Rev. Paul Lindemann, Jersey City, read a number of interesting letters from prominent ministers and laymen, who signified their consent to act as vice-presidents of the organization. The Lutheran Church, of which the Synodical Conference is the largest and most conservative segment, has in late years made remarkable gains. The pamphlet prepared for the religious celebration of New York's tercentenary said that "the outstanding fact in the growth of the churches in New York City is the tremendous growth of the Lutheran Church." The same conditions prevail in more marked degree in some parts of the great West.

MR. MCAFEE, SECRETARY of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, who recently returned from a visit to the field in Alaska, has this to say about the natives there: "It seems inconceivable that while so much has been done for the Indians of the plains, for the people of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, in the way of care and sanitation, these natives who have been the wards of our country for nearly forty years should be almost entirely neglected. I found conditions among Alaska Indians far worse than anything that I had ever seen before—far worse than the disease and poverty that exist in our cities' slums, or among the natives of Porto Rico. On the coast of southeastern Alaska tuberculosis and the infectious eye disease trachoma prevailed in almost every home. The government has provided no hospital for Alaska natives, no home for the aged or incurable. Our hospital at Haines is the only one."

—DR. AND MRS. WILLIAM LOWTHER, missionaries of the Methodist Church in North Africa, have just arrived in New York and tell a thrilling narrative. They were in their home in Oran, Algeria, when the war broke out. This part of North Africa is under French control. Spies were thick as hops and everywhere, and it is not surprising that missionaries, with no reason at all, should be suspected of being German spies. Twice the search was made by the chief of police in the missionary home for compromising papers. The magic lantern found was at once believed to be used to throw colored signals out to sea. Dr. Lowther's correspondence, carried on in six languages, was seized by the French officers, but finally restored through the American consul. Owing to health conditions the Lowthers started for America by way of France, when to their surprise they were again mistaken for German spies and arrested at Marseilles. The American consul secured their freedom, and they proceeded to New York without further incident. The cross-Atlantic trip covered seventeen days.

ALL THE WORLD MUST HELP

CONDITIONS IN THE SMITTEN COUNTRIES OF EUROPE SURPASS ALL ESTIMATES OF NEED

EVERY agency of relief is bending its energies to the unprecedented task that the situation in Belgium, particularly, and in Servia and other sections of Europe presents. It is becoming apparent that millions must be supported by charity throughout the winter, and the work will have to be done in a most systematic manner. It behooves all who would have a part in this great work to arrange, if possible, to make successive donations through the winter to the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the War wherever found. At present our help is being applied almost wholly in Belgium, but this fund is for indiscriminate relief work among widows and orphans, excepting where donors specifically mention the country in which their gift must be expended. The fund now amounts to $81,170.12 at noon of Thursday, December 3. This is a large amount for this distinctive work, but very far short of what is needed at once, and we urge our readers to respond mightily to this pitiful call for help.

WE REPRODUCE on this page a remarkable letter received from the Post Office Department containing the two original one-hundred-dollar bills mentioned by the postmaster general. If space permitted we could print many equally interesting though quite different letters which accompany gifts to this fund. One such letter reads: "I am pleased to send and you will no doubt be pleased to receive a check for $240 for the Belgian widows and orphans from the citizens of De Smet, S. D. I am eighty-four years of age; Mrs. Couse is eighty. I having been a soldier for three years in our Civil War, we know something of the devastation and sorrow of war. I know what it is to suffer the pangs of hunger and we trust our modest donation will relieve much suffering." Signed, E. H. Couse. This letter contained a list headed "we will give to the starving Belgian widows and orphans through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in New York," and then followed fifty-four names and the amount each had given, our correspondent and his wife heading the list with a liberal sum.

Another letter is from Platteville, Neb., enclosing $26.48, the proceeds of a school entertainment gotten up by the teacher and sent to the fund with "heart and soul in the cause." The Woman's Club of Ridgefield Park, N. J., sent $40 raised in a similar way; and from Rev. A. G. Wilson, chaplain of the Wisconsin State Prison, a gift of $30.40 was received donated by a group of sixty-two prisoners.

The Sunday school in connection with the Pawnee Training School at Pawnee, Okla., raised $20.06 for this fund, and enclosed it with a postal card picture of the school children. It adds stimulus to the arduous duties connected with work of this nature to look into the faces of a small and perhaps struggling Sunday school and realize that they, too, are making sacrifices that this good work may increase. By the Reformed Church at Griggstown, N. J., composed of about thirty families, $41 was contributed for the widows and orphans in Belgium at the Thanksgiving morning service. Many contributions come from families of Civil War veterans and many others from homes that have experienced privation and know what help in time of need really means.

GOOD friends, why not give to the widows and orphans of the war a percentage of each sum we spend for Christmas gifts? When you buy your boy a two-dollar sled why not call it two dollars and a half and put the fifty cents in the Christmas war tax? Add five dollars to your wife's gift in this way. Ten cents to the price of a toy, twenty-five cents to that of a book. Why, if all our readers were to act upon this suggestion—well, words can't tell what it means to make a hundred thousand fatherless children happy on Christmas day.

Please address all remittances to the Widows and Orphans Fund, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT · UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

I

Office of the Postmaster General
Washington, D. C.

November 25, 1914.

The Christian Herald, New York City.

GENTLEMEN: The following anonymous communication was received in the department under date of November 23 in an envelope postmarked at St. Paul, Minn., November 20, 1914, 3 P.M.:

Postmaster General.

Some time in the years 1858 to 1861, inclusive, there was a reg. letter lost in the mail in Minnesota containing $35 in currency. The person who took it, being near his end, desires if possible to make restitution, and wishes me to send you the inclosed $200 to be paid to him or his heirs, if they can be found, for principal and int. The letter was directed to some foreigner, presumably Ger. or Norg. in the then N. W. Min., that is N. and W. of Saint Paul. If in the records of your office such a person can be found who lost such a sum at that time please pay the money over to him or them. If no trace can be found of him in a reasonable time it is his wish that the money be turned over to the Christian Herald Fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the war in Europe.

Inasmuch as there are no records in the department covering the loss of mail during the period mentioned and the name of the party suffering this loss cannot, therefore, be ascertained, I am forwarding the amount to you as requested by the writer of the letter for credit to your fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the war in Europe.

It is requested that you kindly acknowledge receipt of the inclosed $200, which consists of two one-hundred-dollar bills (gold certificate No. D93088, check letter D, Department Series, and National Bank note No. A346283, check letter A, Series of 1902, serial No. P8504).

Yours very truly,
(Signed) A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Copyright, 1914, by ELEANOR H. PORTER. All rights reserved, including the right to translate into all foreign language.

[SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS TAKEN PLACE. The nurse, Della Wetherby (who was Pollyanna's good friend in Dr. Ames's sanatorium), prevails upon her wealthy sister, Mrs. Carew, of Boston, who lives almost as a recluse in sorrow over the disappearance years before of a little nephew, Jamie, to permit Pollyanna to come and visit her, Miss Wetherby feeling sure in her heart that the result will be Mrs. Carew's restoration to happiness. The letter of invitation is received by Pollyanna's aunt, Mrs. Chilton, in Beldingsville, together with a letter from Dr. Ames, urging that Pollyanna be allowed to make the visit. Dr. Chilton has been planning a winter's study in Europe and wishes his wife's company. So they decide to let Pollyanna go. She is greatly delighted with Mrs. Carew's magnificent home on Commonwealth Avenue, and persuades her to open all the shades so that she may see the beautiful rooms. Once she wheedles Mrs. Carew into putting on a costly dress, long disused, and decking herself out in all her jewels, the rich woman not realizing how her strange little guest is already changing her house and herself. Pollyanna goes to school during the week and on Saturday enters the park and strays about, thinking a great party is going on. After many rebuffs she finds a tramp, a convict just released from jail, and enters into conversation with him.]

CHAPTER V

"HUMPH! Well, I'm sure I'm flattered," smiled the man, ironically. Though his face and words expressed polite doubt, it might have been noticed that he sat a little straighter on the bench. "And, pray, what shall we talk about?"

"It's—it's infinitesimal to me. That means I don't care, doesn't it?" asked Pollyanna, with a beaming smile. "Aunt Polly says that whatever I talk about, anyhow, I always bring up the Ladies' Aiders. But I reckon that's because they brought me up first, don't you? We might talk about the party. I think it's a perfectly beautiful party—now that I know some one."

"P-party?"

"Yes—this, you know—all these people here today. It is a party, isn't it? The lady said it was for everybody, so I stayed—though I haven't got to where the house is yet that's giving the party."

The man's lips twitched.

"Well, little lady, perhaps it is a party, in a way," he smiled; "but the 'house' that's giving it is the city of Boston. This is the Public Garden—a public park, you understand, for everybody."

"It is? Always? And I may come here any time I want to? Oh, how perfectly lovely! That's even nicer than I thought it could be. I'd worried for fear I couldn't ever come again, after today, you see. I'm glad now, though, that I didn't know it just at the first, for it's all the nicer now. Nice things are nicer when you've been worrying for fear they won't be nice, aren't they?"

"Perhaps they are—if they ever turn out to be nice at all," conceded the man, a little gloomily.

"Yes, I think so," nodded Pollyanna, not noticing the gloom. "But isn't it beautiful—here?" she gloried. "I wonder if Mrs. Carew knows about it—that it's for anybody, so. Why, I should think everybody would want to come here all the time, and just stay and look around."

The man's face hardened.

"Well, there are a few people in the world who have got a job—who've got something to do besides just to come here and stay and look around; but I don't happen to be one of them."

"Don't you? Then you can be glad for that, can't you?" sighed Pollyanna, her eyes following a passing boat.

The man's lips parted indignantly, but no words came. Pollyanna was still talking.

"I wish I didn't have anything to do but that. I have got to go to school. Oh, I like school; but there's such a whole lot of things I like better. Still, I'm glad I can go to school. I'm 'specially glad when I remember how last winter I didn't think I could ever go again. You see I lost my legs for a while—I mean, they didn't go; and you know you never know how much you use things till you don't have 'em. And eyes, too. Did you ever think what a lot you do with eyes? I didn't till I went to the Sanatorium. There was a lady there who had just got blind the year before. I tried to get her to play the game—finding something to be glad about, you know—but she said she couldn't, and if I wanted to know why, I might tie up my eyes with my handkerchief for just one hour. And I did. It was awful. Did you ever try it?"

"Why, n-no, I didn't." A half-vexed, half-baffled expression was coming to the man's face.

"Well, don't. It's awful. You can't do anything—not anything that you want to do. But I kept it on the whole hour. Since then I've been so glad, sometimes—when I see something perfectly lovely like this, you know—I've been so glad I wanted to cry—'cause I could see it, you know. She's playing the game now, though—that blind lady is. Miss Wetherby told me."

"The—game?"

"Yes; the glad game. Didn't I tell you? Finding something in everything to be glad about. Well, she's found it now—about her eyes, you know. Her husband is the kind of a man that goes to help make the laws, and she had him ask for one that would help blind people, 'specially little babies. And she went herself and talked, and told those men how it felt to be blind. And they made it—the law. And they said that she did more than anybody else, even her husband, to help make it, and they didn't believe there would have been any law at all if it hadn't been for her. So now she says she's glad she lost her eyes, 'cause she's kept so many little babies from growing up to be blind like her. So you see she's playing it—the game. But I reckon you don't know about the game yet, after all; so I'll tell you. It started this way." And Pollyanna, with her eyes on the shimmering beauty all about her, told of the little pair of crutches of long ago, which should have been a doll.

When the story was finished there was a long silence; then, a little abruptly, the man got to his feet.

"Oh, are you going away now?" she asked in open disappointment.

"Yes, I'm going now." He smiled down at her a little queerly.

"But you're coming back sometime?"

He shook his head—but again he smiled.

"I hope not—and I believe not, little girl. You see, I've made a great discovery today. I thought I was down and out. I thought there was no place for me anywhere—now. But I've just discovered that I've got two eyes, two arms and two legs. Now I'm going to use them—and I'm going to make somebody understand that I know how to use them!"

The next moment he was gone.

"Why, what a funny man!" mused Pollyanna. "Still, he was nice—and he was different, too," she finished, rising to her feet and resuming her walk.

Pollyanna was now once more her usual cheerful self, and she stepped with the confident assurance of one who has no doubt. Had not the man said that this was a public park and that she had as good a right as anybody to be there? She walked nearer to the pond and crossed the bridge to the starting place of the little boats. For some time she watched the children happily, keeping a particularly sharp lookout for the possible black curls of Susie Smith. She would have liked to take a ride in the pretty boats herself, but the sign said "Five cents" a trip, and she did not have any money with her. She smiled hopefully into the faces of several women and twice she spoke tentatively. But no one spoke first to her, and those whom she addressed eyed her coldly and made scant response.

After a time she turned her steps into still another path. Here she found a white-faced boy in a wheel chair. She would have spoken to him, but he was so absorbed in his book that she turned away after a moment's wistful gazing. Soon then she came upon a young woman sitting alone, staring at nothing, very much as the man had sat. With a contented little cry Pollyanna hurried forward.

"Oh, how do you do?" she beamed. "I'm so glad I found you. I've been hunting ever so long for you," she asserted, dropping herself down on the unoccupied end of the bench.

The young woman turned with a start, an eager look of expectancy in her eyes.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, falling back in plain disappointment. "I thought—why, what do you mean?" she demanded aggrievedly. I never set eyes on you before in my life."

"No, I didn't you, either," smiled Pollyanna; "but I've been hunting for you, just the same. That is, of course I didn't know you were going to be you, exactly. It's just that I wanted to find someone that looked lonesome, and that didn't have anybody. Like me, you know. So many here today have got folks. See?"

"Yes, I see," nodded the girl, falling back into her old listlessness. "But, poor little kid, it's too bad you should find it out—so soon."

"Find what out?"

"That the lonesomest place in all the world is in a crowd in a big city."

Pollyanna frowned and pondered.

"Is it? I don't see how it can be. I don't see how you can be lonesome when you've got folks all around you. Still—" she hesitated, and the frown deepened. "I was lonesome this afternoon, and there were folks all around me; only they didn't seem to—to think—or notice."

The young woman smiled bitterly.

"That's just it. They don't ever think—or notice, crowds don't."

"But some folks do. We can be glad some do," urged Pollyanna. "Now, when I—"

"Oh, yes, some do," interrupted the other. As she spoke she shivered and looked fearfully down the path beyond Pollyanna. "Some notice—too much."

Pollyanna shrank back in dismay. Repeated rebuffs that afternoon had given her a new sensitiveness.

"Do you mean—me?" she stammered. "That you wished I hadn't—noticed—you?"

"No, no, kiddie! I meant—some one quite different from you. Some one that hadn't ought to notice. I was glad to have you speak, only—I thought at first it was some one from home."

"Oh, then, you don't live here, either any more than I do—I mean, for keeps."

"Oh, yes, I live here now," sighed the young woman; "that is, if you can call it living—what I do."

"What do you do?" asked Pollyanna interestedly.

"Do? I'll tell you what I do," cried the other, with sudden bitterness. "From morning till night I sell fluffy laces and perky bows to girls that

Winter and Unemployment

ALTHOUGH the winter opens mildly, there is already an unusual amount of suffering, especially in the crowded cities, which will increase as the season advances. In New York it is estimated that there are some half a million unemployed. Various philanthropies are considering the best methods of relieving the sufferings of the poor. In the old Bowery Mission, which is always a busy center of winter activity, the applications for food, shelter and employment are far in excess of those in recent years. From the opening day, the Bread Line has been phenomenally large, and the thousands who stand waiting in the cold to be admitted to the "midnight breakfast" testify with mute but convincing eloquence to the widespread want which prevails among the unemployed and homeless. The Free Labor Bureau is overrun with applicants for work. There is also an unusual pressure for help from poor families of the sort that rarely come before the public to plead for charity, but who have been driven to that extreme step by sheer want. These are some of the urgent problems with which the Mission has to contend this winter. It is a good time for all of us to ask ourselves how we may best help these unfortunates. They are our brothers. While we have been giving to the whole world a splendid demonstration of American generosity and sympathy for the sufferers in Europe, we must not forget that there are sufferers here at home, many thousands of them, who, right at our own doors and within the sound of our church bells, are just as surely facing starvation as the sufferers across the sea.

We confidently believe that the period of industrial depression and commercial distrust is passing and that the sun of prosperity will soon strike through the clouds. With faith in God, we can look forward hopefully. Let us help the weaker ones to do the same. As Christmas approaches, in commemoration of the world's greatest Gift, let us not forget the unfortunates—those who seem somehow to have missed the right road to happiness and prosperity. By doing this, our own home life will be made all the sweeter and the memory of our seasonable kindness will not soon be forgotten by those we may be able to help.

A Time for Discretion

ONE little sentence in a recent deliverance by ex-President Taft on the subject of neutrality seems to have let loose a whole Pandora box of imaginary troubles. It was his remark on the possibilities of a Canadian invasion. Taking his cue as a text, various Congressmen, professors and preachers have begun to "sound the alarm" in the true jingo style and to urge an immediate increase of our national armament in anticipation of possibilities. One highly imaginative preacher sees on the horizon a holy war of world-wide extent that will involve the United States, and which will so far eclipse the present European conflict as to make it appear a mere overture. This is a good time for men in public life to keep their heads, and to restrain the temptation to high-sounding but foolish utterances. Our government is keeping abreast of events, and whatever is necessary for the national security will not be neglected. President Wilson has been importuned from many quarters on this subject. He very logically takes the ground that to begin preparations now on a scale that would seem to imply belief in the possibility of our nation becoming involved, might impair our availability as a peace maker when the opportunity of such a service arrives. The wise policy is to be ready, either way, and we trust to the patriotism and wisdom of those at the head of public affairs to follow such a course. But nothing is to be gained by utterances that are calculated to inflame the public mind. The best things are accomplished in moderation and silence.

For America's Good Health

"WHEN the American Public Health Association was organized in 1872, public hygiene was not a new science, but it had rather substantial backing of law and the support of public opinion." These words, addressed by President William C. Woodward at the opening, on November 30, at Jacksonville, Fla., of the forty-second annual convention of the American Public Health Association, indicate how far the work of organized health protection has advanced in these two score and ten years.

The society represents the health work of the United States, Canada, Mexico and Cuba. Great progress has been made in public interest and effort for the prevention and conquest of tuberculosis and the prevention of infant mortality and for health conditions in Mexico and the Island Republic. Dr. Woodward pointed out the advantage of bringing all the private organizations engaged in health work into active co-operation, with the possible ultimate hope of "making them component parts of a big, efficient public health machine, with an adequate corps of office assistants and field workers."

The Public Health Association represents another effort to bring the benefits of intelligence and skill to the people. The country has been stirred by the reports of the havoc of tuberculosis and of the pitiful and needless wasting of infant life because of inadequate information and care. Yet it often happens that the people themselves who need the instruction and help of experts and welfare workers are indifferent, and neglect to seek and follow the advice offered. The people must be aroused to a keener desire for health and a more vigorous determination to bring the knowledge and help of experts to their service. The work of the American Public Health Association will do much to produce these results and to make the North Americans a race of healthy and happy boys and girls and sturdy, long-lived men and women.

Minister Whitlock on Belgian Relief

THERE has been so much that is sensational and misleading in the cable despatches relative to the attitude of the German authorities in Belgium on the relief question, that it is gratifying to the American people generally to have the reassuring message on the subject from United States Minister Brand Whitlock, which he cabled to the American Relief Commission on November 30. First, he promptly discredited as unauthorized and irresponsible all of the published statements implying official indifference. Then in a single paragraph he authoritatively stated the German official attitude in these words:

"The German Government renews its official declaration that conditions in Belgium are as represented, and views with great gratification the generous efforts of the American people to relieve the starving population there. Without such assistance there must be famine, and I again repeat my expression of regret that cruelly reckless statements should be allowed to imperil the great work which the generosity of the American people is carrying on among a population so deeply in distress."

This should be a sufficient answer to the sensation-mongers who have been using the cables to create doubts in the minds of benevolently disposed Americans as to whether the relief they are sending to the Belgians was really welcome and would reach those for whom it was intended. Minister Whitlock, who is right at the center of the relief work, and a member of the Relief Committee, certainly knows if anybody does. Our own information is that up to the present time every necessary facility has been extended to the workers and the distribution has proceeded systematicaly and satisfactorily.

Furthermore, the American Belgian Relief Committee has cabled an emphatic denial of the mendacious report that a tax of $2.60 per 100 kilograms had been imposed upon the flour sent from this country for the relief of the suffering Belgians. Every ounce of the foodstuffs reached its proper destination untaxed and undiminished.

Our Widespread Family

TWO members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD editorial staff recently made a trip together to the Middle West. As they sat looking from the car window upon the farms and villages and towns through which the train passed, they suddenly realized that though they were going away from their own homes they were traveling among homes where their paper was known and loved and where they themselves could hardly be accounted strangers. They liked to think of the many houses in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be found upon the table; they liked to realize that in every post office some copies would be found on distribution day. Probably there was not a moment of the journey when there was not, within seeing distance, some home in which a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could be found. They would like to have had magic eyes to see these papers scattered among these myriad homes along the way.

Mile after mile, State after State, the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family spread before their vision. What possibilities for service! What possibilities for truth-finding! What possibilities for public reform and betterment! What possibilities for achievement in bringing the world to its Saviour!

Now we are drawing near the end of another year. The journey through its months is ending, as that railway journey came at last to an end. The holiday season approaches—Christmas and the New Year. Shall not the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, as it makes ready to celebrate the birthday of the great World Friend whose name it bears, and to welcome the new year which is to be numbered from the year in which he was born, "highly resolve" to make 1915 in reality the best of all the years? May its members throughout America and the world be linked in closer fellowship than ever before! May their efforts be more than ever fruitful to spread the brotherhood of Jesus till it shall compass all the world! May their achievements for the Master and his world surpass all the records of the past!

A Son of the Sea

NEARLY thirty years ago, a middle-aged, studious-looking American naval officer was in the port of Lima, Peru, with his squadron. While reading a volume of Mommsen in the American Club, he was impressed with the idea that the great historian, in describing the career of Hannibal, had wholly overlooked the all-important influence of the crude naval forces of those days upon the destinies of the famous Carthaginian leader. Then, looking into the future, he glimpsed the almost limitless possibilities of a systematic development of maritime strength in the hands of an ambitious and aggressive nation. He foresaw that the coming struggle would be for the mastery of the world's waterways of communication—for "sea-power." Involuntarily he repeated the phrase his brain had coined—a new word, which was destined to set a mark for the nations. Such is the story that is told of the emergence of Francis Thayer Mahan from comparative obscurity to world fame. It was this thought and what followed that made him America's foremost naval strategist and the world's greatest authority on "sea-power."

It is now a quarter of a century since his famous book on The Influence of Sea-Power Upon History appeared. It was read universally, and it is said that Emperor William, almost immediately after its publication, had it translated and that it, more than anything else, is responsible for the German navy of today. Not one navy, but all the leading navies may be said to owe their development to the same inspiration. The word "sea-power" became a term which held a compelling fascination. It led to the international rivalry in the creation of huge navies. It was Mahan's influence which may be said to have created, not only the navy of Germany, but those of France, Japan and Italy.

Rear Admiral Mahan passed away lately full of years and honors. Although, until his retirement, his whole life had been spent in the navy, he was not an advocate of war, but a lover of peace. Although his gospel of "sea-power" was utilized by ambitious governments to build up a tremendous aggressive system of floating fortresses of iron and steel, he himself regarded "sea-power" as not to be used as a menace, but rather as a guarantee of peace and security. He believed in a strong navy as a safeguard of the integrity of our dominions and of the peace of our people. He held that a country with vast coast lines like ours could be rendered secure only by the judicious development of its sea-power. Among the score or more of books he wrote, probably no one is of greater interest than that which appeared in 1897 entitled The Interest of the United States in Sea-Power. He was a delegate from this country to the Hague Conference in 1899.

There are doubtless some who will question whether the world has been bettered or not by certain great discoveries. Ericsson's Monitor led to the modern battleship, and Wilbur Wright's "glider" was the crude forerunner of the fighting aeroplane. So "sea-power," which its discoverer destined for peace, has been turned into a means of destruction. The late admiral was kindly and sympathetic, and must have regarded the unexpected development of his idea as something foreign to his first expectation. He was himself a victim of the war, as his death was said to have been hastened by overstudy of the strategic problems presented by the great struggle now progressing in Europe. He deserves to be remembered with honor, not for what others did with his idea, but for what he himself dreamed of as the beneficent and humane possibilities of sea-power in the hands of civilized nations.

Conscience Prompts Restitution

THERE is a something within us which rebukes us when we do wrong and smiles approvingly upon us when we do right. There are some wrongs to others where there can be no restitution; there are others where it can and must be made if conscience would be relieved or preparation be made for the settlement for the last day. This man showed wisdom in selecting a most urgent charity as the recipient of his repayments. The Mosiac law of restitution, of adding interest to principal, was recognized when the man sent in $200 instead of the $35 taken. "He shall restore that which he took violently away, or the thing which he hath deceitfully gotten, or that which was delivered him to keep, or the lost thing which he found; he shall even restore it in the principal and shall add the fifth part more thereto, and give it unto him to whom it appertaineth, in the day of his trespass offering." (Lev. 6: 4, 5.)

Telephone Heroine

THERE was a fierce fire in a mammoth apartment hotel in one of the cities the other day, which spread rapidly and threatened the destruction of many lives. Though the house was full of fire and smoke the telephone girl refused to leave, but stuck to her post till she had sent the alarm to every room in the house. All made their escape, when certainly some would have been lost had it not been for her heroic service. There are heroines and heroes everywhere in the humble walks of life, only awaiting an opportunity to show their courage and loyalty. The warning the telephone girl gave to the guests was in imitation of this warning to flee from destruction in olden times: "Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed." (Gen. 19: 17.)

A Hornets' Nest

A PIANO manufacturer had been spending one of the beautiful days in November at his country club at Cherry Grove Beach, and was returning home on a Long Island train. He had secured as a trophy a hornets' nest, which he was taking home as a curiosity, and had put it up in the parcel rack of the car. The conductor, who remarked on the beautiful day for the time of the year, was just collecting the fare when a large man in the rear of the car cried out and began to dance in agony; others, including the conductor, followed his example until at least a dozen persons had been stung. The passengers began a mad rush to get out of the car. The warmth had thawed out the insects, and at least half of the swarm came out of the nest and attacked every one. The conductor informed the owner that he would be compelled to get off with his pets, as there was not room in the car for all. There are human hornets, with their stings of bitterness, malice, criticism and slander, to annoy, and hurt, and poison their fellows. The Almighty made hornets drive away the enemies of Israel. "And I sent the hornet before you, which drave them out from before you, even the two kings of the Amorites; but not with thy sword, nor with thy bow." (Joshua 24: 12.)

What Word Means Most?

AN EDITORIAL in a leading newspaper asks this question: "What word means the most to you?" and in it prints the letter of a correspondent who names five words which he considers the most comprehensive in the English language. They are: Peace, Truth, Love, Charity, Liberty. Man has been distinguished as the "talking animal." Parrots and other animals have been taught to pronounce a few human words in imitation, and many irrational creatures have a way of making their thoughts and wants known, but man is the only one who communicates with words or signs of ideas. The faculty of language increases as man advances in the scale of being. Among millions in savage tribes there are perhaps not more than two or three hundred words used, while the best dictionaries of the most civilized races include nearly a half million words. There are so many great words that to reduce the choice to five would be to give but one out of a hundred thousand. We would suggest these five: Truth, Love, Holiness, Duty, Life. They are so all-embracing. God is the author of truth, the source of love, the cause of holiness, righteousness, and justice, and the fountain of life physical, mental, moral, spiritual and eternal. We name one word that includes the five, or the five hundred thousand as the greatest; it is Jesus, who is the way, the truth and the life, and who came to express to our world the person and attributes of God as revealed in that all-inclusive "Word" the Bible, and in the description of whom John forgets all the other signs of ideas, calling him "The Word." "And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." (John 1: 14.)

SCHOONER WRECKED ON PACIFIC COAST Copyright, International News Service

THE schooner Hanalei, one of the small vessels carrying freight and passengers along our Western coast, struck on the Duxbury Reef about nine miles north of San Francisco on November 22, and was completely broken up by the pounding of the waves. The wreckage was washed ashore with some of the bodies of the twenty persons said to have lost their lives. There were about sixty persons aboard, twenty-eight of whom were passengers, and in attempting to rescue them five members of a life-saving crew perished. A heavy fog and approaching night shut off the ship after the accident so that other vessels could not get near the Hanalei. The crew of the Golden Gate Life Saving Station undertook the rescues, the wreck lying only a few hundred yards off shore. During the night the cries of the passengers were heard on shore. The wreck is one of the saddest for many years, and the efforts at rescue were attended by acts of unusual heroism. With the wreckage that floated ashore were small boats from the schooner, upside down, and a life raft. The shores of time are strewn with the wrecks of ships with valuable freight and precious lives. Some of the rocks are in sight and the wind and tide drive the disabled vessel against them, others are hidden and the fatal leaks are sprung. Christ is the harbor into which the storm-tossed souls of men find a haven of safety. Conscience and faith are the seamen that steer the ship safely into the port. The thought is thus expressed by the apostle: "Holding faith, and a good conscience; which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck." (I Tim. 1: 19.)

Jews as Farmers

MANY Jews are going out into the country and buying and successfully cultivating farms in a number of States. The sixth annual convention of the Federation of Jewish Farmers of America was held the other day and plans were discussed and agreed upon for the increase of the crops and the marketing of them to the greater profit of both producer and consumer. This Jewish Federation has a membership of 1,400 farmers, with sixty-three branch organizations in eleven States. Originally the Hebrews were tillers of the soil. They raised and sold farm products and vast herds of cattle and flocks of sheep. In their wanderings throughout the earth they largely abandoned farming and adopted a business life, drifting into the cities where the opportunities for accumulation were better. There was this promise to the ancient Hebrew farmer: "If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments and do them, then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit." (Lev. 26: 3, 4.)

Gunmen Kill Poultry Dealer

MR. BARNET BAFF, a wealthy poultry dealer of New York City, was called out of his place of business and slain a few days ago. He was a chief witness against some of the members of the Poultry Trust, twelve of whom had been sent to prison. Suspicion was immediately directed to some of these rivals in trade and to a gang of gunmen they had supposedly hired to do the killing, but the police have not yet ferreted out the criminals. It is claimed that a scale of fees exists from $500 down to $50 for such killings. A few days after the Baff murder a gunman thought to be a "squealer" was shot. This was a new clue to the assassins of Baff. It would have been thought the conviction by District Attorney Whitman of the man who hired the gunmen to kill Herman Rosenthal, and the men that were implicated in the crime, and their execution at Sing Sing, would have put an end to such diabolical doings. We doubt whether there is another city in America where the cold business of killing is carried on for money. Mayor Mitchel says the reign of terror shall end. Let the murderers of Baff be found and punished. Let every gunman be watched and hunted, for they are not unknown to the police, and let the city be cleared of them at once. Nowhere on earth can we find a more striking illustration of the words of the apostle: "For the love of money is the root of all evil." (I Tim. 6: 10.)

Merciful Surgery

A TELEGRAM from Copenhagen announces that a Danish surgeon has invented a new device which photographs the interior of the stomach through the mouth, thus enabling doctors to locate cancers, ulcers and other abnormal affections. The claim is made that the invention has been tested and has proven successful. If this claim shall be sustained we will have another one of the many surgical discoveries that have so contributed to the health and life of the people. These merciful discoveries of modern times call to mind a letter written by Louis Pasteur in 1908, a portion of which we here copy: "Two opposing laws seem to me now to be in contest—the one a law of blood and death, opening out each day new modes of destruction, forces the nations to be always ready for battle. The other a law of peace, work and health, whose only aim is to deliver man from the calamities which beset him. The one seeks violent conquests; the other the relief of mankind. The one places a single life above all victories, the other sacrifices hundreds of thousands of lives for the ambition of a single individual. The law of which we men of science are the instrument strives, even through the carnage, to cure the wounds due to the law of war. Which of these two laws will prevail God only knows." These words of a great scientist seem almost prophetic of the time. The two laws of hate and love have been contending since the race began. They are accurately described in the Bible and the ultimate triumph of love is predicted in the victories of Christ, who says: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." (John 10: 10.)

The New REO The Fifth

The Incomparable Four

$1050.

The New Reo The Fifth—The "Four"

WHAT NEED WE ADD to that you already know of this great car? For of course you do know? If you have not owned one, you have many friends who do. And they have doubtless told you in more extravagant terms than we would care to use.

MORE THAN 40,000 of them are today in hands of users. 12,000 were sold last season.

AND AS PROVING the popularity of this model we need only say that on November 10th the last Touring car left the Reo factory. And that for thirty days at least there has not been, so far as we know, a Reo the Fifth on any Dealer's sales-floor anywhere.

THE PROOF OF QUALITY in any product is "will it sell in the off-season?" Autumn is supposed to be the off-season for motor cars. Not for Reo cars though—we have never known a time when, even with our splendid factory facilities, we were able to make enough Reos to supply the demand.

WE HAVE JUST INCREASED our plant, nearly 50 per cent—necessary to produce the new "Six." And we hope to be able to more nearly supply our dealers this year than formerly.

AS WE HAVE NO AMBITION, however, to be maker of the most automobiles, but of the best. We do not expect, ever, to supply all the demand for Reo cars. That would be our idea of—well the reverse of success.

TO MAKE THEM EVER BETTER—so much better that, always, the demand will beckon the supply—that is our aim.

FOUR YEARS AGO we announced that, after more than 23 years of experimenting—testing—proving—we had produced a chassis that we believed was finality in all essentials of design. And we said so.

SOME FRIENDLY RIVALS laughed at that statement—said that changes would continue to come with the seasons—as they always had.

NEVERTHELESS we were certain in our own minds that, in the three unit power plant and in other features that have become known as peculiarly Reo, we had established principles that would not change—so long at least as the principles of gas engines remained as they were.

IMPROVEMENTS? Refinements? Of course—but only in minor details. The world moves and of course we expect to move with it.

BUT IN THE FUNDAMENTALS of a self propelled pleasure car, we were convinced we were right. Events have only served to confirm us in that belief.

FROM SEASON TO SEASON we have made such improvements as the progress of the science has made possible. And as our facilities have increased and our purchasing ability become greater, as it has from time to time reduced the price of Reo cars at the same time that we have increased the quality and the size.

IN THE CASE OF THIS FOUR we have been able to do the very things we had considered impossible—we have made a bigger, at the same time we have made a still better car.

HOW WAS THAT POSSIBLE? you ask. Tell you—

THE MOTOR PROVED to have more power than was necessary—more than was really desirable for the weight of the car. Refinements, recently made, increased that power still more.

SO WE FOUND we could add three and one-half very desirable inches to the length of the car, give the buyer a more luxurious equipage, and yet have a car of ample power.

THAT DIFFERENCE IN LENGTH—and we made it wider at the same time—makes all the difference in the world in the capacity and the comfort of the car.

OTHER NOTICEABLE IMPROVEMENTS—in a car which formerly seemed almost perfection—are:

IMPROVED UPHOLSTERING—higher backs to seats.

IMPROVED WINDSHIELD support—with braces running from cowl to body sill.

POCKETS in all doors.

INSTRUMENTS mounted flush on instrument board.

HOOD FASTENERS—new and improved type. Stay put—and unfasten readily when you want them to.

ENTIRELY NEW TOP—a real One-man top. Can actually be put up or down by one man—after long use as well as when new.

WINDSHIELD—Oval moulding and pressed steel construction throughout.

RADIATOR—New method of securing to frame—more flexible—prevents strains on roughest roads. More cooling capacity.

WHEEL BASE—increased three inches—now 115 inches.

NOBBY TREAD TIRES on rear wheels and extra wide, over-size, demountable rims.

SPRINGS—Improved method of lubrication for spring shackles.

STREAMLINE HUB-CAPS—an exclusive Reo feature.

ANTI-RATTLER on brakes, and anti-rattling support.

IMPROVED STARTING mechanism—no sliding contacts and resistance.

NEW HEADLIGHTS with hingeless anti-rattling doors and outside focus attachment.

NEW DESIGN FENDERS—crown type, closer fitting under pan.

NEW METHOD of supporting ignition coil. New design universal joint for generator.

NEW CYLINDER DESIGN—independent exhaust ports. Injector type exhaust manifold. New low-pressure muffler.

NEW THREE-PIECE piston rings, giving greater power and acceleration.

IMPROVED VALVE operation mechanism larger surfaces, ball joints, self lubricating.

NEW ONE-PIECE cam shaft—larger bearings—and hardened and ground.

ADDED FRICTION SURFACE to clutch. New operating mechanism calling for less foot pressure. Improved thrust bearings.

EQUIPMENT—One-man top. Flush instruments; highest priced, d'Arsoval type ammeter and usual tools and accessories.

DELIVERIES BEGIN December 15th. Your local dealer will be able to show you and to take your order for this matchless car on or about that date.

WE PROMPTLY TOOK and are giving you—full advantage of it.

READ CAREFULLY—It's the Silver Lining to the War-Cloud.

YOU ARE OF COURSE AWARE that the Reo Motor Car Company is financially the second strongest Automobile concern in the world.

OR WEREN'T YOU?—We had supposed that knowledge was common property. Anyway, you can easily ascertain the truth of the assertion.

WE WOULDN'T MENTION IT HERE, never have before—but it is necessary to state the fact in order to explain something that is otherwise unexplainable—the wonderful values we are able to give in the two Reo models shown and priced above.

FOR "WONDERFUL VALUES" is the only term that expresses it. Think of it! The New Reo the Fifth—that incomparable four, improved at many points and a larger car than its immediate predecessor—and at $125.00 less than last season.

AND THE SENSATIONAL REO SIX—a Six designed and made the Reo way and with the Reo guarantee, at the amazing price of $1385!

THAT CALLS FOR EXPLANATION—for you nor anybody else dreamed it would ever be possible to produce such cars at such prices.

SO SURE WERE WE OURSELVES of that, we went so far as to state in an advertisement a year ago "no maker ever can—not even Reo ever can—give greater value than this"—speaking then of Reo the Fifth at $1175.

YOU RECALL THE STATEMENT doubtless—so when you saw the price, $1050, quoted above—and realized also that this latest Reo the Fifth is a larger and an improved car, you wondered.

WELL, HERE'S THE ANSWER—and it's mightily interesting.

THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR has created two sets of conditions—contradictory in some aspects.

FOR EXAMPLE, while we know that Six Hundred Millions of dollars go into American banks every thirty days—a guarantee of prosperity and of a market for automobiles in the coming months—at the same time you know that the banks are most conservative about loaning it out. And that is as it should be. Safety First.

SO WE BOUGHT, and, paying the cash when cash was at a premium, bought right. Bought better than we had ever hoped—secured quality at prices theretofore impossible. From tires to electric starters—steel to leather—and hair—and paint.

THE WAR IS BENEFICIAL to those American manufacturers who, like Reo, are alert to take advantage of it.

AND SO WE HAVE NO APOLOGIES to make even to those friends to whom we sold 12,000 Reos last season. Nor for a statement that we made in the best of faith—and must now contradict in the same good faith.

FOR IN GIVING OUR CUSTOMERS the full benefit of the Reo purchasing power—instead of retaining the former price and taking the additional profit ourselves—we are only carrying out that policy which, adhered to from the first, has placed the Reo Motor Car Company in the splendid position it occupies to-day.

SPEAKING OF POLICY—let us correct an impression that we know is abroad.

OUR FRIENDS CRITICIZE US at times for what they call our "ultra-conservatism."

ABOUT THE ONLY COMPLAINT we ever hear from Reo dealers is that we are too modest in setting forth the merits of the Reo product.

WELL, PERHAPS THAT IS TRUE—if adherence to the strict truth in our ads; if a determination not to be carried away by the mania for mere quantities; if we prefer to be second in numbers of cars produced that we may be first in quality—if these be indications of "ultra-conservatism"—why then we plead guilty.

BUT OUR FRIENDLY CRITICS must concede that that Conservative Reo policy has produced tremendous results. Note the statement in the third paragraph of this ad.

WE DON'T CALL IT that, however. We call it conservatism militant. Aggressive conservatism. Alert conservatism. Being sure—absolutely sure—we are right, then going ahead unfalteringly—irresistibly.

DOESN'T THE VERY FACT that we were financially able to and did take advantage of a condition that we knew was transitory; and the further fact that, having bought better, we instantly offered the better values to Reo buyers—doesn't that look like "militant" rather than "ultra" conservatism?

WE THINK SO—and we leave the case in your hands.

...ANSING, MICHIGAN, U. S. A.

The Six of "Sixty Superiorities"

THIS SIX is sensational not because it is a six—but because it is a Reo Six.

FOR REO WAS NOT one of the first to embrace the "Six" idea. Reo is one of the last.

REO WILL NEVER BE one of the first to adopt any innovation. For our policy has ever been, to sell not ideas, but automobiles. Dependable automobiles.

AND YOU WILL ALWAYS find Reo "trailing" to just that extent. We will never be one of those to "take a chance"—with our customers' money.

NOT UNTIL EVERY uncertain or unknown quantity has become a certainty will any new type of car or motor or axle or part be offered with the Reo name-plate.

SO YOU CAN ALWAYS BE SURE—as you have in the past—that in buying a Reo you are investing in no experiment.

THIS SIX IS THE RIPEST RESULT of Reo engineering experience. The very fact that we make and offer it to you is evidence that the "Six" idea has now passed the realm of uncertainty.

THE "SIXTY"—

(1) FLAT TUBE RADIATOR—won't leak through freezing. Flat tubes expand—don't fracture under pressure of frost.
(2) RADIATOR DESIGN—the sloping, curved visor and graceful contour gives class to the entire car.
(3) STREAMLINE HUB-CAPS—original with Reo. Will be widely copied.
(4) EXTRA HEAVY, one-piece, forged front axle—50 per cent oversize.
(5) TIMKEN BEARINGS (4) in front hubs.
(6) REO CYLINDER DESIGN—guarantees straight cylinders, uniformity of water jackets—no distorted cylinders—no scored pistons.
(7) SAFETY—FIRST—and sure—oiling system.
(8) THREE-PIECE piston rings—more power—quicker acceleration
(9) FIFTY PER CENT over-size crank shaft.
(10) EXTRA HEAVY cam shaft—extra large cams. One reason for silence and uniformity of power in this Reo.
(11) ECCENTRIC fan-belt adjustment.
(12) SPIRAL HALF-TIME gears.
(13) VALVE ACTION—roller lifters.
(14) OVERHEAD INTAKE VALVE—not exhaust. Another reason for greater power and silence.
(15) FIBRE ROLLER tappets on intake—another "silence" feature.
(16) VALVE ENCLOSURE—silences, and keeps them silent—see next paragraph.
(17) BREATHER TUBE exhausts in valve enclosure—keeps parts bathed in oil spray, and—
(18) NO OIL SPRAYED on outside of motor by breather-tube.
(19) TWO FLEXIBLE JOINTS between motor drive and generator.
(20) ADJUSTABLE main crankshaft bearings.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

PARLIAMENT ENDS SHORT SESSION. The British Parliament adjourned November 25 the House of Lords [illegible] the House of Commons until February 2, [illegible] to meet the objections of those who think the Parliament should be in continuous session to give [illegible] the conduct of the war to the public. David Lloyd George, chancellor of the exchequer, announces, that the [illegible] was not to be restricted. An optimistic view of the general situation prevailed, despite criticisms of the government by Liberal and Labor members of the House of Commons.

HISTORY REPEATING ITSELF IN OKLAHOMA. They are fighting out the same old "Jim Crow" question in Oklahoma that tore at the vitals of some Southern States in the early days of the reconstruction. The law in that State requires railroads to provide separate day coaches for whites and negroes, equal in all respects save the welcome sign on the doors. A proviso in the law, it seems, assigns to whites only the sleeping, parlor and chair cars. Five negroes sought to enjoin the railroads from enforcing the law, but on the ground that their petition was incorrectly drawn up the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the lower courts in dismissing the petition. Though a majority of the court held that the law is unconstitutional. The case has been under way since 1910. Doubtless it will make a new start in view of the opinion of the court, and avoid the errors that defeated its purpose this time.

BAD GOING IN ALASKA. All trails have been made impassable and mining camps along the shore of Behring Sea are surrounded by water driven inland by the ice which has been forced high up on shore by a terrific blizzard which on December 2 had been raging for three days. Dog teams could not move the mails, and the town of Nome was believed to be in grave danger from the ice pack. Telephone communication was destroyed by the violence of the storm, which was still increasing on the date mentioned.

CHINA STILL WILLING TO TRY CHRISTIANITY. Undeterred by the sight of warring Christian nations, the common people of China are said to be flocking in thousands to hear the American missionary-evangelist George Sherwood Eddy, who is touring China with a number of companions, as announced in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The meetings being held in various cities are attended by an average of 3,500 each night, according to the cabled reports, and thousands sign the [illegible] cards containing a pledge to read the four Gospels, pray to the God of the Bible and imitate Christ in the daily life.

ATLANTIC COAST TAKES A HOLIDAY. Availing itself of the presence of the most extensive fog bank in the history of the weather bureau, all the shipping along the Atlantic seaboard from Newfoundland to Florida quit work for the first two days of December, stopping right where it was when the fog came down and staying there till it was possible to see a few yards ahead. Fifteen liners with some ten thousand passengers aboard anchored at the entrance to New York Harbor, and other ports were similarly closed to freighters, liners and navy vessels. The record mist lifted by December 3, and traffic was resumed.

SEA AND MOUNTAIN CHANGE PLACES. An earthquake in Greece November 27 caused a mountain on the island of Santa Maura to crumple up and the Ionian Sea rushed in and covered 25 acres, according to a press despatch. New hills were appeared about the Ionian island.

TOLSTOY'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS have been the subject of much dispute lately. He was accused of being a rationalist; but he once came to [illegible] a statement of his respect for piety that it deserves to be reproduced. "We blame," he wrote in a letter to a friend, "the presumption of learning which looks down superciliously on the modest faith of the unlearned. Never can the most intense intellectual conviction replace in any man the blessings of belief. Before the eternal problems of life, before the question that most deeply torture and agitate the soul, the scholar is no better off than the peasant. I am still the broad churchman I was thirteen years ago when I wrote the article on freedom. I feel that not what but how we believe determines the moral dignity of manhood. But during this fruitful period the religious feeling in me is growing stronger. I have gratefully seen the work of Providence in the fortunes of my own country as well as my own house, and I feel more keenly than ever the need of bowing humbly before God. Through the intellectual conflicts of the present, an incurable breach has been made in our people. The condition is far too unnatural to be perpetuated as a condition of society. Every one is poorer in heart when he stifles the deepest feeling within him."

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD PARTICULAR ABOUT ITS EMPLOYEES. It will be useless to apply for one of the score [illegible] positions under the new Federal Reserve Board if you have suffered the loss of both arms or of both legs or [illegible] of one arm and one leg, for the board has established a high eugenic standard of fitness, and the defects that are enumerated as bars to employment include the slight ones just named, also insanity, tuberculosis, paralysis, epilepsy, blindness, crippled limbs, various diseases, and an accumulation of years beyond forty-five. Salaries will be paid to the flower of American young manhood and young womanhood from $900 to $1,200 and $1,500 yearly. After passing the board's civil service examination for physical and mental fitness, applicants will be given a probationary trial of sixty days before being employed. Governor of the Federal Reserve Board Charles S. Hamlin, in an address to the Chamber of Commerce in New York, December 3, declared belief that the new system would materially check undue business expansion by making the banks conservative as to their loans, as any departure from strictly commercial transactions will render such banks unable to liquidate their investments through the federal reserve banks. The new system cannot control outside banks, however. Mr. Hamlin denounced the hoarding of funds by banks and individuals and prophesied that the Federal reserve system would end that financial vice.

REAR ADMIRAL MAHAN — Authority on Sea-Power

CHAS. SUMNER HAMLIN — Gov. Federal Reserve Board

DEATH OF FOREMOST NAVAL AUTHORITY. Rear Admiral Alfred Thayer Mahan, U.S.N., retired, died at the United States Hospital, Washington, December 1, at the age of 74. The sudden death of the world's greatest authority on sea power is attributed to his intense concern in the European war. His strength was also greatly taxed by the demands made upon him for opinions upon the war. Admiral Mahan was born at West Point, N. Y., September 27, 1840. He devoted forty years of his life to naval service, and then by his writings, chiefly his first great book, published in 1890, The Influence of Sea-Power Upon History," contributed more than any other man to the development of modern sea-fighting methods.

TOLL OF LIFE IN THE MINES. The United States Bureau of Mines, which has been making safety first its guiding principle, announces that 3,651 men were killed in our mines and quarries in 1913 despite the campaign of education and practical protective and preventive measures which the bureau has given the industries. It is estimated that a hundred thousand other men were injured in that period, and probably two and a half times that number in the last three years, 10,487 losing their lives. About 1,050,000 men are employed in the coal and metal mines and quarries. It is suggested that the United States should refrain from throwing any stones from these murderous mines at Europe.

THE EBBING TIDE OF IMMIGRATION. Estimates based on returns from some immigration stations indicate that the total number of aliens who will have come to this country in the year 1914 will be much less than half that of 1913, the falling off being due of course to the war. As one consequence, employees of the department are being dropped for lack of work, here and there. It is not apparent how this ebb in the great tide of immigration is going to be checked, for the ending of the war will witness the beginning of a long period of "home consumption" of every ounce of manhood and womanhood for the rehabilitation of the countries that will have lost so many thousands of their young men, to say nothing of the new-born generation slain by starvation and lack of care.

IT SEEMS TO BE A LONG, LONG WAY TO WOMAN SUFFRAGE. President Wilson has stirred up a lively controversy among the suffragists by his recent re-announcement of the view, expressed several months ago to a delegation in Washington, that woman suffrage is a State matter and that it should first be passed upon by each of the various States in turn, in the form of a constitutional amendment, before being brought up for national legislation. While they do not regard his attitude as hostile, they feel that it is calculated to delay the progress of the movement and that the battle will have to be fought out in each State in detail.

WAR TAX STAMPS BY THE TON. These are busy days in the Government Bureau of Engraving and Printing in Washington. When the new war stamp tax went into effect, a few weeks ago, the popular demand for the stamps was something quite unprecedented. Up to December 1 the bureau had issued 500,000,000 stamps of various denominations, but these were totally insufficient to supply the demand. In all the larger cities long lines formed at the points of distribution. In Chicago, the Federal building was mobbed by business men eager to lay in a supply. Sixteen tons of stamps were shipped to New York in a single week and up to December 1 the metropolis had taken 15,000,000. There are nearly fifty different varieties of stamps, running all the way up from one-eighth of a cent to $100. Special documentary stamps of even larger denominations are provided for particular cases, some of those for the tobacco trade reaching as high as $2,496. There are fifteen different kinds of stamps for wines, cordials and various liquors, nineteen for documents, twelve for proprietary articles, stamps for shipping goods, for insurance, for parlor car seats or berths, for telegrams and telephone messages, theaters, concert halls and museums, corporation certificates, perfumes and cosmetics, etc.

ALL SIDES MAKE PROGRESS IN MEXICO. General Carranza maintains his capital in Vera Cruz, from whence he directs the movements of his armies in the field and decrees that all taxes on mining and oil property shall be payable only to the Carranza government, all other payments being null and void. The main line of railway between the Carranza capital and Mexico City has been cut. General Villa has taken possession of the national palace in Mexico City, he and his troops fraternizing with General Zapata and his forces, and have seated the military convention's provisional president Gutierrez in the chair of office not so long ago vacated by Huerta. It is said this development in the Gutierrez capital was hailed with popular acclamation. News of conflicts on the fields of war are not reliable as yet, nor are the reports that represent Villa and Carranza as restraining themselves with difficulty from embracing.

WASHING COLORADO'S LINEN. The public investigation of the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations into the causes of the Colorado coal strike was begun December 1 with Governor E. M. Ammons as the first witness. Press reports state that Governor Ammons admitted that fear for the stability of his administration influenced his conduct in the emergency which arose in the coal regions, and that in the hope of a peaceful solution by other methods he did not vigorously enforce all the laws. Governor-elect George A. Carleson urged the appointment of an Industrial Commission to prescribe for the industrial ills of the coal fields, and corroborated Governor Ammons's testimony that the system of the State government was defective. President Wilson has appointed Charles W. Mills, Seth Low and Patrick Gilday commissioners, to try to bring the operators and miners together, but having nothing to do with past differences. Federal troops are still in control of the situation in the coal fields.

THE WAR AMERICA'S ALARM CLOCK. It would seem that this country is only now beginning to wake up to its industrial opportunities and needs, the war's effect upon various interests arousing our manufacturers and scientists to the realization that other countries have been doing things for them which they can just as well do for themselves, as, for example, making certain dyes and supplying South America with the bulk of its imported commodities. The American Institute of Chemical Engineers, at its seventh annual meeting, Philadelphia, December 3, gave most of the time to discussion of the new problems created by the cutting off of European products. Advance was shown in the attempts by our chemists to provide a substitute for natural potash, formerly imported from Germany for agricultural and commercial uses, and also along other lines of new manufacture. It was pointed out that many of Europe's most destructive instruments of war are American inventions and a similar leadership in the making of the "tools of peace" was urged. The Federal Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce estimates that one year of war in Europe may add half a billion dollars to the foreign commerce of this country, one large item being that of tools.

RE-ESTABLISHING COMMUNICATION WITH EUROPE. A significant indication of the growing resumption of ocean communication between America and Europe is found in the instructions issued by Postmaster General Burleson to postmasters to accept packages for transmission by international postal service to points in Germany and Austria-Hungary, a service which had been suspended through lack of facilities. Of all the countries with which the United States maintains the parcels post service only Belgium, Turkey and the North of France at present cannot be so reached.

Two Kinds

THERE are two kinds of people on earth to-day;
Just two kinds of people, no more, I say.
Not the sinner and saint, for 'tis well understood
The good are half bad and the bad are half good.

Not the rich and the poor, for, to count a man's wealth,
You must first know the state of his conscience and health;
Not the humble and proud, for, in life's little span,
Who puts on vain airs is not counted a man.

Not the happy and sad, for the swift flying years
Bring each man his laughter and each man his tears.
No, the two kinds of people on earth that I mean
Are the people who lift and the people who lean.

Wherever you go you will find the world's masses
Are always divided in just these two classes;
And, oddly enough, you will find too, I ween,
There is only one lifter to twenty who lean.

In which class are you? Are you easing the load
Of overtaxed lifters who toil down the road?
Or are you a leaner, who lets others bear
Your portion of labor and worry and care?

CHEAP FISH FOR THE MILLION

THE United States Government, through its Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce, is encouraging the propagation of fish, and intends to make active efforts to add to the food supply of the country from this source. It has been apparent for some time that fish is taking its place on the tables of the country in greater quantities than ever before.

It is the idea of the officials of the bureau, and they say it is being demonstrated in many sections of the country, that an acre of water can be made as productive of food values for the farmer as an acre of land. So farmers are encouraged to use small ponds on their lands and to create such ponds, which the bureau will stock with food fishes suitable for the locality, supplying the fry without expense and instructing the farmer in their care.

"We will gladly assist any one wanting to start a fish pond, and all we ask is that directions be followed and a report made to us of results obtained," said Dr. E. Lester Jones, assistant commissioner. The bureau will furnish trout, bass, pickerel, white and yellow perch, catfish and other species of fry suitable to particular localities.

"We will give those who apply the value of the bureau's experience in picking out a locality for a pond and as to water supply and other things that will help maintain and keep the fish. Then we will advise as to the proper kind of fish that would inhabit that particular water and locality, and the United States Government will furnish free of charge, delivered at the railroad station, enough fish to stock the pond. When we can do so we will send a man to supervise and assist in laying out a pond where it is likely to be of benefit to a community.

"There is no reason why a farmer with a stream running through his place should not propagate fish, not only sufficient for his own use, but to sell. Food for the fish is very inexpensive."

The bureau does not attempt to furnish to any one applicant more than a brood stock of fish for a given private pond or stream, it being expected that these will be protected until they have time to reproduce. The number of fish in an allotment is, however, a variable quantity, depending upon the species and the age at which distributed. Brook trout, which are distributed both as fry and fingerlings, are alloted in much larger numbers as fry than as fingerlings, three or four inches long.

The fish are carried to their destination in railroad cars equipped for the purpose, and are delivered to the applicant free of charge at the station nearest the point of deposit. The applicant is advised by telegraph when the shipment will arrive and is expected to make due provision for care of the fish until planted. Definite instructions in this respect are furnished at the time of shipment.

Dr. Jones during the recent year has made a trip covering thirty-nine States and Alaska to inform the people what his bureau is doing in connection with the propagation of fish to increase the food supply. In his annual report, just made public, Secretary of Commerce Redfield states that the fiscal year 1914 was in general the most successful in the entire history of fish culture under the Federal Government. He stated that this success did not depend on mere numbers of fish produced and distributed, unprecedentedly large though the numbers were, but should be measured also by the fitness for survival and special adaptability for the waters in which an increasingly large percentage of the output had been planted.

The fish culture activities of the bureau were conducted in thirty-four States, the territory of Alaska and the District of Columbia, at thirty-six permanent hatcheries and ninety-four auxiliary and egg-collecting stations. The cost of fish produced and planted was $403 per million in 1894, $287 per million in 1904 and $136 per million in 1914.

During the past year upward of forty of the most valuable food and game fisheries of the fresh and salt waters of the country were handled by the bureau, and the output reached the enormous total of 4,047 millions. Of this number the migratory food fishes of the Atlantic Coast streams numbered 485 millions, the commercial fishes of the Great Lakes, 1,020 millions; the salmons of the Pacific seaboard, 223 millions; the food fishes of the North Atlantic Coast, including the lobster, 2,276 millions and the fishes of the minor interior waters the remainder.

The bureau has requested from Congress authority to appoint a fish pathologist. Evidence has been collected indicating that diseased fishes may cause disease in human beings and that in some cases there is a common cause of disease in human beings and fishes; and evidence is also available, showing that diseases in human beings are transmitted through water to fishes, making them unfit for food. Secretary Redfield states that a pathologist for studying the diseases of fishes is an urgent necessity in the interest of fish cultural work and of the public.

In conclusion, it might be said that while the results from the planting of fish are not immediate, they always follow if the bureau's directions and advice are followed. In proper water and properly acclimated fish thrive and multiply rapidly. The different species mature differently, some taking a couple of years, but others less time.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORKINGMAN

EMINENT AMERICANS DISCUSS THE PROBLEM OF BRIDGING THE CHASM BETWEEN THE TWO

IN THIS issue we present the third instalment of contributions by leaders of American thought on the great question: "How Can the Church Win Back the Working Classes?" which was begun in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 2. A fourth instalment will follow.

The Church Must be True to the Teachings of Christ, Writes President King

THE church certainly cannot be true to the essential teachings and spirit of Christ and be indifferent to the need of bringing such conditions to pass as may make it possible for every man to live a man's life. It must make unmistakably clear its earnest desire and effort to make that possible.

HENRY C. KING.

Unemployment a Disgrace to Civilization, Writes Novelist Gertrude Atherton

I THINK it is now almost a truism that the church, if only to save its own life, must take a more practical part in the problems of civilization, which press harder and harder every year. It seems to me that if it does not care to undertake the responsibility of solving those problems itself it could accomplish almost as much by inducing its members to give them a more continuous and active attention, instead of a merely intelligent interest. While it is all very well to lay before men their spiritual duties toward their fellow beings, particularly the workingman (with whom many of them never come in contact), they are likely to forget these admonitions in the business district on Monday morning. If they could be made to realize that the present conditions under which they prosper are threatened, they might consent to devote both time and brains to the arrest of those menacing forces before it is too late.

Not that I for a moment take these agitators, so exploited by the press, seriously. The social failures we have had with us since the beginning of society, under one name or another, and we always will. They are defectives, led by blatherskites, who are none too well balanced themselves, but quite clever enough to live on the exertions of others and to seize every opportunity to exhibit their deformed and hysterical egos that municipal and editorial complaisance will give them.

The menace to our present smug citizens, of course, is from Socialism, and while all of us with any imagination and energy would rather be dead than live to see Socialism prevail, yet it should be encouraged to a certain extent by Democracy as an excellent factory for ideas. The best of its theories need modification—which they would get in any attempt at practical application—but a promising germ is often there. One, at least, should be accepted and put into practical shape with all speed if the problem of the unemployed is to be reduced to a minimum before it is too late. The State should take upon itself the duty to provide employment at a living wage for every man and woman out of work; double the number employed in factories, which now force their employees to work overtime, thus reducing the shift to half; forbid women (unless widows) with young children to work outside the home, and eliminate the child altogether. Then there would be work enough for all men. Moreover, that would mean a definite labeling of our agitators, who would not take a "job" if it were offered to them with a bonus on a gold plate.

No, I do not believe that the problem of the unemployed is any worse than it has been for a hundred years. We hear more of it, partly because it was one of the fashionable subjects of discussion before the war, partly because there are so many more men to be unemployed; principally because nearly all want to live in the cities. Except in crises, you very seldom hear of the unemployed in Montana, nor in any other uncrowded State. These States are desperate for labor at certain seasons of the year and would pay almost any price for it. But the laborer doesn't think it worth while (or hasn't the ready money) to take such a long journey for the sake of eight or ten weeks' work. There should be a bureau in every great city, which would keep a record of the demands of the Western employers and advance money for railway fare to those that were anxious to exchange their labor for a fair wage. These jobs invariably offer when city work is slack, and all hands should be benefited by such an arrangement.

The point is that poverty, the inability to find work by men willing and eager to work, and with children to support and educate, is as deep a disgrace to civilization as war; as crude, as illogical, as unintelligent. This country, at least, has a tremendous percentage of master brains working successfully on difficult problems, mostly for their own exclusive benefit. Suppose the church induces them to devote one day a week to the working out of a master plan that would eliminate poverty and at the same time insure to their children's children the same advantages they now enjoy themselves. They would solve the problem in less than a year.

Not the Church's Business to Interfere with Temporalities, Writes Editor Lasher

IN MY judgment, the church, as such, has nothing to do with the laboring classes, as such. The church is a spiritual body, under the rule of its Divine Redeemer. From among its members are called and appointed men who are to go forth with the Gospel of salvation and seek to win individuals of all classes, without respect to class, to Jesus Christ and eternal life. The church has nothing to do with temporalities, except to enforce humanitarian practices among its members. Churches should seek to cultivate the spirit of Christ in their members, admonishing both "masters" and "servants" to deal honestly and honorably with each other. It is not the business of churches, as such, to engage in any secular business, nor to deal directly with those giving no evidence of personal faith in Christ. Only the Gospel of Christ can settle the great questions constantly raised by those who think that they can improve upon the divine method of governing men.

G. W. LASHER.

The Church Has Been Indifferent to the Workers' Interests, Writes Evangelist Arthur J. Smith

THE church has been neglecting the welfare and interest of the working classes, and I think much of the present unrest among the working people is due to the churches' indifference. The church will make a great mistake, however, if it lays less emphasis on spiritual matters and greater emphasis on social betterment. The deeper the spiritual life of the church the more she will do for the social welfare of the people. It should do everything it possibly can to combat the specific industrial evils that prevail among the working classes by studying closely the conditions under which these people work and live, and trying to better these conditions.

I believe in the institutional church that makes Christ first and makes the strongest emphasis on spiritual work, but at the same time is a beehive of activity along educational, physical and moral lines. The church should be open every day in the week. Such a church will help materially to solve the problem confronting it.

Nothing but the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit can bring material as well as spiritual advancement to society.

ARTHUR J. SMITH.
New York City.

The Spirit of Christ Needed to Solve the Problem, Writes Philanthropist Wm. Fortune

IF LABOR could be thoroughly and genuinely imbued with the Christ spirit it would irresistibly prevail. If the church could unite mankind in the Christ spirit there would be no class problems. Are the church and labor willing to be absolutely right? When they are the problem can be solved and until they are it will not be solved.

WORLD'S SAVIOUR AND KING

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DECEMBER 27
(II Cor. 5: 14-21.)

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"But far be it from me to glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world hath been crucified unto me, and I unto the world." Gal. 6: 14.

The world is defined by John to consist of all that is not of the Father. It is the totality of the dazzling gauds and pleasure which men follow, who have shut out of their practical reckoning God, the soul, and the future. Paul had had some experience of it in his early life when the prizes of worldly ambition seemed easily within his reach. But ever since the moment when he saw the face of him that had been crucified by the world, but lived in the light of the eternal day, all other glory had paled into darkness. He could not see by reason of that dazzling glory which excelled. He counted all that this transient world could offer as dross, compared to the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus the Lord. Henceforth, no love was lost between the princes of this world and himself. To them he appeared as a crucified outcast, on whom they were free to heap their opprobrium. To him, the world with all its meretricious attractions and appeals seemed to speak as from a cross, with faint and dying accents.

"O cross that liftest up my head,
I dare not hide myself from thee;
I lay in dust life's glory dead,
And from the ground there blossoms red
Life that shall endless be."

Saviour and King

By Amos R. Wells

FOR two years we have been studying the glorious life of the world's Redeemer. Now as we come to the final lesson, reviewing it all, the Lesson Committee has given us the splendid and fitting subject, "Jesus, the World's Saviour and King." Jesus is King of the world's civilization. There is no civilization worth the name where he has not gone. He is King of the world's power. All the strongest nations are Christian. He is King of the world's wisdom. All learning of highest value has sprung up under Christian auspices. Most of all, he is King of the world's hope, for the nations that do not know him are in the blackness of despair.

And Jesus is the world's King because he is the world's Saviour. He could not give material prosperity, or earthly power, or scientific knowledge, or heavenly hope, if he had not first given salvation from sin. With the terrible burden of guilt hanging about our necks, we could make no progress toward any happiness or strength. Freed from that, we can leap along the highways of all joy.

Plato, the great pupil of the greater Socrates, writes of the darkness and mystery which surround all mortals, and says that in this sad plight man can only get the best advice available, and then launch out upon it, as desperate sailors on a risky raft; "unless," Plato goes on to hope, "we can find some vessel more safe and solid, some word from God on which we may take this passage!" That Word of God, which Plato never heard, we hear. We have heard it in all these wonderful events of the last week, the crucifixion, the resurrection, and the ascension.

It is fascinating to watch the processes of color printing. If the portrait of Washington is to be reproduced, the first impression gives only a faint outline. Other impressions are added, in other colors, stronger and stronger. Now one feature is brought out more clearly, now another. At last it seems as if the portrait were perfect; yet still a touch of color is given here and there, and new life leaps into the face, till the great man seems to be looking out at us from the paper. So has it been with these one hundred and four lessons in the life of Christ. Each has contributed some fresh feature to the portrait of the wonderful Face, and now we seem to see it in all the vividness of actual existence.

Once there was an Irishman, living near Boston, who cut away the turf from his front lawn in enormous letters and filled the spaces with white lime, so that the words "Jesus Only" stood out in bold relief, a warning and an invitation to all passers-by. That is the motto of every true Christian, shining out in many manifest tokens from all that he says and does. He finds in Jesus the supreme satisfaction. Dr. Charles E. Jefferson imagines Christ saying: "Are you hungry? I am the Bread. Are you thirsty? I am the Water. Have you lost your way? I am the Way. Are you sick? I am the Great Physician. Is it dark? I am the Light. Are you puzzled by doctrine? I am the Truth. It would seem as though the whole of the New Testament were written to make it clear that Jesus Christ is the Sum, the All."

A young Christian Indian once prayed in these words: "I hear thou sittest in light, but I have sat all my life among the darknesses. Good Chief, if thou wilt lighten my darkness, send down thy Spirit into my heart, that he may lead me to where I may rest. I ask this because thou art Jesus Christ." That is why we have been studying the life of Jesus Christ through these two years, that we may become so conscious of his goodness and power, his wisdom and love, that our prayers need no other argument than his glorious nature, and we may go steadfastly through all trouble and danger because he is Jesus Christ.

There is only one corollary of all this, and that is obedience. Once Mendelssohn visited Freiburg Cathedral and asked permission to play on the organ, but was at first refused. After much entreaty he gained permission. When the stranger began to play, the old organist burst into tears and asked his name. On learning it, he cried: "Only think! I almost forbade Mendelssohn to touch my instrument."

So, in these one hundred and four lessons, in every one of them, the Master Musician has come begging to play upon our heart-strings, and awaken heavenly harmony in our lives. Shall we—can we—forbid him?

Christian Citizenship Review

Thoughts for the Quarterly Review

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

FOR the senior classes—from sixteen years upward—there is nothing more fitting for review than to recall the latest chapters of the Newest Testament of God's work in the world today, especially along the lines of moral and social reform. In this case the Christian Citizenship Review may appropriately be to some degree an annual review, and from that point of view we may truly call this the "wonderful year." It has been at once the best and the worst year in the world's history. Wickedness never manifested itself so horribly as in the European War.

But along with the war have come some wonderful compensations. We do not believe in laying it all on God when man's carelessness or wickedness brings on a titanic wreck, or a titanic fire, or a titanic war; but as a great commander may turn even the wickedness of his enemy to his own advantage God has often made the wrath of man to praise him, and in this case Europe is making more progress in the war

Fundamentals of the Christian Faith

Are we rooted and grounded in the faith of the Gospel? These ten volumes, written by masters of Christian history and doctrine and of the Christian's great Book, deal with vital matters of the Christian system and set forth the reasons for the faith that is within us, refuting the errors of unbelief and revealing the sturdy foundations of the church of Christ. They abound also in practical advice and comment on matters of every-day Christian living.

Ben Hur
By GENERAL LEW WALLACE

No one will ever tire of the story of Ben Hur. One of the world's greatest romances, telling the story of a young Jewish nobleman and his family in the time of Christ. Some of the choicest descriptions in all literature, the highest pitches of adventure—such as the incomparable story of the chariot race—and the deepest touches of sympathy and pathos.

"Thou Fool" and Eleven Other Sermons
By DWIGHT L. MOODY

Mr. Moody is one of the world's immortals. His sermons are still fresh and powerful. The twelve sermons in this collection were discovered in long-forgotten note books by his stenographer after Mr. Moody's death, and their genuineness is vouched for by the great evangelist's family. The book brings us a stirring message from this modern prophet. It is bound in semi-flexible covers, with front cover title in gold.

against drink because of this military conflict than might have been made otherwise in a century, and even the terrific slaughter which has already occurred may be more than offset by the number of lives that will be saved by the national prohibition which has been achieved in Russia, which is the greatest achievement in the war against commercialized vices, except China's complete victory over opium. Suddenly Russia has outrun Germany and France and Great Britain and even Scandinavia and the United States in reaching the goal of complete national prohibition. It should shame us all that we have been beaten in the race by a nation that we consider backward, and arouse us to resistless effort for at least carrying the submission of national constitutional prohibition to the forum of the State legislatures at the very opening of the December session of Congress, which should be constrained to make this Christmas present to the nation. Congress cannot give us constitutional prohibition, but it certainly cannot consistently refuse the referendum that is demanded on this subject in accordance with the new principle of popular rule to which all parties are committed. It will probably take until 1920 to achieve the thirty-six States that are necessary to make national prohibition a law, and this reminds us that this year has been unprecedented in this country in that five States have voted for State-wide prohibition, Virginia first, and then in the November election Oregon, Washington, Arizona, and Colorado, making thirteen prohibition States—an unlucky thirteen for the liquor traffic, but a number full of prophecy to those of us who remember that thirteen States was the beginning of our continent-wide republic, with the forty-eight stars in our flag. We have thirteen stars now in the temperance flag, and it shall surely grow to forty-eight under the victorious banner of "A Saloonless Nation in 1920." There are eighteen States in which half the territory is "dry," which would seem to assure us that we would get thirty-one States out of the thirty-six in short order.

Something has been done in law enforcement, which is the weak point in American temperance reform; in Malden and Cambridge, Mass., the International Reform Bureau has shown how thoroughly laws can be enforced if the citizens will undertake the matter in earnest, and others interested may well write to those cities for the story of how it was done.

The most fundamental reform of all those now stirring the land is that which aims to increase the study of the Bible by the young folks, who, in this generation, have much less Bible study at home than in former years, and the Sunday school alone is found to be entirely insufficient to furnish them against temptation and for efficient service. A successful effort is being made to have the public schools read Old Testament passages relating to the same period as the International Sunday School Lessons, and so we are developing an "All-week Plan of Bible Study" for all the people. In half of the States the Sunday School Association is getting into connection with the public schools on the North Dakota or Colorado plans, of having credits given for thorough Bible study done by the pupils of the public schools outside of school in the churches or elsewhere. Many forces are getting together in what is called the "Back to the Bible Uplift Movement," realizing that the only radical and thorough cure for the great problems that confront our own land is in bringing the Bible to bear upon young lives by making it attractive and impressive, both in the Sunday school and public school. Shall this not be done in the home also, where revived family altars would be the greatest of all reforms?

Nature Review

In our new plan of quarterly review, which strong leaders of the Sunday school have approved, a nature review of the season is suggested for each quarter for the elementary classes, those under twelve years of age, which in this case would naturally be on the wisdom, power and grace of God as pictured in the snow. First, let us repeat as the snow texts about God's wisdom, Job 38: 22; Ps. 147: 16. "Hast thou entered into the treasuries of the snow? Hast thou seen the treasuries of the hail?" "He giveth the snow like wool. He scattereth the hoarfrost like ashes."

Spring presents us the blossom-flowers of the field; summer the abundant flowers of the field; autumn the many-tinted leaf-flowers of the forest; but none of these are more wonderful or beautiful than the snow-flowers, the asters and daisies of winter. Trace back the history of a single snow-flake. You will find it to be a child of the sun. The sun's rays touch a round and unattractive drop of water, in ocean, lake or river, and by their heat emancipate and separate its particles into light and invisible steam, which rises into the air. The cold air brings the scattered particles a little nearer together, and it becomes a thin mist, a fragment of a cloud. The air grows a little colder, reaches freezing temperature, brings the particles nearer yet, and magnetizes, as it were, these fragments of the water-drop, and thus sets the wonderful forces of crystallization into activity. The little people of the snow then go at their kindergarten work, making "forms of beauty." Each minute and misty fragment of the water-drop has one or two points that attract, and one or two that repel its tiny neighbors, like the two poles of a magnet. By these attracting and repelling forces, the little fragments of frozen mist arrange themselves into beautiful star-flowers of snow, as various as human beauty, and yet all built upon the same six-rayed skeleton, with a unity as wonderful as their variety.

Now let us learn the lesson that the snow teaches about God's power, and for that our text shall be Ps. 148: 8: "Fire and hail, snow and vapor, stormy wind fulfilling his word."

For every pound of snow that is created, a force of heat is required equal to that which would melt five pounds of cast iron. This amount of power is necessary simply to change water into steam and mist, and does not include the forces employed in condensation and crystallization. These latter forces, although they can not be measured, are very great. Water has often been poured into empty bomb-shells, and then closed up and put in a freezing temperature; and as the water particles expanded in rearranging themselves into crystals, they have burst the shell. Even cannons have been thus exploded by the forces of crystallization, as water-drops were arranging themselves into ice-flowers. Are not these minute but mighty forces born of God's omnipotence? Let an army of tiny snow-flakes on the mountain-side receive their marching orders from God, and what can stand before the avalanche?

But best of all, the snow brings us a lesson of God's grace and mercy, first in the snow promise, Isa. 1: 18: "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow," and in the snow prayer, Ps. 51: 7: "Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow."

Decision Day

For the Juniors—12 to 14 years of age—we have suggested that each quarterly review day should be "Decision Day," and that would be doubly appropriate in this case; for Christmas, when Christ became a child, is just the time when children should become Christlike, and we have had in this last quarter not only the reminder of Christmas when our Christ's life on earth began, but also the wonderful story of his crucifixion and resurrection; and surely after such lessons every thoughtful child who has previously not made the great decision should be glad to make this last Sunday of the old year Decision Day, and so make the next year the happiest of all new years and the beginning of a happy and useful Christian life, in which the motto should be "Saved to Serve." The great reason for becoming a Christian is not simply to save ourselves, but to get into a position where we can save others, and doing good to others is always the way to happiness.

Vocation Day

The plan for the intermediates—15 and 16 years of age—is to make each quarterly review day "Vocation Day." God has put such impulses into the bodies and minds of young people at this period that it is the best time to consider seriously what occupation each would like to follow in life. One is much more likely to succeed if the decision is made in advance, and life is trained for one or two special lines of usefulness, and in choosing a vocation the motive should be to make the world better for having lived in it, to the largest possible degree. That does not mean that we should all be preachers, for some could serve God and man more efficiently in some other way. We should try to find out not only what we would like to be, but what we ought to be, and most of all what God has intended us to be by the characteristics which have come to us through parents and other influences. One thing every boy and girl ought to decide firmly in considering a vocation is that he will not enter into any vocation, however profitable, in which his service will be an injury to his fellows, or even into an occupation where his work will be useless. It is not worthy of any true man to simply seek the place that will bring the highest financial reward for the least activity, but the occupation should be sought in which the largest usefulness may be achieved, and that will be sure to be the one in which the greatest joy will come.

And Look at These Fine Holeproof Socks!

—No More Darning for You, Helen

Note the beautiful Christmas box, illustrated above, in which we are packing Holeproof Hosiery for holiday gifts.

Six pairs of Holeproofs are guaranteed to wear six months without holes. If any of the six pairs fail in that time, we will replace them with new hose free.

Some One's Opportunity

A YOUNG man, now an inmate of the New York State Reformatory at Elmira, and who has undergone a complete change of heart and purpose, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD requesting us to ask some reader to find him employment. His letter says: "I intend to work hard and steady and to live an honest life. Can you help me with an offer of employment, as I would greatly like to be home for Christmas?" This young man's release is conditional upon his obtaining employment. His crime is not a serious one, and as he is granted parole, he has evidently made a good record. If any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would like to help this young man begin life over again, they can address G. M., in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

FLORIDA CITRUS EXCHANGE

"Eat oranges—eat them all the time, as many as you can. They will save you many a doctor's bill," said Dr. Wiley, the world's leading authority on pure food.

"But not oranges that have been picked green," remarked Dr. S. J. Crumbine, of the Kansas State Board of Health. "The flavor is poor and the pulp fibre soon becomes woody and dry."

"I believe in youth-protracting and beauty-making power of oranges," wrote Lina Cavaliere, famed singer. "If I could have but one fruit, it would be oranges."

Famous athletes use grapefruit freely when in training. It is almost as strengthening as it is delicious—and its tonic properties aid the appetite and improve digestion.

How to Get Tree-Ripened, Sweet, Juicy Florida Oranges and Grapefruit in Your City

The Florida Citrus Exchange—a co-operative body of growers formed to advance their interests by protecting consumers against unripe, inferior oranges and grapefruit—sends to the markets only tree-ripened fruits. The red mark of the Exchange guarantees ripe, juicy, spicy fruit. No child labor is employed in the packing houses of the Exchange. Every worker wears white gloves, and no hand touches the fruit. You can get Exchange fruit sure to be good, for little if any more than you pay for inferior or "maybe good" fruit. Your grocer can supply you.

Systematic Bible Study

Bible Lovers and Christian Workers

The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago offers five courses by correspondence in Bible Study and Christian Doctrine to those unable to attend the regular courses of the Institute. The well known Scofield Correspondence Course is now owned by the Institute and this together with its own four strong courses offer

Thorough Instruction in the Bible and Methods of Christian Work

Most thorough work may be done by correspondence. Correspondence work for many reasons offers greater possibilities for culture than does class work. The courses of the Institute are very instructive and Bible lovers will find them most interesting, economical and easy to follow.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

laugh and talk and know each other. Then I go home to a little back room, up three flights, just big enough to hold a dumpy little cot-bed, a washstand with a nicked pitcher, one rickety chair and me. It's like a furnace in the summer and an ice box in the winter; but it's all the place I've got, and I'm supposed to stay in it—when I ain't workin'. But I've come out today. I ain't goin' to stay in that room, and I ain't goin' to any old library to read, neither. It's our last half holiday this year—and an extra one, at that, and I'm going to have a good time—for once. I'm just as young, and I like to laugh and joke just as well as them girls I sell bows to all day. Well, today I'm going to laugh and joke."

Pollyanna smiled and nodded her approval.

"I'm glad you feel that way. I do, too. It's a lot more fun—to be happy, isn't it? Besides, the Bible tells us to —rejoice and be glad, I mean. It tells us to eight hundred times. Probably you know about 'em, though—the rejoicing texts."

The young woman shook her head. A queer look came to her face.

"Well, no," she said dryly, "I can't say I was thinkin'—of the Bible."

"Weren't you? Well, maybe not; but, you see, my father was a minister, and he—"

"A minister?"

"Yes. Why, was yours, too?" cried Pollyanna, answering something she saw in the other's face.

"Y-yes." A faint color crept up to the girl's forehead.

"Oh, and has he gone like mine to be with God and the angels?"

The girl turned away her head.

"No. He's still living—back home," she answered, half under her breath.

"Oh, how glad you must be!" sighed Pollyanna, enviously. "Sometimes I get to thinking if only I could see father once—but you do see your father, don't you?"

"Not often. You see, I'm down—here."

"But you can see him—and I can't mine. He's gone to be with mother and the rest of them up in heaven, and—have you got a mother, too—an earth mother?"

"Y-yes." The girl stirred restlessly and half moved as if to go.

"Oh, then you can see both of them," breathed Pollyanna, unutterable longing in her face. "Oh, how glad you must be! For there just isn't anybody, is there, that really cares and notices quite so much as fathers and mothers. You see I know, for I had a father until I was eleven years old; but, for a mother, I had Ladies' Aiders for ever so long, till Aunt Polly took me. Ladies' Aiders are lovely, but of course they aren't like mothers, or even Aunt Pollys; and—"

On and on Pollyanna talked. Pollyanna was in her element now. Pollyanna loved to talk. That there was anything strange or unwise or even unconventional in this intimate telling of her thoughts and her history to a total stranger on a Boston park bench did not once occur to Pollyanna. To Pollyanna all men, women and children were friends, either known or unknown; and thus far she had found the unknown quite as delightful as the known, for with them there was always the excitement of mystery and adventure—while they were changing from the unknown to the known.

To this young woman at her side, therefore, Pollyanna talked unreservedly of her father, her Aunt Polly, her Western home and her journey East to Vermont. She told of new friends and old friends, and of course she told of the game. Pollyanna almost always told everybody of the game, either sooner or later. It was, indeed, so much a part of her very self that she could hardly have helped telling of it.

As for the young woman—she said little. She was not now sitting in her old listless attitude, however, and to her whole self had come a marked change. The flushed cheeks, frowning brow, troubled eyes and nervous working fingers were plainly the signs of some inward struggle. From time to time she glanced apprehensively down the path beyond Pollyanna, and it was after such a glance that she clutched the little girl's arm.

"See here, kiddie, for just a minute don't you leave me. Do you hear? Stay right where you are! There's a man that I know comin'; but no matter what he says, don't you pay any attention, and don't you go. I'm goin' to stay with you. See?"

Before Pollyanna could more than gasp her wonderment and surprise she found herself looking up into the face of a very handsome young gentleman, who had stopped before them.

"Oh, here you are," he smiled pleasantly, lifting his hat to Pollyanna's companion. "I'm afraid I'll have to begin with a little apology—I'm a little late."

"It don't matter, sir," said the young woman, speaking hurriedly. "I—I've decided not to go."

The young man gave a light laugh. "Oh, come, my dear, don't be hard on a chap because he's a little late!"

"It isn't that, really," defended the young woman, a swift red flaming into her cheeks. "I mean—I'm not going."

"Nonsense!" The man stopped smiling. He spoke sharply. "You said yesterday you'd go."

"I know; but I've changed my mind. I told my little friend here—I'd stay with her."

"Oh, but if you'd rather go with this nice young gentleman," began Pollyanna, anxiously; but she fell back, silenced at the look the girl gave her.

"I tell you I had rather not go. I'm not going."

"And, pray, why this sudden right-about face?" demanded the young man with an expression that made him suddenly look, to Pollyanna, not quite so handsome. "Yesterday you said—"

"I know I did," said the girl feverishly. "But I knew then that I hadn't ought to. Let's call it—that I know it even better now. That's all." And she turned away resolutely.

It was not all. The man spoke again twice. He coaxed, then he sneered with a hateful look in his eyes. At last he said something very low and angry, which Pollyanna did not understand. The next moment he wheeled about and strode away.

The girl watched him tensely till he passed out of sight, then relaxing, she laid a shaking hand on Pollyanna's arm.

"Thanks, kiddie. I reckon I owe you —more than you know. Good-by."

"But you aren't going away now!" bemoaned Pollyanna.

The girl sighed wearily.

"I got to. He might come back, and next time I might not be able to—" She clipped the words short and rose to her feet. For a moment she hesitated, then she choked bitterly: "You see, he's the kind that—notices too much, and that hadn't ought to notice me—at all!" With that she was gone.

"Why, what a funny lady!" murmured Pollyanna, looking wistfully after the vanishing figure. "She was nice, but she was sort of different, too," she commented, rising to her feet and moving idly down the path.

CHAPTER VI

JERRY TO THE RESCUE

IT WAS not long before Pollyanna reached the edge of the Garden at a corner where two streets crossed. It was a wonderfully interesting corner, with its hurrying cars, automobiles, carriages and pedestrians. A huge red bottle in a drug store caught her eye, and from down the street came the sound of a hurdy-gurdy. Hesitating only a moment Pollyanna darted across the corner and skipped lightly down the street toward the entrancing music.

Daylight Reveals

To All Men Goodyear Tire Supremacy

Light on the tire question leads men inevitably to the Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tire. It has led hundreds of thousands to them.

Every month it leads many thousands more. This has gone on until Goodyears outsell any other tire that's built.

Light—which means information—shows true quality in Goodyears. It is based on exclusive features. We spend fortunes on trouble-savers found in no other tire.

Rim-cutting is ended by one of them—by our exclusive No-Rim-Cut feature.

Blow-outs due to wrinkled fabric are ended by our "On-Air" cure. That exclusive process costs us $450,000 yearly.

Loose tread risk is reduced 60% by a patent method we alone employ.

Punctures and skidding are combated, as in no other tire, by our tough, double-thick All-Weather tread.

For Comfort's Sake

These things mean safety, sturdiness, less cost per mile, less trouble. They combat the greatest tire faults in the best ways known. Remember them. Some day—for comfort's sake if for nothing else—you are bound to adopt these tires.

Do it now. For winter tires, our All-Weather tread is sufficient inducement.

Any dealer will supply you.

Pollyanna found much to interest her now. In the store windows were marvelous objects, and around the hurdy-gurdy, when she reached it, were a dozen dancing children, most fascinating to watch. So altogether delightful, indeed, did this pastime prove to be that Pollyanna followed the hurdy-gurdy for some distance, just to see those children dance. Presently she found herself at a corner so busy that a very big man in a blue coat helped the people across the street. For an absorbed minute she watched him in silence; then, a little timidly, she herself started to cross.

It was a wonderful experience. The big blue-coated man saw her at once and promptly beckoned to her. He even walked to meet her. Then, through a wide lane, with puffing motors and impatient horses on either hand, she walked unscathed to the further curb. It gave her a delightful sensation, so delightful that, after a minute, she walked back. Twice again, after short intervals, she trod the fascinating way so magically at the lifting of the big man's hand. But the last time her conductor left her at the curb he gave a puzzled frown.

"See here, little girl, ain't you the same one that crossed a minute ago?" he demanded. "And again before that?"

"Yes, sir," beamed Pollyanna, "I've been across four times!"

"Well!" the officer began to bluster; but Pollyanna was still talking.

"And it's been nicer every time!"

"Oh-h, it has—has it?" mumbled the big man, lamely. Then, with a little more spirit he sputtered: "What do you think I'm here for—just to tote you back and forth?"

"Oh, no, sir," dimpled Pollyanna. "Of course you aren't just for me! There are all these others. I know what you are. You're a policeman. We've got one of you out where I live at Mrs. Carew's, only he's the kind that just walks on the sidewalk, you know. I used to think you were soldiers, on account of your gold buttons and blue hats; but I know better now. Only I think you are a kind of soldier, 'cause you're so brave—standing here like this, right in the middle of all these teams and automobiles, helping folks across."

"Ho—ho! Brrrr!" sputtered the big man, coloring like a schoolboy and throwing back his head with a hearty laugh. "Ho—ho! Just as if—" He broke off with a quick lifting of his hand. The next moment he was escorting a plainly very much frightened little old lady from curb to curb. If his step were a bit more pompous, and his chest a bit more full, it must have been only an unconscious tribute to the watching eyes of the little girl back at the starting point. A moment later, with a haughty, permissive wave of his hand toward the chafing drivers and chauffeurs, he strolled back to Pollyanna.

"Oh, that was splendid!" she greeted him with shining eyes. "I love to see you do it—and it's just like the children of Israel crossing the Red Sea, isn't it?—with you holding back the waves for the people to cross. And how glad you must be all the time that you can do it! I used to think being a doctor was the very gladdest business there was, but I reckon, after all, being a policeman is gladder yet—to help frightened people like this, you know. And—" But with another "Brrrr!" and an embarrassed laugh, the big blue-coated man was back in the middle of the street, and Pollyanna was all alone on the curbstone.

For only a minute longer did Pollyanna watch her fascinating "Red Sea," then, with a regretful backward glance, she turned away.

"I reckon maybe I'd better be going home now," she meditated. "It must be 'most dinner time." And briskly she started to walk back by the way she had come.

Not until she had hesitated at several corners and unwittingly made two false turns did Pollyanna grasp the fact that "going home" was not to be so easy as she had thought it to be. And not until she came to a building which she knew she had never seen before did she fully realize that she had lost her way.

She was on a narrow street, dirty and ill paved. Dingy tenement blocks and a few unattractive stores were on either side. All about her were jabbering men and chattering women—though not one word of what they said could Pollyanna understand. Moreover, she could not help seeing that the people looked at her curiously, as if they knew she did not belong there.

Several times already she had asked her way, but in vain. No one seemed to know where Mrs. Carew lived, and the last two times those addressed had answered with a gesture and a jumble of words which Pollyanna, after some thought, decided must be "Dutch," the kind the Haggermans—the only foreign family in Beldingsville—used.

On and on, down one street and up another, Pollyanna trudged. She was thoroughly frightened now. She was hungry, too, and very tired. Her feet ached and her eyes smarted with the tears she was trying so hard to hold back. Worse yet, it was unmistakably beginning to grow dark.

"Well, anyhow," she choked to herself, "I'm going to be glad I'm lost, 'cause it'll be so nice when I get found. I can be glad for that!"

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A READER who signs herself "A Wife and Mother" writes: "I want to acknowledge God's answer to my prayer. I have prayed for years for a wayward son, that he might leave off drink and settle down. My prayer has been answered." Mrs. R. W. writes: "I acknowledge many answers to prayers. One for a dear son who has quit drinking, and for another who has been changed from night work to day work." E. C. G. writes: "There has been a vast improvement in my dear brother in regard to the drink habit." F. E. R. writes: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for the conversion of two brothers."

Miss E. G. writes from Marion, N. C.: "I believe the Lord heard each one of four prayers recently made, and answered each one. The answer to me was more than I asked for. One night, during a revival meeting here, four friends for whom I prayed accepted Christ. God also restored a sick college friend to health. I promised my Saviour I would acknowledge an answer to a prayer for forgiveness, peace and acceptance with him after I had grieved him. Peace came when I stopped repeating my prayers and trusted him."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

[illegible] M. M., [illegible] A. E., [illegible] M. M., [illegible] M. H. S. C., [illegible] H. E., [illegible] A. F. A., [illegible] A. E., [illegible] M. [illegible] R. W., [illegible] A. E. L., [illegible] M. A. P. L., [illegible] A. H. H.

Rev. Benjamin Cox, pastor of Central Baptist Church, Memphis, Tenn., writes to ask the prayers of the league for the many requests presented at his daily noon hour prayer meeting. These services, he writes, began on January 19 last, and have not missed a day, and have increased in scope and power beyond all expectation. A Mother asks special prayer for a daughter who, partially paralyzed, recently fell and injured herself so that she is confined to bed and in great pain. A Reader in Maine writes: "Will you please pray for a lady ninety years old, who is almost blind and very unhappy. Her family are all dead and she lives with strangers." A Wife asks prayer that her husband may receive justice in a lawsuit; W. H. R., that a man be released from prison.

H. B. D. asks prayer for God's blessing upon revival meetings at Murdock, Kansas; Z. E. P., for an awakening in a church at Patersonville, N. Y.; E. D., for blessing upon St. Jacob's Congregational Church, Buffalo, N. Y.; Mrs. M. C. J., for conversion of many at Wyoming, Ill.; Miss F. M. A., of South Boston, Va., that her home mission work may prosper; A Reader, for revival at Schoharie, N. Y.; G. B. S., for the prisoners of the jail in which he preaches; Miss B. K., for greater blessing upon mission work than ever before; Miss N. S. C., for a rescue work which has failed through lack of support; S. M. O., for blessing upon church and community of Amityville, Pa.; H. B., for the church and community of Commerce, Ga., particularly for guidance in choosing a pastor; Mrs. M. A. H., for outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon revival meetings at Jewell, Kansas; Mrs. C. A. K., for blessing upon a Sunday school in Kansas City and for efficiency in teaching the Word; S. E., for a revival at Mackville, Kansas, and that many be saved; Rev. A. J. M., for God's blessing upon people of Blue Springs, Neb., and surrounding counties; Mrs. J. M. R., for State-wide prohibition in New York State; Mrs. J. R. N., for increased spiritual interest in church at Arcadia, Neb.; T. R. E., for a spiritual awakening at Springfield, Ohio; Mrs. E. R., for a deep spiritual revival at Manchester, Ohio; Mrs. D. H. W., for State-wide prohibition in California; Miss F. S., for a revival in vicinity of Spokane, Wash.; Mrs. M. C. R., for revival in Congregational Church at Minong, Wis.; H. R., for revival in Baptist Church at Minong, Wis., and that a prayer league for church union be organized; J. C., New York, for blessing upon the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; Mrs. L. O. P., that a minister be sent to Baptist Church at Gilman, Ill.; Mrs. L. E. A., for a preacher or leader at Fort Dade, Fla.; Mrs. M. S. L., that her son may again take up the work of the ministry; E. D., that her husband may be guided in his ministerial work; A Subscriber, Franklin, Ohio, for widespread observance of the Sabbath; A Reader, for spiritual uplift of the whole church.

Fourteen friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of mind for themselves or friends. Thirteen friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or friends.

Ninety friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal or spiritual blessing.

Ten friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Seventeen friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be cured of the appetite for strong drink, and one that brother may stand firm in his resolution not to drink liquor; two friends, that sons may be delivered from the drug habit, and one that a woman may be delivered from the drug habit.

Twelve wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Two husbands ask prayer for the healing of wives; three sons and daughters for healing of mothers; one daughter for the healing of father; five mothers and fathers for the healing of sons; fourteen parents for the healing of daughters; six wives for the healing of husbands; four friends ask prayer for the healing of sisters; forty-six for healing for themselves; thirty-six for the healing of other relatives and friends.

Thirty-one friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Two hundred sixty-seven friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

MESMERIZED

A Poisonous Drug Still Freely Used.

Many people are brought up to believe that coffee is a necessity of life, and the strong hold that the drug, caffeine, in coffee has on the system makes it hard to loosen its grip even when one realizes its injurious effects.

A lady writes: "I had used coffee for years; it seemed one of the necessities of life. A few months ago my health, which had been slowly failing, became more impaired, and I knew that unless relief came from some source I would soon be a physical wreck.

"I was weak and nervous, had sick headaches, no ambition, and felt tired of life. My husband was also losing his health. He was troubled so much with indigestion that at times he could eat only a few mouthfuls.

"Finally we saw Postum advertised and bought a package. I followed directions for making carefully, and added cream, which turned it to the loveliest rich-looking and tasting drink I ever saw served at any table, and we have used Postum ever since.

"I gained five pounds in weight in as many weeks, and now feel well and strong in every respect. My headaches have gone, and I am a new woman. My husband's indigestion has left him, and he can now eat anything."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

A BUDGET OF NEW BOOKS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

A NUMBER of books have come together on my table in the past weeks—books gorgeous in color or sober in binding; books breathlessly interesting or unbelievably tiresome; books for children, and grown-ups, and near grown-ups. I am going to tell you about some of them.

In Dickens's London, by F. Hopkinson Smith, is a fascinating narrative in words and charcoal pictures. The author has hunted out quaint spots made famous in different novels and has shown them with skill and sympathy and love. The book is so real that, as you read along, you find yourself wandering down narrow streets, dining in tiny inns, tramping through market places and keeping silence in the dusky splendor of huge churches. Charles Scribner's Sons; $3.50.

Another book published by the same house is The Boy Emigrants, by Noah Brooks. It is sure to please any boy who is interested in trips across the plains, gold mines, Indians—in short, adventures. It is more, however, than a piece of fiction; it is a historical sketch of the brave people who made the trail of California. The illustrations are in color by H. T. Dunn. Price, $1.25.

Midstream, by Will Levington Comfort, is the frank spiritual revelation of a man. It sounds like fiction—and yet there is an underlying note of truth that convinces you of its reality. It is a big book, and a different book. George H. Doran Co. Price, $1.25.

The W. A. Wilde Co. have sent in seven books for boys and girls that will surely be appreciated. Wild Kindred of Fur, Feather and Fin, by Jean L. Thompson, will be loved by children who are fond of nature. It tells charming and, what is more, "real sounding" stories about animals, birds and water creatures. Price, $1.25.

Elizabeth, Betsy and Bess—Schoolmates, by Amy E. Blanchard, is one of a series of stories about three little chums. It is a sweet, wholesome book that girls who are outgrowing fairy tales will like. Price, $1.

Beth's Wonder Winter, by Marion James Taggart, is the story of a little New England girl, not used to luxury, who is transplanted in the home of a rich uncle in the city. Her good times will be a delight to growing girls. Price, $1.25.

Cinders, the Young Apprentice of the Steel Mills, by Hugh C. Weir, tells in an absorbing way the story of a boy and his connection with the great steel mills. It throws a fascinating light on a subject that the boys of our country do not know very well. Price,

Boy Scouts in the White Mountains, by Walter Pritchard Eaton, is the story of a long hike taken by a group of boys and their scout master. Those who have read any of Mr. Eaton's other Boy Scout books will be glad to know that all of the old favorites are back again in the new story. Price,

In Camp at Fort Brady, by Lewis Erwin Theiss, is a tale of real life that will prove absorbing to all boys and some girls. It tells very interestingly a great many facts that will help folk who wish to go out into the woods and camp. Price, $1.

Little, Brown & Co. are represented by four books. The first: Little Women Letters from the House of Alcott, by Susie Bonselle and Marian De Forest, is a fascinating revelation of the home life of the Little Women, made famous by Louisa M. Alcott. It includes letters of the girls, their diaries, the baby book of the family, little personal bits of history and small incidents about their friends. Any one who has laughed and cried and then smiled again—with all story girls, will love this book. Price, $1.25.

Mary Mount's Quartette, by Etta Anthony Baker, is one of a series, telling about life at a jolly, enjoyable girls' school. It is a book that young people will enjoy. Price, $1.30.

Two in a Bungalow, by Mary P. Wells Smith, is a story of the adventures of real boys. It is a book that growing-up children will be mighty glad to read. Price, $1.20.

Indian Scout Tales, by Charles A. Eastman, is very interesting, especially to Boy Scouts or Camp-Fire Girls, because it is the real knowledge and real experience of a real Indian. Price, 80 cents.

Essays on Books, by William Lyon Phelps, will be a joy to lovers of good work. There are essays on Richardson, Dickens, Whittier, Carlyle and many others. Some of the essays have appeared in the leading magazines—a true test of their worth. The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.50.

Westminster Abbey, by Helene Marshall Pratt, is a study—in two handsome volumes—of the architecture, history and monuments of one of the world's greatest churches. The dedication—which I quote—will give a beautiful idea of what to expect: "To the Memory of the Brave and Faithful, the Strong, the Steadfast and the True, from Palaces or from Halls of State, from Church or Cloister, or Fair English Home, who at last . . . have found peaceful shelter within the walls of Westminster Abbey." Duffield & Co.

The Winning Hit, by Hawley Williams, is a story of athletics in a large boy's school. It is an exciting book, sure to please the average boy. D. Appleton & Co. Price, $1.25.

Rand, McNally & Co. have sent two very interesting books: Illustrated South America, by William D. Boyce, is the story of a Chicago publisher's travels and adventures in the republics of South America, with 500 photographs of people and scenes from the Isthmus of Panama to the Straits of Magellan. Figures Famed in Fiction, by H. C. Pillsbury, D.D., tells very interestingly the stories of some favorite characters in favorite novels. Jean Valjean, from Les Misérables; John Halifax, from John Halifax, Gentleman; Sydney Carlton, from A Tale of Two Cities, and Lorna Doone are the only four of the fifteen people that you come to know intimately in this unique book. Price, $1.25.

Heroines of Modern Religion, edited by Warren Dunham Foster, is the story of ten great and well-loved women. It is illustrated by photographs. Sturgis & Walton Co. Price, $1.25.

The Old World in the New, by E. A. Ross, is a wonderfully illustrated, charmingly written book that tells the significance of past and present immigration to the American people. As the author says in his preface: "Immigration is a wind that blows democratic ideas throughout the world." It is a book well worth reading. The Century Co. Price, $2.40.

Delightful Dalmatia, by Alice Lee Moque, is a story of travels in a fairyland country that lies now in the path of the great war. The illustrations in sepia are very good. Funk & Wagnalls. Price, $2.

The Maréchale is an intimate narrative of the life, and work in France, of Mrs. Booth-Clibborn. It is an interesting book, well written and illustrated with photographs. Hodder & Stoughton. Price, $1.25.

There is a novel, An Armenian Princess, by Edgar James Banks, which gives a very real idea of life in Turkey and the terrors that come to the Armenians. It is a book that brings to the reader some very vivid pictures. The Gorham Press. Price, $1.25.

The Modernizer of the Orient, by Clayton Sedgwick Cooper. In his preface the author says: "The East has at last met the West face to face. What has been the character of that meeting? The book answers the question in a charming way. McBride, Nast & Co. Price, $2.

Hupmobile

Car of the Annual Efficiency

$1325

Hupmobile Roadster with Coupe Top, complete, $1325, f. o. b. Detroit, $1325 f. o. b. Windsor. Without top, $1200 f. o. b. Detroit, $1200 f. o. b. Windsor

Closed Car Comfort at Open Car Cost

There has never been a demountable winter top like the Hupmobile coupe and sedan.

Such others as you have seen have been built on a general plan, in local shops, for all cars.

This Hupmobile sedan is a thing of beauty as well as utility; designed and built in the Hupp factory.

The others destroy the lines of the car; this retains the graceful beauty of the new Hupmobile.

$1365

Hupmobile Touring Car with Sedan Top, complete, $1365 f.o.b. Detroit, $1600 f. o. b. Windsor. Without top, $1200 f.o.b. Detroit; $1400 f. o. b. Windsor

The others have rattled and shaken loose; this is as firmly attached as any other part of the car.

The others, at best, are simply protection against wind and cold; this, in spite of economy of cost, actually has limousine luxury in its exterior and interior finish.

Business and professional men—doctors and the like—are turning to the coupe-roadster.

Women find it endowed with delightful ease of handling, a motor that can't stall, a big parcel compartment, and plenty of head-room for hats and feathers.

Families, with one accord, favor the sedan-touring car, which brings them winter pleasures and conveniences and comfort they have never known.

Surely no family that can afford a car should go through the winter without this Hup sedan-touring car.

Special sedan top booklet on request.

A Larger Life and Growing Ideals

Epworth League Topic for December 27. Phil. 3: 13, 14

IS YOUR life larger than it was at the beginning of the year? You may be taller, or stouter, or stronger than you were a year ago, but is your life bigger? A time comes when we reach the limit of our physical growth and development, but our real life should grow larger and larger as the years pass.

What does that mean? It means among other things that we ought to have more information than we had a year ago. One of the gravest dangers of our present school system is that information is stuffed into the mind so fast and with such compulsion that the pupil loses the "appetite" for information. It is a bad thing to get satisfied with the amount of information we possess and cease to be hungry for more.

Not only ought we to have more information which we have gained from others, but we ought to have thought some things out for ourselves during the year. The thoughts that we get from others ought to lead us to make thoughts of our own. Some fairly successful people seem to reach quite early in life the point at which they stop thinking. They are so satisfied with the thoughts of earlier years and so busy with each day's work that they do not keep their thought factory operating, and so fail of the larger intellectual life.

But of course the development of the mind is not the most important phase of an enlarging life. The heart life must also grow larger and the will firmer. Many of the things we learn or figure out will awaken, by the very power of the truths found, stronger emotion and deeper determination. For instance, as we learn more about the suffering in the world, the wrongs and injustices which are borne by multitudes, we are impelled to throw ourselves into the task of righting these wrongs and lightening these burdens. So the larger life comes to be a life of larger service. Do we care more this year than we did last about the people who suffer? Are we more determined than ever to help them in our Master's name?

Our soul life should be larger year by year. We should have clearer and higher conceptions of what Christ means to the world and to us. We should have a feeling of tenderer love for him than we had last year and a more passionate determination to follow him anywhere and to make any sacrifices to bring others to the gladness of his salvation.

Our ideals change as the years pass. We recollect whimsically some of the ideals of childhood—the things we wanted to be and get and do. Have those ideals changed and grown adequately as the years have passed? Shall we be content with anything less than the highest—to know Christ, to love him and to strive valiantly to bring his will to pass in the world and to bring the world to him?

The old year is dead. It is too late now to make it better, but "forgetting those things which are behind and reaching forth unto those which are before," we may, during every one of the days of 1915, "press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it." How can divine beauty be upon us? How can the imperfect work of our faltering hands be established? These things can be done as we give ourselves and our days and our years to Christ.

We all love beauty. At least there were other days when we loved it, before we were blinded and maddened by the busy whirl in which so many of us live. But let us think, as the New Year dawns, what a really tender and exquisite thing beauty is. Think of the most beautiful scene you have ever beheld, the most beautiful flower, the most beautiful face, the most beautiful strain of music, and then think of the beauty of God, as it was revealed in the nature of Christ. Then think how attractive, how alluring is the idea that this beauty can come to us. As we give our hearts to him to be cleansed of their sin, as we press near to him in obedience, worship, faith and service, his beauty will shine upon us and we can share in it. We are to be changed into "the same image, from glory to glory." We are to be "conformed to the image of his Son." "When he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."

Are we living so that others, knowing us, shall think of Jesus; so they catch something of the beauty of his life in us and are moved toward him?

This is the real work of life. As we thus seek and delight in the beauty of Christ we shall find our work growing better and steadier and more fruitful, being established by his power.

This Year and All Years for Christ

Christian Endeavor Topic for December 27. Phil. 3: 10-14

SUPPOSE we take for special study the last verse of the psalm assigned as our Bible lesson, keeping in mind the words of our topic: "This Year and All Years for Christ." "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; and

Home Missions Reflex in Foreign Missions

B. Y. P. U. Topic for December 27. Rom. 11: 13-24

WHILE the Christian life is in some respects care-free there are certain things about which the Christian must be very careful. We can never tell how far the influence of any word or deed of ours will be carried nor how far-reaching the results may be of a good deed done or a good deed neglected. America and Americans are having an ever-growing influence upon other continents. Foreigners from non-Christian lands get their impression of what Christianity means by observing American life, and we must all acknowledge that many of those impressions are sadly distorted.

Christ is not only sending out Americans to help evangelize the world. He is sending the world here to be evangelized. The millions of immigrants who come to our land from Europe on the Atlantic Coast and Asia on the Pacific, hear and see the Gospel. In our home mission work thousands of them are converted. Many of these return to their own home land and tell there the story of the Saviour they found in the new country. So our home mission work becomes foreign mission work, as these new Christians themselves become missionaries to take the Gospel back to their friends.

American schools founded and supported by our home mission funds cultivate the foreign missionary spirit, not only sending out many students as foreign missionaries, but educating young people from non-Christian lands, who return as missionaries to their own people.

In our gifts to home missions, in our work and plans for home missions and in all our Christian life, Sundays and weekdays, our thought and prayers and ambition should be not only for our own people, nor for the foreigners who come to us, but for the great millions beyond the seas who still stretch out their hands for the Gospel of Jesus.

Every man who by his example leads others to moderate drinking leads some of them to drunkenness.

BAKER'S BREAKFAST COCOA

Has the delicious natural flavor of which one never tires. Artificially flavored cocoas soon pall upon the palate.

"In that word ('flavor') lies the key to the whole food problem," says Henry T. Finck in "Food and Flavor"; for without an attractive flavor there is no enjoyment of food.

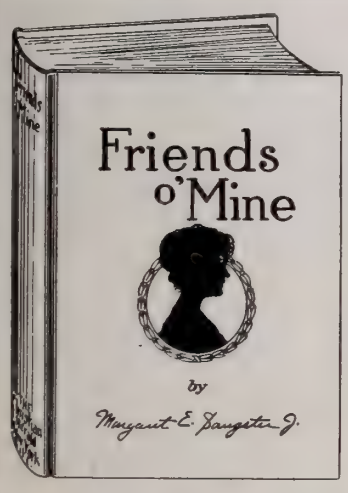
Books Well Worth While

Any one of these books is good enough to start your library with, if you haven't a library; and good enough to be placed in the best libraries in the land, and on the reading table in every home. Excellent Gifts, every one of them! The Almanac and Calendar are now established Christian Herald institutions, consulted the year through by—oh, ALMOST every home of consequence. This year let us add your home to the list.



Friends o' Mine

MISS MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR., has been making friends fast. She sends out this year a charming book, containing the best of her poems, stories and sketches, many hitherto unpublished. Those not yet familiar with her work will have the privilege, through Friends o' Mine, of being admitted to this ever-widening circle of these friends who find delight in this gifted young writer's merry, kindly, original, thoughtful views of life.

We will send you, postpaid, a copy of "Friends o' Mine" and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one full year for only..... $1.85

We will send our old subscribers FREE, as a reward, a copy of "Friends o' Mine" for sending us one NEW yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for $1.50

Janice Day

JANICE DAY is the "Do Something Girl." She has the American horror of doing nothing, and Helen Beecher Long's story of her breezy achievements is not only delightful but stimulating to the same sort of healthy and helpful activities. Janice encounters Mexican outlaws, and has other thrilling experiences, but amid all, she is the wholesome, sweet, fascinating, busy, vigorous, helpful American girl.

The Christian Herald Almanac for 1915

THE Christian Herald Almanac for 1915—full of information concerning the things you want to know about, both religious and secular—with bits of inspiration scattered through the fact pages. Follow the new year through the pages of this household companion.

In addition to all the standard almanac features, which include the monthly calendar, moon's phases, events of the year, etc., it gives a great deal of valuable information which people in town and country will welcome. It tells what the various departments of the Government stand ready to do for the farmer, the rural householder and the city dweller. It gives a résumé of the leading events of the great war, from the beginning up to November 1.

In Christ's Own Country

WHERE would you rather go than to the Holy Land? With whom would you rather travel than with Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder and President of Christian Endeavor? Dr. Clark knows how to see, and he knows how to tell what he sees. He visits the Holy Land reverently, feeling not only that the Master was there two thousand years ago, but that he is still there, accompanying and instructing the devout pilgrims. The scenes are made still more real by the camera pictures taken by Mrs. Clark. There are fifty-three beautiful views of the Holy Land, including a number of superb four-color, full-page pictures.

ADVANCE OF THE GRAND ARMY

NAPOLEON'S name fills more pages in the world's solemn history than that of any other mortal. The advance of his Grand Army into Russia is the turning point of his career, and marks the beginning of his downfall. Today mighty armies are again advancing over the same battlefields where Napoleon fought a hundred years ago. The picture shown herewith from Ridpath's History marks but one event out of thousands which are fully described and illustrated in the world-famed publication.

Ridpath's History of the World

We will mail a beautiful 46-page booklet of sample pages to all readers interested in our offer who mail us the coupon below. Hundreds have already availed themselves of our special offer. We have shipped this splendid set of books to delighted readers living in every state in the union, and every purchaser is more than satisfied. We are closing out the few remaining sets of the last edition, brand new, down to date, beautifully bound in half morocco.

NEVER AGAIN SUCH A BOOK BARGAIN AS THIS!

We will name our price only in direct letters to those sending the coupon below. Tear off the coupon, write name and address plainly and mail now before you forget it. Dr. Ridpath's widow derives her income from his History, and to print our price broadcast for the sake of more quickly selling these few sets would cause great injury to future sales. Send coupon to-day.

The Present European War

The great monarchies of Europe are now engaged in the greatest tragedy of human history. If you would know the underlying causes which have led up to this great conflict, the deep racial antipathies, the mutual jealousies, the commercial rivalries, the sting of past defeats, the vaulting ambitions for world Empire, then you should place Ridpath's History of the World in your home.

Ridpath's is the ONE GREAT HISTORY, the one Authentic History to which you can turn and enlighten yourself on these past events. It is endorsed by the scholarship of the world and by the great American people as the greatest History of the World ever written.

Nine Beautiful Royal Octavo Volumes

FREE!

WE will mail free a beautiful 46-page booklet on history to every reader interested in our offer who mails us the coupon below. It contains portraits of Socrates, Cæsar, Napoleon, Shakespeare and other great characters in history; also specimen pages showing the beautiful style in which the work is written.

4000 double column pages 2000 superb illustrations

THE REASON for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian in any generation has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan. He combines absorbing interest with supreme reliability and makes the heroes of history real living men and women, and about them he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes as absorbingly interesting as the greatest of fiction.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

6,000 Years of History

Ridpath throws the mantle of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there; patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles with three hundred and fifty Greek ships smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as a synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there, gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says, "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century, the most colossal world-figure of his time.

ENDORSED BY THOUSANDS

From Thousands of Testimonials We Print the Following:

President McKinley said: "I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the people generally."

William J. Bryan said: "Dr. Ridpath's History of the world is a lasting monument to the author's intelligence and industry. It is thorough and comprehensive."

Bishop Vincent said: "Ridpath's History is in clear and agreeable style, comprehensive in treatment, readable type and admirable illustrations. This set of books is a permanent college chair of general history in one's own house."

o signify that a general officer was living there. n the big restaurant of the hotel many officers were eating, drinking, talking. Quite a gay scene from a certain point of view and quite in contrast with the unutterable misery outside. The women in line quite frequently looked into the hotel, but the soldiers at the tables seldom thought to look outside. Such sights interfere with one's digestion.

After that we walked around the town and looked at the wrecks of houses, which had been broken down by shells during the siege. Sometimes we would find a whole block of houses gone, sometimes a house here and there in a row. There was one curved street with occasional gaps in it where houses had been. I could liken it to nothing else than a row of broken teeth in the gigantic mouth of Antwerp. Nearly all the houses destroyed were those of business firms or of private citizens. The big city buildings seemed untouched. How the German batteries could get such accurate range seemed wonderful. A Belgian explained it by saying that German spies gave it to them by setting certain houses on fire and thus they were guided, during the day by the smoke, during the night by the pillars of flame. However, there are many strange stories being told in Antwerp.

Soldiers were everywhere in Antwerp, as they are everywhere in Belgium. Crowds filled the sidewalks and overflowed into the roadways down the middle of which tramped an unbroken stream of refugees returning to town from where they had been hiding far afield. Every blank wall was covered with posters, printed in German and French, announcements of the conquerors. They laid down rules of conduct for the people, conditions as to the necessity of maintaining public order, decency and sanitation. There was one which insisted that the children of the city, who had been allowed to run the streets, be sent regularly to school from that day on. There was another which warned that any civilian found on the public streets after nine P. M. would be arrested.

So, it being late, we returned to our Zeppelin parlor and prepared to go to bed. While we were doing so we heard an indistinct wailing in the near distance. It was hardly the wail of a child and yet it had all the plaintive effect of such a sound. My companion, a young Irish-American, and I were unable to determine just what it was or where. It kept us awake, and finally he got up and opening the window poked his head out in the cold. He drew in immediately.

"Hey!" he exclaimed excitedly, "it's a little cat walking about in the snow on the glass awning down on the second floor. Let's go get it."

It did seem cruel to leave it there, so down the dark stairs we crept to the front parlor of the second floor. We opened the full-length window and Flannery leaned out. The snow-covered porte cochere was several feet below. He leaned out, head downward, while I held onto his feet. After some maneuvering he got the kitten and we all hauled up and in. When we reached our bedroom Flannery sat down and gazed abstractedly at nothing. Something was troubling him.

"Hey, boy!" I exclaimed, "come to bed. It's getting colder. What's on your mind?"

"I was thinking," he answered slowly. "I was thinking of those poor women standing in the snow. I'm glad we got the cat in, anyway."

So we both got to thinking of the misery all about us until sheer weariness put us asleep.

Mr. Waters's first-hand narrative of conditions in Belgium and other war-smitten countries of Europe will be continued next week, at which time we shall begin publishing the great pictures made by our special photographer.

TRANSLATION

Mr. Theodore Waters, Director of the Christian Herald Relief Fund.

DEAR SIR: We would not let you go back to your very sympathetic America without expressing to you our best thanks for what you have done in helping the poor Belgians.

Owing to the happy initiative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a great number of poor Belgians have been helped out of famine during a certain period; and it is in their name that we send you our very best thanks.

The short trip you have made in our destroyed Belgium will permit you to explain to your readers the very unfortunate situation of our poor country. The American people will then have an idea of the help they gave by sending us a cargo of foodstuff to the poor Belgians.

Thanking you once more for your kindness, we remain, dear sir,

Yours respectfully,

NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR RELIEF IN BELGIUM.

A PLEA FOR THE NEW YEAR

A SERMON

BY

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.*

"Wilt thou not revive us again?" Ps. 85: 6. "Take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people." Isa. 57: 14

THERE could be no greater blessing come to the church in the year 1915 than that a wave of spiritual power should quicken and strengthen every agency and department of her work and a genuine old-fashioned revival of religion be experienced by her members. Such a blessing has been the hope of the church in ages past, and it would seem to many of us as if it were the only hope for the present and immediate future.

The first text is a cry of God's own people after their experience in the days of their captivity, and so in a peculiar sense it is applicable to us today. His ancient people had been the chosen vessels of God and had been greatly used of him, and now the cry coming from the depth of their hearts is, "Wilt thou not revive us again?" We, too, were once in captivity and the Lord graciously set us free. There have been times in days past when we too were used as his chosen vessels of blessing to a lost and ruined world; but alas for many of us there is now a dearth of spiritual power and an absence of the quickening presence of the Holy Ghost, and so the earnest cry of God's people ought to be: "Wilt thou not revive us again?"

I know the objections which are urged against revivals of religion. It is said that they produce an abnormal condition of affairs in the church not always healthful; but my answer is that a cold, dead church is even more abnormal and certainly more to be feared. It is said that they produce undue excitement, the effect of which is not for the church's good; but I solemnly affirm that undue excitement could not be worse for the church than cold dead formalism or indifference. It is claimed by some that the after effects are bad; but of this I am positively sure: that the present influence of an almost lifeless church is far worse than that of the one which is spiritually revived.

The history of the church proves that she has made her principal advancement in the day of revival. God has always set his seal of approval upon true revivals. To oppose a genuine revival is to go contrary to the plan of God.

The stories of Samuel, Ezra and Nehemiah reveal to us the history of many gracious outpourings of the power and spirit of God when individuals, households and the nation were mightily quickened. Pentecost is but another story of an old-time revival, and while Pentecost may not be repeated in the sense that the Holy Ghost might come now as he came then (for then it was to usher in his dispensation that he came upon the people); yet when the church is with one accord in one place and lives are as fully separated unto God as were the lives of the early leaders of the church, it is a possible thing to receive from God just such a mighty blessing as made the day of Pentecost memorable. The Reformation in the fourteenth century is the story of a great revival, when Luther and his followers rebelled against the teaching that the works of man could justify him before God, and substituted in its place the doctrine of justification by faith.

The nineteenth century reveals to us the presence of God in the revival of 1857, since which time we have had special works of grace under the direction of Charles G. Finney, D. L. Moody and others. But in the opening years of the twentieth century there has been no notable work of grace, and there is no reason, either in the plan of God or in the Word of God, why we may not now have another gracious revival. For this I plead with all my heart.

Needed: Preachers Who Walk with God

WHY have we not had more remarkable work of grace in modern times? There are various reasons presented by thoughtful students of the situation. I feel very sure that the following will be generally accepted as true:

First: Because so many members of the church have come to the place where they do not believe in revivals of religion, some for the reasons above stated, some for conscientious reasons and some because of worldly living. "He could do no mighty works because of their unbelief," was said of the Master himself. It is certainly true that the servant is not greater than his Lord, and if Jesus himself was compelled to stop his work in the face of unbelief or at least have his influence hindered, it is easy to understand how ministers in many churches in all parts of the land in these days have preached almost in vain and have felt that they were truly "ambassadors in bonds."

Second: Because of the condition of the preachers themselves. No grander company of men are known today than those who preach the Gospel of the grace of God, and the time has come when the church ought to be called to pray for God's blessing upon her ministers. These are terrific days in which we are living. It is a time when one can scarcely read a paper or a religious treatise without finding Satan standing ready to hurl his shaft of unbelief into one's very soul. May God's best blessing be upon the ministry of the church, for no men are more sorely in need of spiritual help.

And yet it is true that there does not seem to be with us as ministers the concern that possessed the ministers of the Gospel in former days. Our sermons seem to lack in many cases what Aristotle called the "agonistical" or "wrestling" element. It is said that when Luther preached every sermon seemed like a thunderbolt; that Baxter never preached a sermon in vain; that Edwards's celebrated sermon, preached in the dim candle light, brought men face to face with God and the judgment; and that when Finney preached men trembled as if they were in the presence of God himself. But if the question is asked: "Are not the times changed?" we answer, "Yes, and the habits of His servants seem to have changed, too, for Luther walked with God." Baxter was literally crucified to the world; Edwards had such zeal for the cause that he forgot to eat and sleep; and Finney again and again let sleep flee from his eyes that he might preach to a dying world. It is my intense conviction that God is today seeking to gain control of some souls that he may through them, as they possess this same spirit, reach the multitudes.

It would seem sometimes as if those of us who preach had forgotten the gravity of our position. A description has been given of the ministers and their preaching in the olden days, when the plague spread over London. They lifted up their voices and spared not, for it seemed as if every sermon might be their last. Graves were open on every side of them; life was not a hand's breadth but a hair's breadth. There were no polished periods in their sermons, no learned arguments or labored paragraphs that chilled their appeals or rendered their words unintelligible; no fear of man, no love of popular applause prevented their reaching out after souls. Old Time seemed to say, "Work while it is day, for tonight may never come." Grim Death seemed to stand by every pulpit and say, "Shoot your arrow for God or I will shoot mine." They preached like dying men to dying men. Oh that we might have such preaching now!

Third: Because of the condition of the church. This condition may simply be one of indifference, but that is sin. If a man's foot does not help him in walking it hinders him in his progress, and if we are not aiding in extension of the kingdom of God we are hindering its progress.

The ordinary means of grace are not enough. Up to the fourth century the church met daily for prayer and worship. It is incredible that two services in the church each week could fulfil the mission designed to be ours by the Great Head of the church. No one can escape responsibility. The curse of Meroz (Judges 5: 23) may be the curse of many a church member. "They came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty." The sin of omission may be quite as great as the sin of commission. Jesus said: "Inasmuch as ye did it not" (Matt. 24: 25).

A genuine revival would bring to us all the greatest blessing. It would mean a better knowledge and a more sincere appreciation of the Word of God. It would mean an enrichment of home living, the erection or repair of family altars, the quickening of all that makes for righteousness in the church. It would mean a disposition to be truer to others who are less fortunate than ourselves, the lifting of heavy burdens, the wiping away of many tears. It would mean everything that is good and true and beautiful.

Needed: Church Members Who Believe

WE SORELY need a revival. The cry of all God's faithful children should be: "Wilt thou not revive us again?"

"Take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people." This seems like God's answer to the cry for a revival. That he is willing to pour out his Spirit, we must all agree; that the need is great no one will deny; that we have not in recent years had any notable revivals of religion, every one must acknowledge. The responsibility cannot be with God; it must be with ourselves. The unsaved have no power either to help or to hinder the revival. God works through his own to reach the lost. There must be some sin or sins in the way. No better enumeration of these sins could be given than those suggested by Charles G. Finney.

First, sins of omission. Ingratitude: With trouble all about us, sickness on every side, we ourselves have been spared, and yet how often no prayer of thanksgiving has arisen from our hearts in acknowledgment of God's goodness. Want of love to God: We have loved many things, but God and the things pertaining to him we have all but put out of our lives. Neglect of the Bible: Days and weeks have passed by in which we have not read His Book, or if we have done so it has been with carelessness or indifference. Neglect of prayer: Secret prayer or family prayer some have not offered for many a day. Neglect of the means of grace: The most trifling things have kept us away from the house of God. To the question as to whether we have been guilty or not guilty of these sins, alas! many of us must answer that we are guilty.

Second, sins of commission. Worldly mindedness: We have set our affections on things below, not on things above. Pride: We have cared for the body more than for the soul; more for the opinions of men than for the judgment of God. Envy: When others have been exalted and praised our feelings have been hurt and our hearts have been filled with bitter thoughts. Censoriousness: We have spoken without charity and have not been guided by the spirit of love. Slander: It is not necessary to state that which is untrue in order to be guilty of slander, but to tell the truth with a desire to injure is to be guilty of the sin. Levity: For every idle word we must give an account before God. We would not trifle as we stand in the presence of an earthly king, but we have trifled with the eternal God. Robbing God: If we are redeemed then all we have is his. If we have kept back any part of the price, then when the question is asked, "Will a man rob God?" we must answer, "We are guilty."

All this being true, it follows that if we are to have a gracious revival for which many hearts are hungry there must come first of all a time of heart-searching and of quiet waiting before God, when the thing that is questionable in our lives shall be forsaken and that which is positively sinful shall be forever given up. It would seem as if a revival must come soon, for the need is great. We have tried so many other things and all without permanent blessing. We have had reform movements; evangelistic campaigns, with sound of trumpets and flying banners; we have had great social schemes in operation; we have sometimes thought the day of blessing was dawning and we have taken heart. It must truly be said that practically all that has been done has accomplished a measure of good. But the revival—the long looked-for, sorely needed revival—still tarries and we feel like saying: "O Lord, how long, how long?" We feel like crying out as did the young girl at the beginning of the Welsh revival: "O Lord, send a revival and let it begin in me." But perhaps the better cry is: "Wilt thou not revive us again?" To this I am sure the Divine response would be: "Take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people." Then the blessing would come; then the windows of heaven would be opened; then what men have asked for in prayer, what ministers have sought for in preaching, what God so desires to give to his people—a genuine revival of religion—would be upon us.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY REVS. J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND DR. CLAYTON S. COOPER

My Leader

SUNDAY, January 3. Psalm 23. "He leadeth me." A guide-post is one thing; a guide is quite another. It is helpful to have written instructions; it is far more helpful to have the leadership of a companionable friend. We might acquire an art from a text-book, but how infinitely more delightful it is to acquire it from a competent teacher. It is the vital human presence which tells. It is the living fellowship which takes the length out of the long road and fills it with inspiring interest from end to end.

And in the unknown way of life we have a comforting Presence. We have the help of the guide-post, which is our conscience. We have the counsel of the guide-book, which is the Bible. But we have something better than both: we have the Lord of the road, who erected the guide-post; we have the all-wise Counselor, who inspired the guide-book. The good Lord does not guide us by maxims or rules. He gives us himself. "He leadeth me." "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." "The Lord himself is thy keeper."

And so this is the wonderful prospect for the unknown journey of the new year—the communion of the Holy Spirit. His companionship is not conditioned by the nature of the road. He will not desert me when the way becomes rough and difficult. Nay, he reserves his choicest inspirations for the sternest parts of the road. He has songs for the night. He has cordials for the oppressive day. He has everything that heart can wish or need. "He leadeth me." I will trust, and not be afraid.

Reasoning with God

MONDAY, January 4. Isaiah 1: 10-19. "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord." There are many things in religion above reason, but none against it. God, the Author of reason, is not likely to flout one of our noblest attributes. The facts of religion may defy the plumb-line of the mind, though they are evident to the heart. But when they are granted God is prepared to reason with us on their significance and logical outcomes. That the Son of God should become man, yield to a shameful death, and in death put away sin—these things pass understanding, but the heart recognizes their truth. When they are accepted reason builds on them the majestic systems of a Calvin, a Pascal or an Edwards.

We reason with ourselves that sins like ours cannot be forgiven, that crimson and scarlet are fast colors, that we must reap as we have sown, that we must always wear the badge and disgrace of the ex-convict. Then God steps in and says: "Come, let us reason together. Don't reason with yourself and by yourself. Reason with me, because I can adduce facts which will materially alter your conclusions." Then he shows us that, in the person of Christ, he has made a reconciliation, that he need not impute sin because of the sacrifice of the cross, that he would be unjust and unfaithful if he did not forgive sin and cleanse from all unrighteousness. What more is to be said? Our sins are gone! Look at that range of snow-clad Alps against the blue sky! Such are his forgiven ones!

Redeeming the Time

TUESDAY, January 5. Ephesians 5: 16. "Redeeming the time, because the days are evil." Napoleon said that he conquered the Russians because the Russians never knew the value of time; while they dawdled he overthrew them. "Who murders time," said Seneca, "he crushes in the bud a power ethereal, only not adored." Success is a matter of redeeming the time. The great men of the Scriptures seem to be impressed with the shortness of duration and with the necessity of working before the night cometh when no man can work.

One has borne witness that his life was changed because in a room opposite Walter Scott, an indefatigable worker, the last thing he saw at night was the hand of the novelist turning over the white sheets of paper upon which he was writing "Waverly"—the first thing in the morning as he looked out was the same hand turning over the white sheets. A young man said to me: "I don't have time to read my Bible." I asked him to sit down and make a systematic summary of every moment of his day. He found to his chagrin that he was regularly wasting three hours a day. At West Point the late Colonel Larned once told me that they were increasing the schedule, which even then gave to the boys less than an hour a day to themselves, because, as the colonel said, "The cadets have too much idle time."

Those of us who engage in senseless and profitless pleasure or indolence just for the sake of putting in the time, should ponder the following mighty words of Tennyson:

> Life is not an idle ore
> But iron dug from central gloom
> And heated hot with burning fears,
> And dipt in baths of hissing tears,
> And battered with the shocks of doom
> To shape and use.

Widening Our Horizon

WEDNESDAY, January 6. John 1: 1-18. "The life was the light of men." Many teachers, claiming divine inspiration—so it has been fitly said—have taught more or less of truth and founded religious sects and schools; but no one has ever pretended to make his disciples the partakers of his own life. Their community with their teacher has been only that of a common opinion or belief. But all the symbols used to describe the relation of his disciples to Christ imply a vital union—the Vine and its branches, the Head and its members, the living Corner-Stone and the living stones. He came that we might have a life of a higher quality than physical, psychical or human, and that we might have it overflowingly. As the Living Head of his church, he gives in regeneration his own supernatural life and feeds it with constant pulsations of his life blood.

As we receive this life we get light. Things that baffled the solution of the intellect become clear and luminous. Other religions say: Know and you shall be; Christ says: Be and you shall know. Dare to step out in faith and open your heart to the inflowing tide of Christ's life. You may receive in proportion to the strength and thoroughness with which you say No to self and Yes to him. Then gradually the problems which have troubled you will dissolve. As you climb your horizon will widen, the clouds will drop below your feet and you will know as you are known. The Life is Light!

Our Heart in the Work

THURSDAY, January 7. II Chronicles 31: 21. "In every work that he began . . . he did it with all his heart and prospered." Mr. Edison was once asked to define genius. He answered that genius is two per cent, of inspiration and ninety-eight per cent. of perspiration. The Bible incites the Christian to be persistent, to be energetic, never to say die—to do every work upon which he begins with all his heart. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might," is the echo of the above passage running throughout the Scriptures. The teaching is universal, that it is not the possession but the use of our powers that counts.

I had two intimate friends in college. One was at the head of his class, the other was nearly at the foot of it. One took every prize, the other took none. Ten years after graduation I found the prize-winner a clerk in a lawyer's office out in Kansas, while the dull student was one of the most successful physicians in a large city. I asked the physician "Why"? He answered, "I never stop working. I put my whole strength into it. I knew that I had no genius or special talent, that I just had to work to succeed." The brilliant student took his profession lightly and enjoyed long vacations, while the physician was working resolutely night and day on the East Side in New York, building up a practice among the poor, who needed him. Truly, he did his work with all his heart and prospered. Not that brains fail to count; sometimes they do and often they do not. Seldom do they assure success without resistless energy and application.

William Cary said, "I have one trait of success. I can plod."

There are times when we can only plod and keep working, when life is low and circumstances are gray; then we have need to remember that doing things with all one's heart brings absolutely sure success.

"My Father worketh hitherto and I work," said Jesus. Today I go forth, handicapped maybe by circumstances or by education, but I am going to do my work with all my heart.

The Hidden Riches of Christ

FRIDAY, January 8. Ephesians 1: 1-14. "Blessed with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ." When a settler in a new country has received his grant of land, though it is all his, he is not immediately able to possess it. He places his fences around a certain number of acres and begins to cut down timber, plow and sow. At the year's end he pushes the fences farther out, encloses more of the acreage and brings this portion also under tillage, and thus, as the years pass, the portion under cultivation approximates always more closely to the original grant. But even when he has touched the farthest limit he may become suddenly aware of the presence of coal or iron or oil fields beneath the surface, of which he had never dreamed.

So it is with the resources stored up for us in Jesus Christ. There is nothing which the soul can desire for its perfect equipment with faith, hope, love, peace, joy and power, which is not stored in the fulness of our Lord. It pleased the Father that in him all fulness should dwell, that out of his fulness all of us who believe in him should be filled, not once, but continually and increasingly. But we must learn how to receive, appropriate and possess. Each trial, sorrow and temptation which is permitted to enter our life is intended to awaken us to some fresh attribute in Christ, of which we had never previously thought. It is intended also not only that we should know of these things, but make use of them by the appeal of our faith, as we draw on a sum of money stored by a friend to our credit at the bank.

The Christian Life a Battle

SATURDAY, January 9. Matthew 10: 22. "He that endureth to the end shall be saved."

> The man who, though his fights be all defeats,
> Still fights,
> Enters at last
> The heavenly Jerusalem's rejoicing streets.

Human nature loves ease, hates struggle, denial and conflict. Israel longed for the fleshpots of Egypt, even with its bondage, rather than Canaan by way of the desert. Some soldiers prefer dress parade to battlefields. They rather walk city streets than trenches. The wonderful inventions of the age contribute to ease. We ride up Pike's Peak, Vesuvius and the Alps instead of climbing. So men seek riches by a single bound rather than toiling up, round by round. The palace car comfort is a great improvement over the ox cart and stage coach if it only does not tend to a life of luxury in the lap of inactivity.

There can be no high moral or spiritual attainment without agonizing struggle, enduring hardness unto the end of the way as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Men seek some other way than Calvary's cross, which makes them thieves and robbers. Our Lord paid the price of bridging the gulf and building the way. We must pay the price of consecration, pain, resistance of temptation and winning mighty conflicts.

Comment by the Way

—NEW YORK IS BECOMING MORE than ever a cosmopolitan city. During November, applications for citizenship were one hundred per cent. higher than in any previous month, and this at a time when immigration from Europe has almost ceased. Four thousand one hundred and forty-three aliens applied for citizen papers, Italians and Russians predominating. This was due to the revival of the alien labor law which rules that only citizens can be employed on public works. Many of the alien population of the metropolis will not be entitled to vote for several years to come. It is estimated that if all the aliens in Manhattan had the franchise, they would outnumber the native-born by 250,000.

—IN A LETTER FROM Bishop Hartzell (who is a member of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Advisory Committee of the Widows and Orphans Relief Fund), he writes: "It is certainly a great beginning you have made in the relief work—a steamship load of six hundred tons of flour, rice and peas sent to the Belgian sufferers. In a conversation with Ambassador Page, I learned of the movements of Mr. Waters. The stories of want and suffering which one hears from many, many sections, are appalling. On the other hand, it is wonderful how the Christian world is rising to its responsibilities! The part that America is taking in this world movement is profoundly affecting all classes in the world war zone. My next tour is a long and difficult one, along both coasts and in Central Africa. Many think I ought not to go because of war conditions, but my duty is plain to go, unless providentially prevented. In my north Africa tour, just completed, martial law and other war conditions only added larger faith and opened new opportunities for the extension of the work."

THE CHURCH AND THE WORKINGMAN

AND WHAT IS NEEDED TO BRING THEM INTO RIGHT RELATIONS

TODAY we present the fourth and last instalment of the contributions received from leading American thinkers and writers on sociological questions, on the urgent problem: "How Can the Church Win Back the Workingman?" Lack of space makes it impossible to give all the letters in full, although the essential points made by the writers are presented in every instance. In an early issue we hope to give a review of the contributions as a whole, by Mr. Pannkoke, who has conducted the discussion so skilfully and successfully.

The Church Should No Longer Neglect the Rights of the Workers, Says Dr. Warren H. Wilson

THE heart of the problem for the church is, in my judgment, that the wants which are universal are sacred in the eyes of God and should be so in those of man. The church should sympathize with the wants of the people, in so far as those wants are universal, and especially the church should sympathize with those wants the satisfaction of which makes up family life and social organization.

I think the church has neglected the welfare and interest of the working classes. There has been an idealized individualism in the churches and religious leaders have insisted upon "regarding all men alike." This has prevented any sympathy with the particular conditions prevailing among working people.

I do not think, however, that the church's neglect has contributed so much to the present situation as one might suppose. It is simply one irritating and discouraging factor; it has done the church more harm than it has done the workingman.

I do not think that the church should lessen her emphasis on spiritual matters, and I am not a believer in what is called "Social Betterment." I do heartily believe, however, in social service.

To combat specific industrial evils, the church must do what it has done in fighting the saloon; there must be persistent and fearless attack. A church people must be trained to hate industrial wrongs. Things must be condemned in the church that are evil, and this will call for courage and persistence. The church should be the mouthpiece of public opinion; it is a shame for the church to be behind and to be slower than public opinion, as some of our churches are.

The Christian Church Knows No Classes, Writes Pastor G. U. Wenner

THE comforts of life are not to be despised; but the problem of the church is to teach men not to set their affections on the things on the earth, but on things above. Otherwise they will most assuredly get fooled.

The Christian Church knows no classes, defined from a social point of view. The only classes the church recognizes are believers and unbelievers, members and non-members, converted and unconverted. To the church, wealth, culture, high station, or the lack of all these things have absolutely no existence in the exercise of her mission to call men to repentance and faith. When a congregation ministers to certain classes only it has to that extent lost its right to be considered an exponent of the religion of the New Testament.

In Lutheran churches, to the best of my knowledge and belief, the majority of the members are wage-earners and men whose business connects them closely with laboring men. Take away the workingmen from our congregations and 90 per cent. of our churches would have to be closed.

The church should not "lay less emphasis on spiritual matters and find a greater field in social betterment." New men will make new conditions.

There are industrial evils. It is the business of the church so to inspire men with the spirit of the Master that in their social relations they will not work to wrong their fellow men by a policy of self-seeking and avarice.

New York City. G. U. WENNER.

A Town Which Claims to Have Solved the Problem Successfully

IN OUR community here, a town of about 12,000 population, we have no problem of the church and the workingman. The principal industries of the town are iron and steel manufacture, where the men work twelve-hour shifts, alternating day and night, but with Sunday rest, excepting a few positions such as taking care of the fires over Sunday and a small amount of brick patching, etc., which has to be done when the heat is less intense. I mention this fact because it has been claimed that men working under these conditions cannot attend church or have the enjoyment of their usual social privileges.

The churches here and their working forces are made up in considerable proportion of the men who work in the steel industries, an effort having been put forth in the churches to reach all classes of men and make them feel at home when they came into the church. The result is gratifying and I can say personally that a beautiful spirit of close Christian fellowship exists, so that high and low, rich and poor, meet together according to the spirit set forth in the Scriptures.

Personally I believe that the way to bring about this result is by individual effort amongst all classes without discrimination. I do not believe anything can be accomplished by attempting to reach men through labor organizations, or any other organizations as such, because it is with the heart man believeth, and the man has to be touched in his heart as an individual before anything can be done.

The Church Must Reorganize and Preach and Practice the Gospel

THE church's message can only be effective when the spirit and life of its members are consistent with its teachings. We cannot escape the obligation of that love which alone fulfils the law and will secure peace and good fellowship. My experience obliges me to believe that the first and great necessity is to have Christians reorganize and the members considered as the church and not, as at present, the ministry. Every member should feel an individual responsibility and make both individual and united effort. The people, including the labor element, cannot be drawn to the church by mere oratorical efforts on the part of the ministers. It is the plain and simple Gospel alone that saves and whose power cannot fail to bring into harmony even those whose interests in life are widely different.

The Church Has Neglected the Workers, Charges President E. A. Ross

THE condition of the workingmen today is by no means worse than in the past. Nevertheless, it is below what a democratic Christian civilization demands: the men are being subjected to new kinds of pressure (e.g.: from massed capital under absentee control) and women and children are being drawn from out the home into industry to a degree never before known in the history of mankind. The heart of the problem for the church is to revolt against the dwarfing of the moral, intellectual and spiritual life of precious and useful human beings by the crushing weight (at certain points) of bulked capital.

The church has grossly neglected the welfare of the working classes by taking a stand on every sort of moral problem except their problem and by allying itself with and condoning the offenses of oppressors of labor, who might supply the means for the church carrying on various services which she had at heart.

The working people want sympathy and succor in their battle for a decent life, and the institutional church does not fill their need. I approve of making a church a center for the social life of the members, but that is a very different thing from the response of the church to the challenge of the labor problem.

Political and Industrial Co-operation Point the Way, Writes Social Worker Joseph Lee

I THINK the great thing to be done for the working people in this country (beyond the old and good prescription of education and more of it) is to forward every form of actual active co-operation, especially industrial and agricultural co-operation in the form of banks, credit associations and actual purchasing or producing enterprises. I believe the truth behind Socialism—what makes it a religion (and therefore is especially interesting to the church)—is its appeal to the human instinct of membership. That instinct is now expressed in politics and ought to be expressed in industry also. Every factory and every department store and every railroad ought to be a team in which every one who works is not merely an employee but a member.

I don't think the church can help much. On each occasion it is too much like a family quarrel and the only kind of solution that can be arrived at nowadays is a compromise between real wages and a sort of public charity—the result being based not on earning power but partly on need, and the employer being the disbursing officer for the public. I don't think there is any solution in that direction.

The Church Should Both Preach and Practice Christ's Own Teachings, Writes Director H. H. Hart

THE church should preach and practice literally the principles and teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles as to the relation of church and labor. It should begin by a generous and Christian treatment of its own employees. It should pay a living wage with strict promptness to pastors, assistant pastors, sextons, secretaries, etc. The phrase, "You're fired!" is not applicable to the relation between the church and its employees.

The churches, collectively, should practice the principles of righteousness in dealing with their employees secretaries, district superintendents, foreign missionaries, home missionaries and lay workers. The church is in no position to deal with the relations between secular employers and employees until it has met its own obligations faithfully.

Individual members of the Christian Church are under obligation to deal righteously with their employees, and the church is bound to take notice of any flagrant disregard of this obligation on the part of its own members.

When the church has faithfully met its organization obligations and the obligations of its individual members it is in a position to deal intelligently and helpfully with the general question of labor. That can best be done by preaching to employer and employee alike the law of Christian love. There are no labor troubles in those manufactories where the employer is seeking earnestly the welfare and prosperity of his people and where the employees are seeking to render a conscientious and faithful equivalent for their wages. The head of a great corporation in Minneapolis said once: "I have never had a difficulty with my employees which I could not settle in fifteen minutes when I had met their chosen representatives face to face."

The Church Must "Open Up the World of Opportunity" to the Workers, Writes Professor Hall

THE foundation of life is the production and distribution of food and shelter. But man does not live by bread alone, and life consists in lower and higher values. The higher and lower values can never be wholly separated. There is a spiritual quality about all work. Nevertheless the burden of food production can fall too heavily upon one class, and the enjoyment or access to the higher values become too much the portion of another.

This has happened in modern civilization, and although probably the lot of the food and shelter producer is better absolutely than in the past, yet the vista of higher values open to his eyes but beyond his reach has produced a discontent more radical and intelligent than ever before. With this discontent the organized religious community must reckon. The church, as representing organized religion, has not taken sufficient account of the economic and ethical causes that underlie this separation between classes, so that some may eat without working and others work without eating. The gospel of work for all means that all should work, and that access to the values, higher and lower, of life should be in accordance with capacity and not accidents of birth or bad economic adjustment.

The church should not emphasize less but more the spiritual values, and for these no social betterment is any substitute; but she should realize that access to the spiritual values can only come with a finer social adjustment. The institutional church is only a makeshift. The things she undertakes the community organized politically could, generally, do much better. But while they remain undone the church is right in trying to show the way.

And one last word. The main service we can render to workingmen is not to "assist them," but to open up the world of opportunity now monopolized by the few to all. How this shall be brought about is a political program, but it is a Christian duty for every one to form a political program to bring it about.

GOOD-BY, OLD YEAR!

GOOD-BY, old year, you're going out,
Your reign is ended, close the book
With all its fear, its joy, its doubt.
No more within its pages look;
We'll meet its record by and by,
You're going out, old year—good-by.

Good-by, old year, you have been true,
You kept the promises you made
Of spring and harvest time; we view
The heaps in barn and storehouse laid,
With thankful hearts; but you must die,
Your time has come, old year—good-by.

Good-by, old year, the new year comes,
Her hands are filled with hope and cheer,
We greet her gladly; yet we turn
To drop for you a farewell tear,
To dimly hear your parting sigh,
You're going out, old year—good-by.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

[SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS TAKEN PLACE: Mrs. Carew, a rich Boston woman, lives almost as a recluse in sorrow over the disappearance, years ago, of a little nephew Jamie. Her sister, Miss Wetherby, was Pollyanna's nurse during her stay at the Sanatorium where she was so wonderfully brought back to health and strength by Dr. Ames after her accident. Miss Wetherby persuades Mrs. Carew to invite Pollyanna to spend the winter with her, feeling sure that the result will be her restoration to happiness. Letters from Miss Wetherby and Dr. Ames persuade Dr. and Mrs. Chilton to let Pollyanna go, they themselves planning to spend the winter in Europe. Pollyanna is greatly delighted with Mrs. Carew's magnificent home on Commonwealth Avenue and with all that she sees of Boston. At the end of her first week she strays into the Public Garden, where by her conversation and her description of "the glad game" she starts an ex-convict toward a useful life and saves a young woman from temptation. Leaving the park, Pollyanna wanders in the wrong direction, loses her way, is rescued and brought home by a little newsboy.]

CHAPTER VIII

A NEW ACQUAINTANCE

GREATLY as Pollyanna enjoyed the automobile, she enjoyed the trolley cars more, as Mrs. Carew, much to her surprise, found out one day.

"Do we go in the trolley car?" Pollyanna asked eagerly.

"No. Perkins will take us," answered Mrs. Carew. Then, at the unmistakable disappointment in Pollyanna's face, she added in surprise: "Why, I thought you liked the auto, child!"

"Oh, I do," acceded Pollyanna, hurriedly; "and I wouldn't say anything, anyway, because of course I know it's cheaper than the trolley car, and—"

"'Cheaper than the trolley car!'" exclaimed Mrs. Carew, amazed into an interruption.

"Why, yes," explained Pollyanna, with widening eyes; "the trolley car costs five cents a person, you know, and the auto doesn't cost anything, 'cause it's yours. And of course I love the auto, anyway," she hurried on before Mrs. Carew could speak. "It's only that there are so many more people in the trolley car, and it's such fun to watch them! Don't you think so?"

"Well, no, Pollyanna, I can't say that I do," responded Mrs. Carew dryly, as she turned away.

As it chanced, not two days later, Mrs. Carew heard something more of Pollyanna and trolley cars—this time from Mary.

"I mean it's queer, ma'am," explained Mary earnestly, in answer to a question her mistress had asked; "it's queer how Miss Pollyanna gets round everybody—and without half trying. It isn't that she does anything. She doesn't. She just—just looks glad, I guess, that's all. But I've seen her get into a trolley car that was full of cross-looking men and women and whimpering children, and in five minutes you wouldn't know the place. The men and women have stopped scowling, and the children have forgot what they're crying for.

"Sometimes it's just somethin' that Miss Pollyanna has said to me, and they've heard it. Sometimes it's just the 'thank you' she gives when somebody insists on givin' us their seat—and they're always doin' that—givin' us seats, I mean. And sometimes it's the way she smiles at a baby or a dog. All dogs everywhere wag their tails at her, anyway, and all babies, big and little, smile and reach out to her. If we get held up it's a joke and if we take the wrong car it's the funniest thing that ever happened. And that's the way 'tis about everythin'. One just can't stay grumpy with Miss Pollyanna, even if you're only one of a trolley car full of folks that don't know her."

"Hm-m; very likely," murmured Mrs Carew, turning away.

Before long Pollyanna found herself once more in the "lovely big yard"—the Boston Public Garden—and she must go home when the clock in the church tower said it was half-past four.

Pollyanna went often to the Garden after this. She often looked for her old friends of the first day—the man who was so glad he had his eyes and legs and arms, and the pretty young lady who would not go with the handsome man; but she never saw them. She did frequently see the boy in the wheel chair, and she wished she could talk to him. The boy fed the birds and squirrels, too, and they were so tame that the doves would perch on his head and shoulders and the squirrels would burrow in his pockets for nuts. But Pollyanna, watching from a distance, always noticed one strange circumstance: in spite of the boy's very evident delight in serving his banquet his supply of food always ran short almost at once, and although he invariably looked fully as disappointed as did the squirrel after a nutless burrowing, yet he never remedied the matter by bringing more food the next day—which seemed most short-sighted to Pollyanna.

When the boy was not playing with the birds and squirrels he was reading—always reading. In his chair were usually two or three worn books and sometimes a magazine or two. He was nearly always to be found in one especial place, and Pollyanna used to wonder how he got there. Then, one unforgetable day, she found out. It was a school holiday, and she had come to the Garden in the forenoon, and it was soon after she reached the place that she saw him being wheeled along one of the paths by a snub-nosed, sandy-haired boy. She gave a keen glance into the sandy-haired boy's face, then ran toward him with a glad little cry.

"Oh, you—you! I know you—even if I don't know your name. You found me! Don't you remember? Oh, I'm so glad to see you! I've so wanted to say thank you!"

"Say, if it ain't the swell little lost kid of the Ave*noo!*" grinned the boy. "Well, what do you know about that! Lost again?"

"Oh, no!" exclaimed Pollyanna, dancing up and down on her toes in irrepressible joy. "I can't get lost any more—I have to stay right here. And I mustn't talk, you know. But I can to you, for I know you; and I can to him—after you introduce me," she finished, with a beaming glance at the lame boy and a hopeful pause.

The sandy-haired youth chuckled softly and tapped the shoulder of the boy in the chair.

"Listen ter that, will ye?" Ain't that the real thing, now?" Just you wait while I intro*dooce* you!" And he struck a pompous attitude. "Madam, this is me friend, Sir James, Lord of Murphy's Alley, and—" But the boy in the chair interrupted him.

"Jerry, quit your nonsense!" he cried vexedly. Then to Pollyanna he turned a glowing face. "I've seen you lots of times before. I've watched you feed the birds and squirrels—you always have such a lot for them! And I think you like Sir Lancelot the best, too. Of course there's the Lady Rowena—but wasn't she rude to Guinivere yesterday—snatching her dinner right away from her like that?"

Pollyanna blinked and frowned, looking from one to the other of the boys in plain doubt. Jerry chuckled again. Then with a final push he wheeled the chair into its usual position and turned to go. Over his shoulder he called to Pollyanna:

"Say, kid, jest let me put ye wise ter somethin'. This chap ain't crazy. See? Them's jest names he's given his young friends here"—with a flourish of his arms toward the furred and feathered creatures that were gathering from all directions. "An' they ain't even names of folks. They're just guys out of books. Are ye on? Yet he'd ruther feed them than feed hisself. Ain't he the limit? Ta-ta, Sir James," he added, with a grimace to the boy in the chair. "Buck up, now—nix on the no grub racket for you! See you later." And he was gone.

Pollyanna was still blinking and frowning when the lame boy turned with a smile.

"You mustn't mind Jerry. That's just his way. He'd cut off his right hand for me—Jerry would; but he loves to tease. Where'd you see him? Does he know you? He didn't tell me your name."

"I'm Pollyanna Whittier. I was lost and he found me and took me home," answered Pollyanna, still a little dazedly.

"I see. Just like him," nodded the boy. "Don't he tote me up here every day?"

A quick sympathy came to Pollyanna's eyes.

"Can't you walk—at all—er—Sir J-James?"

The boy laughed gleefully.

"'Sir James,' indeed! That's only more of Jerry's nonsense. I ain't a 'Sir.'"

Pollyanna looked clearly disappointed.

'You aren't? Nor a—a lord, like he said?"

"I sure ain't.

"Oh, I hoped you were—like Little Lord Fauntleroy, you know," rejoined Pollyanna. "And—"

But the boy interrupted her with an eager:

"Do you know Little Lord Fauntleroy? And do you know about Sir Lancelot, and the Holy Grail, and King Arthur and his Round Table, and the Lady Rowena, and Ivanhoe, and all those? Do you?"

Pollyanna gave her head a dubious shake.

"Well, I'm afraid I don't know all of 'em," she admitted. "Are they all—in books?"

The boy nodded.

"I've got 'em here—some of 'em," he said. "I like to read 'em over and over. There's always something new in 'em. Besides, I hain't got no others, anyway. These were father's. Here,

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

The Federation of the World—NOW

By Dr. Frank Crane

HAS YOUR PETITION GONE?

If you are a pastor, get your congregation to agree to vote to petition President Wilson to propose the Federation of the World. If you are a layman, urge your pastor to take this action.

This is the most practical thing in the world that you can do to bring "peace on earth and good will toward men."

There is a vast deal of kindly sentiment running loose. We would all like to do something to help somebody. Under this impulse we feed the poor, contribute to hospitals and other charitable institutions and strive in various ways to relieve the sufferings of mankind. And in so doing we do well.

But there is a curse above all curses, a plague above all plagues, a horror of horrors, vast, indescribable, appalling. It is war.

War, the sum of all villainies, the combination of all crimes. It is outrage, loot, cruelty, mutilation and murder, multiplied, organized, legalized, glorified.

Every war is caused, not by the will of the people, but by the stupidity of rulers.

The reason why the nations of Europe are now at one another's throats is because each has been prepared to settle its own disputes with others by its own force. There is no international court with authority.

That means anarchy, when every State is its own arbiter. To stop war it is absolutely necessary to stop anarchy.

To do this there must be a World Federation which shall adjudicate all international disputes.

Each nation must disarm and the one army and navy of earth be placed under the direction of the International Court. Except this be done the Federation will be a rope of sand.

THERE IS NO OTHER WAY POSSIBLE by which the fearful folly of war can be avoided.

YOU can help bring this to pass.

YOU, in your small corner, can have a hand in redeeming the race from its most terrific plague.

YOU can do this right now, by inducing your church to petition the President, your congressman and senator, to commit this government to the plan of World Federation.

The power of public sentiment is enormous. Before it all officials must bow. Only public sentiment can secure the end at which we aim.

Rifle and gunpowder factories, armament makers, ring politicians and narrow militarists are constantly exerting pressure upon Congress to spend millions upon millions for a huge navy and army. And this, notwithstanding the fact that military preparedness as a national policy has been tried for 6,000 years, and has invariably led to nothing but ruin.

To arm ourselves is to excite the fears and invite the enmity of other nations.

It also means that they will be compelled to increase their armaments to keep ahead of us: then we must increase again; and so on goes the senseless zealry which exasperates to bankruptcy or blazes up in war.

Why not get together?

You will be told that a World Federation is not practical. But it is the only step that is practical. Military preparedness is certainly not practical. Look at Europe!

You will be told that we must wait until all the nations, the great Powers of Europe especially, shall agree on this. But some nation must begin. Why not we?

If we can get only half a dozen small nations to unite with us, let us commence with them. The others one by one will be anxious to join.

For they will see that it means national defense by the World Police Fleet, instead of being compelled, each nation, to maintain a fleet competent to whip all others.

It will mean an end to the insufferable burdens of war-taxation. It will mean no more awful sacrifice of thousands of lives on battlefields. It will mean there never again shall be any more battlefields, but LAW shall settle the quarrels of the nations.

It will mean that commerce shall never again be interrupted, but go on improving conditions for human life.

It will mean the triumph of wisdom, justice and intelligent statesmanship over rule of brute force and medievalism.

To fulfil the will of Christ we must use our common sense. We know that a World Federation would stop war. Nobody denies it. All say it will come—some time.

Why not now?

All it needs is a POPULAR DEMAND. Public Opinion is omnipotent. Let the people of the United States of America demand it. Let the cry spread throughout all the American republics. Let our emissaries arouse Holland, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden; even England, France, Germany and Russia.

You will find that THE PEOPLE everywhere are for it. The rulers may hem and haw and talk of expediency, but the common people, who do the paying and the dying, will be for it unanimously.

Do it now! Prepare your petition!

It is time for the Church of Christ to act, to do something positive, constructive.

We are sending missionaries to foreign lands; why do so if we continue to threaten them with arms? Is it not time to end the old policy of fear and hatred between nations?

We do not want Japan to fear us, but to love us, to work with us, policing the world. We do not want to arm ourselves against England or Germany, but to agree on a policy of mutual help.

Let us begin!

Now!

Let the United States of America sound the trumpet call that shall usher in the United States of the World.

From every city, town and hamlet of this country let petitions rain down upon our President and congressmen. Let us have such a popular uprising as was never known before! Let the Conscience and Common Sense of Uncle Sam speak out!

European nations wait for us. Everywhere in Europe it is said that somehow the solution of this dark problem must come from America.

Let us utter our word clearly. Let us say:

"There is but one way out; it is to get together. We invite all nations to join us in a World Federation, which shall deal out justice to the least as well as to the greatest. We will begin. We present our navy to the International Court. We dare. We have faith. We believe the common sense of the nations will respond. The year of jubilee has come. The clock of destiny has struck. Let the New Year's chimes of 1915 ring out the 6,000 years of war, ring in the era of co-operation!

Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky
Ring out the old, ring in the new Ring, happy bells, across the snow
Ring out the thousand wars of old
Ring in the thousand years of peace

Winter and Our Own Poor

WITH the first cold wave of winter, the condition of the homeless and unemployed becomes a serious problem. Owing to the dulness in many industries the ranks of the unfortunate are this year swelled beyond all precedent. Night after night the long line of destitute men and lads crowds the sidewalks north and south of the Bowery Mission, waiting eagerly for the midnight meal of bread and hot coffee. There they stand, huddled together, from twelve to fifteen hundred strong, and presenting a picture of misery that must be seen to be realized. Many of them have come from other States, drawn by the hope of finding work in the city, but only to meet with disappointment. There are graybeards among them, and men in the full vigor of manhood. And there are young faces in the line—the faces of "mothers' boys," who have strayed far from home and friends and become stranded in the great city. Penniless, friendless, they turn to the Bowery Mission knowing that within its hospitable doors they will find at least a temporary shelter from the piercing cold and will receive warm, refreshing food. Among them are many who have seen better days, when they would have scorned the suggestion of charity.

These unfortunates are not criminals. They are honest workers, who have been sorely buffeted by adversity and have almost lost their grip on life. They need from us a helping hand and a word of cheer. Many of them are but half clad. All need a warm meal and a bed and these the Mission gives them. But it gives more than that. It stirs up the manhood in them and gives them courage to try again. Through its Free Labor Bureau it provides work for a large number. They are all honest and willing. The pity of it is that they come perilously near starvation, while even convicts are supplied with wholesome food and shelter. There could be no greater reflection upon our Christian civilization than that which lies in the fact that while the criminal is fed and housed, a great army of the honest unemployed is both foodless and homeless in the middle of winter.

We are sending relief cargoes to the war sufferers abroad. This is well; but we should not forget the sufferers here at home. These unfortunates are our brothers and deserve our help. With $1 you can feed thirty men and boys in the Bread Line; $10 will make 300 of them your guests. With $40 you can give a satisfying and strengthening meal to the entire Bread Line for a single night. Five dollars will provide a bed (such as you might scorn, but to them it is a real luxury) to fifty poor homeless men, whom fortune has passed by. Think of it, when you are surrounded by your dear ones in your comfortable home, these cold winter nights. And when you have given a momentary thought to the Bowery Mission and its Bread Line, before the idea passes, sit down and write out a check for whatever your heart prompts you to give.

"Watch-Night"

THE old-fashioned "watch-night" service is not so popular as it used to be. Some churches still hold the service and find it a real blessing. It is certainly difficult to think of a more perfect way to spend the last moments of the old year and the first of the new than upon one's knees, dedicating one's self afresh to the cause and to the love of Christ.

There is danger that in all the activities of modern church life and welfare work the needs and hungers of the individual soul be overlooked. One of the favorite hymns of a generation just passed was: "It Is Well With My Soul." It is a beautiful and wholesome hymn, and if one cannot sing it gladly and confidently there is need to stop a while to take account of spiritual stock.

We must not forget, in our zeal for work, that we can work better, can help others more, if our own experience of divine things is bright and strong. We are the conveyors of a gift to the world—a gift of light, a gift of gladness, a gift of confidence in God. We must actually possess these things before we can expect to carry them to others.

Find a watch-night service this year, and welcome the New Year upon your knees. It will be a gravely important year in the world's history. If the church is to meet it adequately, if we are to be individually equal to our part in it, we must, at the year's beginning, make sure that our hearts are wholly Christ's, that our confidence is in God, and that nothing in our lives is obstructing the stream of divine blessing which should flow through us to a needy world.

Your Representative in Europe

THE thoughts and prayers of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have accompanied Mr. Waters on his journey through war-swept Europe. He has visited London, Rotterdam, The Hague, Antwerp, Brussels, Malines, Rheims, Louvain, Berlin, Vienna and other cities. Through the perils of war-times and the gales of a December sea he has come back in health and safety to the homeland. The Transylvania, on which Mr. Waters sailed, was but a few hours out from Liverpool when a terrific explosion shook her violently, terrifying her passengers. It is believed that this explosion was caused either by two mines colliding or by a mine striking some wreckage floating near the ship. The ship itself suffered no serious damage and none of her passengers was injured.

Mr. Waters has represented you in Europe. You will want to know the details of his journey, his experiences and work in connection with the distribution of your War Relief Fund. His series of articles, telling the thrilling story of these weeks on the Continent, begins in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. You will not want to miss a line of these reports of your representative among the needy widows and orphans of suffering Europe. They will continue for four or five numbers, and in reading them you will feel that you yourself have been seeing these stirring sights and having a part in this the greatest war drama of the centuries.

Subsequent articles in this series will be illustrated by remarkable photographs, taken by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S special photographer, Mr. Earl Harrison.

College Life and Culture

DR. ARTHUR T. HADLEY, president of Yale, the other day made his report on the work of the university during the last year. The report has this to say of tuition fees in unprofessional departments: "The attempt to save the salaries of the professors paid from the fees of the students, the traditional American method, does not, as a rule, work out satisfactorily. There is a tendency to get students by lowering standards and also to economize on salaries by employing men whose practical work in law and medicine is the primary object of their life and whose teaching is incidental. In view of these dangers the best institutions of the United States are abandoning the practice of having professional schools supported by tuition fees alone. May the university proper make good this deficiency? To a certain extent it may and must. If it is to choose between having a poor school which is self-supporting and a good school which is a drain on the university treasury, it must accept the latter alternative as long as it maintains the school at all." Another reason for lifting the burden of tuition from the students is the university not mentioned in President Hadley's report is that there are so many poor young men of ability and genius who would gladly avail themselves of the special professional schools if the expense connected with them was not so great. Dr. Hadley closes his report with a wise reference to the broad culture which it is the prime duty of the university to secure. This broad culture includes, of course, the development of the religious life and service, which is minified and almost neglected in some universities and colleges, but which fortunately is embraced in the life and teaching of many of the great educational institutions of America today. The broadest culture is in the school of Christ and in obedience to his teachings. This is the description of the culture which real wisdom produces: "She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace; a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee." (Prov. 4: 9.)

Describes "Cannibal Fish"

COL. THEODORE ROOSEVELT gave a private talk on his travels in South America to a party of friends at Sagamore Hill recently. He described the "cannibal fish," which, he said, is eighteen inches long and almost as wide and of indescribable fierceness. On one occasion, he said, a native carrier was in the river, when others heard an outcry. The man had been attacked by "cannibal fish." When a boat of rescuers got to him they found nothing but the skeleton of the man left. In all times and seas there have been man-eating fishes. The shark, with his sharp teeth and voracious appetite, has been a cannibal from the earliest times till now. It was a man-eating fish that swallowed the prophet. "Now the Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah." (Jonah 1: 17.)

Two Sons of Minister Honored

ON DECEMBER 14 Dr. John Henry McCracken, professor of political philosophy at New York University, was elected president of Lafayette College, succeeding Dr. E. D. Warfield, who resigned. The next day Henry Nolle McCracken, professor of English at Smith College, was elected president of Vassar College, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Dr. James Monroe Taylor. The two men honored with this responsibility are the sons of Dr. Henry Mitchell McCracken, chancellor emeritus of New York University, who is one of the oldest and most successful educators in this country. It used to be thought that preachers' sons did not turn out well. This is a mistake. Statistics show that there is a larger proportion of preachers' children in the useful and honorable callings than among any other class. Some of the sons of the priests turned out badly in the Mosaic system, but God selected the sons of ministers to be ministers. "At the appointment of Aaron and his sons shall be all the service of the sons of the Gershonites, in all their burdens, and in all their service." (Num. 4: 27.)

Causeless Worry Was Fatal

THERE was a man in Kansas who worried himself to death the other day over a debt which he did not owe. He was the postmaster of the town, honorable and as highly respected as any one in the place. In figuring up his accounts he discovered that he was $1,000 behind with the government. He could not understand it. He knew he had not taken a cent wrongfully, and yet there were the figures, and though conscious of his innocence he felt that disgrace was upon him and his. He set himself to work steadily to repay the amount and had almost squared the account when his health broke under the fearful strain to which his mind and heart had been subjected and he died. After his death a careful examination of his accounts revealed the fact that he had never been a penny behind with the government and that it was his bad figuring that led him to think so. The Department at Washington sent his widow $920.81, the amount he had overpaid the government, and in doing which he sacrificed his life. There are many men and women who fret and worry themselves to death over imagined ills. The postmaster was not good in arithmetic and worried himself to death over the mistake he had made, but his death was a sacrifice to the keenness of a good conscience and the instinct of a rugged honesty. His whole life was wrapped up in obedience to this commandment: "Provide things honest in the sight of all men." (Rom. 12: 17.)

BOY SCOUTS SEARCH FOR MISSING WOMAN

EARLY in December the wife of one of the prominent residents of Orange, N. J., during an attack of nervous depression, suddenly left her home and disappeared, her friends being unable to get any trace of her. Interest in the search became widespread, and among the means employed a thousand Boy Scouts who volunteered their services were organized to search every foot of ground near the former home town of the lost woman and of Orange Mountain. The boys acted under direction of their Scout Masters, and encircled and passed over a large section of country. In spite of this excellent service by the boys of this organization and all other means, the heartbroken family has not yet found its missing member. The deep interest in the search for this woman suggests the great anxiety God has in searching for the souls that have wandered away from his heart, their home, and in bringing them back to him, as thus expressed in the parable: "Doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountains, and seeketh that which is gone astray?" (Matt. 18: 12)

State's Attorney for Defense

IN THE various counties and districts of the State and Federal Governments, lawyers, usually of ability and generous salaries, have been selected to prosecute criminals and punish crime. Custom has taken it for granted that the accused man is guilty, and the whole arm of authority was summoned to establish that guilt. This has especially been the case with those accused who have no money with which to defend themselves. It is true judges have from time to time appointed some attorney to defend the pauper charged with crime, but usually some inexperienced young lawyer has been selected for the purpose. Strange the idea of a lawyer of ability and integrity, selected to defend those prosecuted who are unable to pay for such service, should have been so slow to dawn upon the public mind, but it has dawned. The first place to try out the experiment successfully is the city of Los Angeles, Cal., where Mr. Walter J. Wood was appointed public defender of the county. His business has so increased in the year he has held office that four attorneys and two assistants have had to be added to his staff. The meaning of this new office in America is thus described in a section of the city charter of Los Angeles: "Upon request by the defendant or upon order of the court the public defender shall defend, without expense to them, all persons who are not financially able to employ counsel and who are charged in the Superior Court with the commission of any contempt, misdemeanor, felony or other offense. He shall also, upon request, give counsel and advice to such persons in any charge against them upon which he is conducting the defense, and he shall prosecute all appeals to a higher court of any person who has been convicted where, in his opinion, such appeal might reasonably be expected to result in the reversal or modification of conviction." Let all the facts from all sides be found for poor as well as rich, that the truth may be found and justice done. Heaven has provided a public Defender for the poor sinner, charged with sin and guilt and unable to protect himself. "If any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." (I John 2: 1.)

Bronx Greatly Improved

MR. ROBERT J. MOOREHEAD, building superintendent of the Borough of the Bronx, New York City, has presented some comparative statistics with reference to building operations in nine of the great cities of the country. Mr. Moorehead shows that in the Borough of the Bronx, with its population of 641,980, the building operations amounted to $305,257.17 in nine years, $476 per capita larger than any city in America except San Francisco, which he claims has been practically rebuilt in that time since the fire. Boston was the only great city omitted from the comparison, but figures could not be obtained at the time the inquiry was made. The path of civilization can be marked from the cave and tent to the buildings of elegant architecture and magnificent structures of wood, brick, stone or steel. The great cities of today, with their gigantic structures and busy millions, are but thoroughfares through which the generations are marching to the cities of the dead, so much more populous than those of the living. There is a beautiful city on the other side of the river which came within range of the patriarch's vision, of whom it was said: "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." (Heb. 11: 10.)

Three Kings Have Meeting

THE kings of Denmark, Sweden and Norway held a conference in Malmö, Sweden, December 18, not for the declaration of war, but for the maintenance of neutrality, the protection of their subjects and the promotion of the arts of peace. These men are devoted Christian men, good examples to their people and an honor to the world. This council of kings was in the interest of righteousness, unlike this one mentioned by the psalmist: "The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord, and against his anointed." (Ps. 2: 2.)

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European correspondent of many great American and foreign publications; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Independance Belge

IT MAY now be profitable toward the beginning of the year to review the course of events in the several fields of campaign from the beginning of the war, a sufficient period of time having elapsed to enable us to see the various events in their sequential relationship to each other and not as isolated happenings.

On July 23 Austria presented her historic ultimatum to Servia, and in the next two or three days Russia began to mobilize her army. On the 28th of July Austria declared war on Servia and the next day Germany demanded from Russia an explanation of her action in mobilizing. Russia replied to this on July 31 by ordering a mobilization of her entire army and navy. Germany then declared a state of siege and asked France what her course of action would be in the event of a war between Germany and Russia, to which France replied that she would act as her interests required. On August 1 Germany declared war on Russia, and on August 2 the German troops entered the territory of the grand duchy of Luxemburg, and France ordered a general mobilization.

The next day, August 2, Russian troops crossed the East Prussian border, German troops entered France, and Germany presented an ultimatum to Belgium, demanding free passage for German troops through Belgium, which was refused. Germany, on August 4, declared war on Belgium and France, and the same day England declared war on Germany and mobilized her army. Subsequent declarations of war were as follows: By Austria on Russia on August 6, by France on Austria on August 10 and by England on the same power on August 12.

Having given this chronology of the declarations of war we can now consider the war itself. The campaign first divides itself into naval and military, and the military again divides itself into the campaigns of the West and the East. Before, however, we begin with the actual history of these campaigns it might be instructive to most of my readers to describe briefly the organization of a modern army and its equipment.

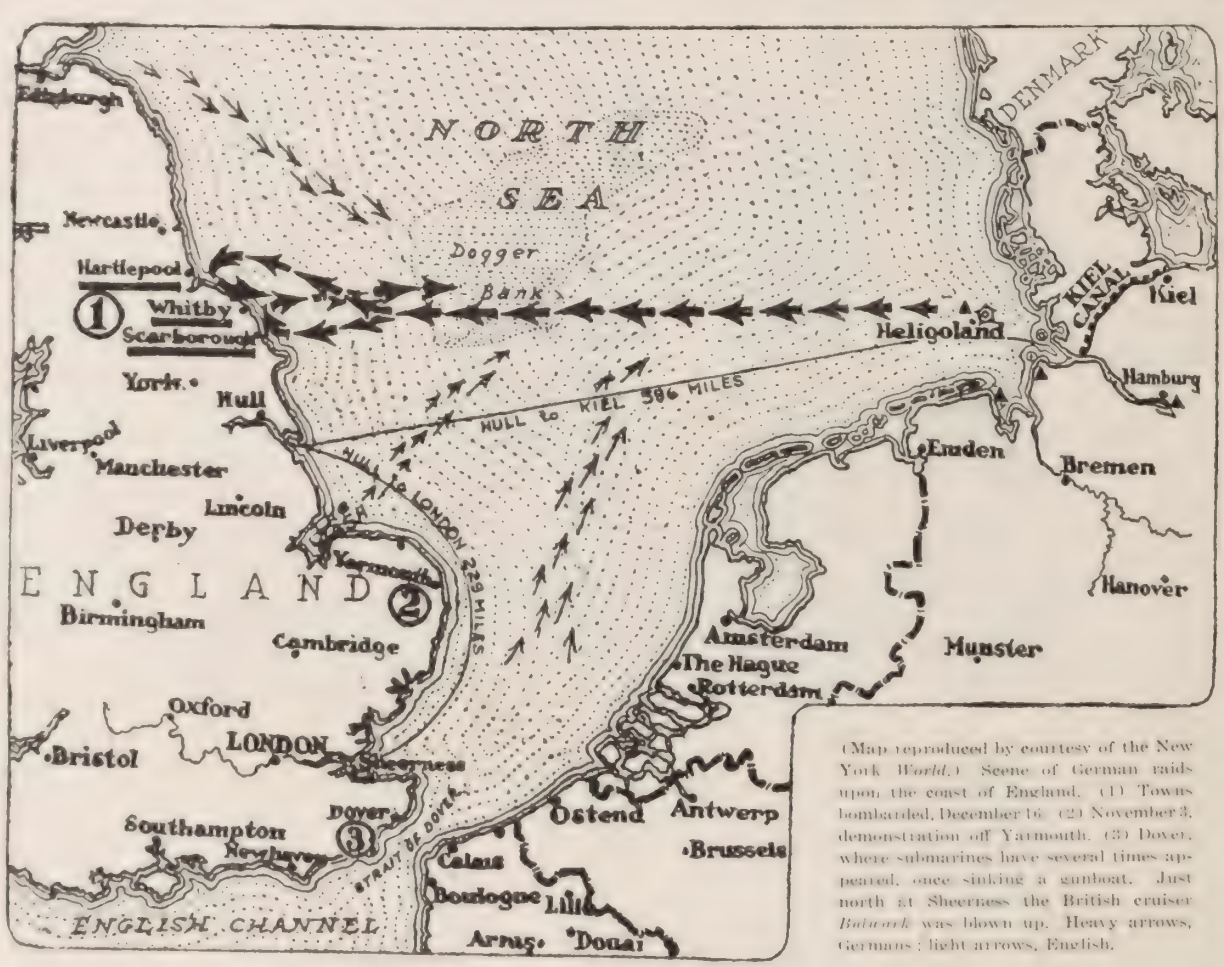
In all the nations at war, except England, military service is universal and compulsory. Every young man in these countries must serve from one to four years with the colors, and the army thus created is called the active or field army. When service with the colors in the active army is finished the soldier passes into the reserve, in one of whose classes he remains until he is no longer fit for service of any kind by reason of age. This age varies from 45 to 52. The Germans have a concise expression for the modern European army, which they call "the nation in arms."

All of these armies are divided into three principal parts: the infantry, the artillery and the cavalry. The backbone of every army is the infantry. This arm fights on foot and is armed with the magazine rifle and the bayonet. The infantry is called the "queen arm" because it ultimately decides the issue of every battle. The artillery and the cavalry are used subordinately to the infantry to prepare the way for its advance, or to screen such advance from the enemy. The cavalry has its principal use in serving as a screen for the infantry and in procuring intelligence of the movements of the enemy. Cavalry is armed always with the saber, and in some armies with the lance, and in many with the carbine in addition.

Artillery is of three kinds: light, including machine guns and mountain batteries; field, which employs larger and heavier guns and is used to shell temporary defenses of the enemy and the trenches on the battlefield; siege, which uses heavy guns and is employed in attacks on fortresses, sieges of towns, etc.

Two other very important departments of any army are the transport and the commissary. The transport is charged with carrying from place to place the supplies of the army, the troops themselves, etc., and today uses motors very largely for these purposes, in addition to trains and horse-drawn vehicles. The commissary is charged with supplying food to the troops, one of the most important of tasks.

The intelligence department of any army is also very important. This is charged with finding out the news of the enemy's movements, his forces at a given point or generally along the line of battle, the positions of his artillery, etc. Cavalry, spies, airships, etc., are all used for this purpose. Now we are ready to begin the history of the western campaign.



(Map reproduced by courtesy of the New York World.) Scene of German raids upon the coast of England. (1) Towns bombarded, December 16. (2) November 3, demonstration off Yarmouth. (3) Dover, where submarines have several times appeared, once sinking a gunboat. Just north at Sheerness the British cruiser Bulwark was blown up. Heavy arrows, Germans; light arrows, English.

At the beginning and for the first three weeks the Germans concentrated their first-line troops and their fiercest energies on the attack on France, only sending enough troops to their eastern borders to hold the Russian troops there in check. The reason for this was that Germany lies between France and Russia, and Russia was then expected to mobilize her army more slowly than France would be apt to do, and therefore it was important, if possible, to crush France speedily, and thus dispose of her. Then attention could be given to the foe on the other border.

It was this extreme need of speed which caused Germany to strike at France through Belgium. The short frontier between France and Germany is not only a very rough and hilly country, but is also on the French side protected by a double row of very strong forts, and to have attempted to advance by this road would have required long and tedious siege operations, if indeed it were feasible at all. Belgium, on the contrary, is a comparatively level country, well supplied with railroads running toward the south and, except in the eastern part, has no important strong places in the line of march; further, only a few fortresses face it in French territory.

Another advantage to the Germans in choosing this route consisted in the fact that the northern departments of France abutting on the Belgian frontier are the sites of the most important sources of the coal, iron and sugar supply of that country, and if in the possession of an enemy would seriously cripple French industrial activities, both there and in other parts of the country.

So then the Germans, operating from the line of the Rhine as a base, firstly threw from Aix-la-Chapelle one army into Belgium, which turned southdown the valley of the Meuse, and attacked the fortress of Liège, while another starting from the same point advanced almost due west towards Brussels. A third army was thrown into Luxemburg and turned to the south and held there until the first two armies got into position on the French border, and a fourth army, starting from Metz, advanced to the French border and there also waited.

The first army took Liège in a few days and then threw itself on Namur further south, which it took and then advanced to and took Givet, and thus reached its position on the French border in line with the armies coming from Luxemburg and Metz. The army moving towards Brussels advanced to and occupied that city and then turning south advanced, after severe fighting, to Mons in the extreme south of Belgium, only a few miles from the French border. Still another German army, the fifth, started from Strassburg and advancing almost directly west, crossing the Vosges Mountains between Alsace and France, got in contact with the army which had started from Metz. All five German armies were, therefore, now in position following as a general line the French frontier, and were ready to move forward to attempt to achieve the strategic objects of the campaign.

These objects were, first, to envelope and crush the left wing of the Allied army opposed to them, driving this left wing to the west of Paris, thus interposing a strong force between the main French army to the eastward and Paris. These objects once achieved, the destruction of the French field army would have followed almost as a matter of course.

Attacking simultaneously in irresistible force, the German armies struck the Allied armies at Mons in Belgium and on the Sambre. The Allies in the west were forced steadily backwards in spite of the splendid gallantry of the British troops, who had joined the line at Mons, and were hurled back unrelentingly, but with their line intact, until by September 1 this part of the allied line was at the outermost Paris forts.

In the east the attack progressed somewhat, but not with the same speed and success as characterized the German movement in the west, and the result was that the German right wing in the west outran the German center and left wing, so that the German line on September 1 was disconnected. To remedy this it was necessary for the German right wing to move to the eastward. This retreat took some two weeks and during that time the Allies had not been idle. A special army about 400,000 strong had been gotten together and hurriedly brought up from the south of France for the defense of Paris, and England had rushed forward every man she could possibly send. At this time the German line stretched from the forts of Paris in the west to Nancy in the east. The attempt to envelop the allied left had failed.

When the German right moved across the northern front of Paris and arrived a little to the east of Paris, it was suddenly attacked on the front and flank by the new French army gathered as above stated, and was compelled to beat a hasty retreat, dragging with it the entire German center and left. This retreat lasted until the line of the Marne was reached, where a long stand was made and sanguinary conflicts occurred.

This position along the line of the River Marne would probably have been held and fortified, as has been the position along the Ainse, had it not been for the fact that the large garrisons of the fortresses of Verdun and Toul, which had been left uncaptured on the extreme left of the army of Metz, began a series of attacks which made the whole position of the German army very difficult and precarious.

For a time the position was maintained and the engineer and pioneer corps sent to the line of the River Aisne, which was not exposed to danger from Verdun, to prepare field fortifications there, and to these, when completed, the German army retreated, which now is the present position of their center and left. From that day to this the operations along this front, from Noyon to the east, 150 miles, have consisted of a gigantic artillery duel, now and then varied by ferocious infantry night attacks.

Early in October the Allies, having been again heavily reinforced, began a movement to encircle the German right wing. Pushing northward through Amiens, they succeeded in bending back the German right wing until it formed a huge semi-circle, with its center near Arras and extreme right running as far as Mons, Belgium.

When the Belgians abandoned Brussels the Belgian army retreated northerly to Antwerp, and when the German right wing found itself in the exposed position set forth above this army began to operate against it. To meet this attack the Germans brought up from Germany a fresh army and attacked the Belgians and drove them back into Antwerp, and then besieged and took this city. A portion of the Belgian army was captured, another portion sought refuge in Holland and was interned, and a third, with the king, succeeded in escaping to the south and eventually in joining the Allies, where it now is.

This capture of Antwerp was at once followed by a German advance south along the coast, successively capturing Bruges, Ostend and the other coast towns as far as Nieuport. This move threatened the Allies' left and, therefore, relieved the pressure on the German right. Since that time both armies have extended their lines till they reach the sea, in which position they now rest.

During the last six weeks this part of the line of battle has been the scene of the most sanguinary fighting of the war, the Germans attempting to break through the Allies' line in an effort to reach the French ports of Dunkirk and Calais, and the Allies, up to the present time, resisting with success. This western line of battle is at present a deadlock; both sides stretch from the ocean to the frontier of Switzerland, with the result that flanking or enveloping movements are no longer possible, and both sides are also so thoroughly entrenched and fortified that a frontal attack seems to be equally out of consideration, as it would almost inevitably result in enormous loss of life without any benefit whatever. It may be very greatly doubted whether this situation can be materially changed, except by the slow and tedious results of trench mining.

Any estimate of the numbers of men engaged or the losses in the western battle are more or less in the nature of guesses, and therefore it will be as well to content ourselves with the vague knowledge that never before in the world's history have such enormous forces confronted each other on so long a line of battle, and never before have as many men been killed or wounded in so short a space of time as have fallen on this line between the ocean and the Alps.

TURNING now to the eastern campaign. From the beginning Russia had in this campaign two objects in view: First, to destroy the Austrian forces in Galicia, which is to say the Austrian field army; and second, to bring such pressure to bear on Germany as to force her to withdraw large forces from the western line of battle.

In neither of these objects can Russia have been said to have succeeded, though she has made enormous sacrifices of human life to attain them. In the early part of the war Russia began an invasion of East Prussia, which for some weeks made apparent progress, but which finally, in the last days of August, culminated in one of the greatest defeats any nation has ever suffered, in point of loss of life, casualties and prisoners. By this defeat Russia was hurled backwards into her own territory. There she succeeded, at Augustowo, in repulsing a German invasion, and thereafter took a more or less feeble offensive again, which has continued with some successes of no particular importance up to the present time. At the moment there are small bodies of Russian troops in East Prussia, which in some places have penetrated as much as twenty miles from the border.

In Central Poland, late in August, the Germans made an offensive movement in rather weak force towards Warsaw, and came near capturing that town late in September. The Russians however at the last moment managed to get large forces to that front and forced the Germans to retreat practically to the German border, to the River Warthe. Here their army was reformed and reinforced and another forward drive was begun. This time, however, the advance was of a far more serious character, taking place not in one column as before, but in three.

This advance, though from time to time checked, has made steady progress, and now, in spite of violent efforts on the part of the Russians to prevent, it has succeeded in uniting the three armies on one line of battle, a comparatively few miles from the objective, the Warsaw-Ivangorod line. The fighting during this second advance has been of the most desperate character, and the Russian losses are said to have been stupendous. About one-half of Poland is now in the hands of the Germans, and this includes the coal fields and the important industrial towns, Poland being the center of nearly all Russian manufacturing industry.

In the south, in Galicia, the Russians have had a greater measure of success. In the early days of the war the Austrians made an invasion of Poland and succeeded in penetrating quite a distance into that country, but were eventually thrown back and were followed into Galicia by their victorious enemies. A seven-day battle ensued in which the Austrians suffered defeat, with the result that the largest city in Galicia fell into Russian hands. The Russians followed up this advantage and succeeded in making themselves temporarily masters of practically all Galicia up to within a few miles of Cracow, driving the Austrians before them everywhere, and even sending troops through the passes of the Carpathians into Hungary.

This advantage, however, did not last very long, owing to the pressure which was put on them in central Poland, which resulted in their being obliged to retreat from western and central Galicia and from Hungary into the vicinity of Lemberg, closely followed by the Austrians, who had begun to fight much better. Both in the advance and in the retreat the Russian losses were heavy. It is a characteristic of their commanders to be very prodigal of the lives of their men.

Subsequently, a relaxation of the pressure in Poland enabled them to again advance and to recover most all of the ground previously lost, but this advance was not held, as the second offensive in Poland produced much the same effect as the first, and is bringing about another precipitate retreat. How far this retreat will go cannot, at the present time, be said, as that will depend on the success or non-success of the offensive in Poland.

Turkey entered the war on the side of Germany and Austria on the 29th of October and has since directed her efforts principally against Russia, and to the proclamation of a holy war. No definite results have as yet accrued from either of these actions.

Japan, early in August, under her treaty with England, took hostile action against Germany, which culminated in an attack on and the besiegement of the German colony of Kiauchau on the Chinese coast. After a rather long siege, and a gallant defense against overwhelming odds, the garrison surrendered and the colony passed into Japanese hands. Japan has also during the last four months seized various island colonies of Germany in the Pacific Ocean.

Great Britain had a minor annoyance on her hands for some time, a rebellion against her authority in the recently annexed colonies of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State having been begun by the former Boer generals De Wet and Beyers. This rebellion was, however, rather easily suppressed in a comparatively few weeks, General Beyers being killed and General De Wet captured.

The Austro-Servian campaign hardly merits extensive mention. Austria has had some victories and some defeats. Just now the Servian star seems to be in the ascendant. As the results here, whatever they may be, are certain to be largely subordinate in their ultimate form to the larger issues to be settled elsewhere, we need not dwell on them now at any length.

Owing to the exigencies of space I shall be obliged to postpone the review of the naval campaign.

SCARBOROUGH, THE BOMBARDED ENGLISH TOWN, IN SUMMERTIME

EVENTS of the week closing December 18 have not changed the general positions outlined by Mr. Arnoux, excepting in Servia, where the Austrians were obliged to withdraw the main portion of their forces for service in Galicia, what were left being subsequently driven out of Servia across the Danube, and Belgrade was reoccupied by the Servians; and in Galicia itself, where the Germans are reported to have won almost decisive victories, clearing Eastern Galicia of Russians and taking many prisoners. If the reports are substantiated later the victory must have important results.

The British are sending great reinforcements to France. Havre reports the arrival of an average of fifteen transports per day at that port for the last week, and as soon as these troops reach the firing line matters will probably be much brisker there.

A British submarine performed a brilliant and successful exploit in the Dardanelles during the week, entering the strait and diving under five rows of mines, reaching and torpedoing the Turkish battleship Messondiyeh, which was sunk. The submarine was successful in escaping, though the pursuit was very hot.

What in some aspects is the most startling event of the war occurred in the early hours of December 16. Creeping in through a heavy mist along the English coast, three swift German cruisers got near enough when the fog lifted to shell the partially fortified shipping town of Hartlepool, Scarborough, an unprotected summer resort, and Whitby, also unprotected. The news of this brief bombardment startled the world. The English public is reported as aroused to a frenzy. Berlin hailed the success of the maneuver with joy. The three cruisers, as soon as their presence was discovered by naval patrols, made their escape. The latest report is that three merchantmen were sunk in the wake of the battleships by contact with mines which the Germans left behind them.

In all, one hundred and eight persons were killed by the bombardment and upwards of three hundred wounded; the property damage was not as definitely known, though it is said to have been severe. The exact object of the raid is not known, some looking upon it as an attempt to strike terror to British hearts, others as designed to screen more important movements of the German fleet, or else to draw a response from the English that will uncover their naval plans.

The British Admiralty discounts the military advantage to be derived from such work. It is the first time that the British Isles have been attacked by a hostile nation in centuries. One result appears to have been a boom in the recruiting of English troops, another, increased activity on the part of the navy in preparation against further attacks of the kind.

As the year draws near its close there are no apparent reasons for expecting a Christmas truce or any important peace negotiations in connection with the season.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S PRAYER TO THE SUN-GOD

BY PROFESSOR EDGAR J. BANKS

ACCORDING to the Jewish writings, one of the most cruel of all the ancients was Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. It was he who caused the destruction of Jerusalem in the year 586 B.C., and who carried the Jews to Babylon as exiles.

The sufferings the captive Jews endured at his hands were told in stories which have survived in the Orient to this day. On the other hand, there was no ancient king who so prided himself on his piety, or who took greater delight in building new temples and restoring the old ones, or prayed more fervently to his gods, than did this same Nebuchadnezzar. Several of his prayers have been discovered by excavators in the ancient ruins, and perhaps the most beautiful of them all is that which has been found upon a small clay cylinder from the ruin of the Babylonian city of Sippar.

About sixteen miles to the southeast of Bagdad is the ruin of Sippar, a city called Sepharvaim in the Bible. (II Kings 17: 24.) The modern name by which it is known to the Arabs is Abu Habba. It lies so near to Bagdad, and yet so far from any town, that it has long been a favorite place for illicit excavations by the Arabs.

At Sippar stood the great temple Ebarra, dedicated to the sun-god Shamash, one of the most revered of Babylonian holy places. The temple was rich in votive objects, which the visiting pilgrims had brought, and not only have thousands of inscribed clay tablets been found among the ruins of the city, but many valuable inscriptions upon stone and clay have been discovered in the fallen temple.

The recently discovered cylinder with the prayer of Nebuchadnezzar to the sun-god is very small. It is but five inches in length and less than two inches in its greatest diameter; yet it contains thirty-six lines of beautiful writing in two columns. A large hole passes through it from end to end, perhaps to give it greater strength than if it were solid. The inscription begins in the usual manner. Nebuchadnezzar tells who he is, and then follows one of the most beautiful prayers which this most cruel and most pious king has left:

CLAY CYLINDER BEARING THE PRAYER TO THE SUN-GOD

"I am Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, the restorer of the temples Esagil and Ezida.

"Ebarra, the temple of Shamash, the Sun-god, in Sippar, I built anew to Shamash, the lord who has made my days long.

"O Shamash, great lord, look with kindly grace upon my deeds. Bestow upon me as a gift a life of many days, an abundance of offspring, security to the throne, and a long continuation of my family's reign. Receive in faith the raising up of my hand.

"In accordance with thy exalted command, which is unalterable, may my deed, the work of my hand, endure forever. May my successor be endowed with royal power; may he be firmly established in the land.

"While my hand is raised to thee, O sovereign Shamash, open the way to the destruction of my enemy, for thou art Shamash. May thy fearful weapon, which is invincible, be at my side for the overthrow of my enemy.

"As the foundation of thy temple Ebarra has been laid for all time, so may my years be prolonged through eternity."

A MODERN PATRIARCH

BECAUSE his "appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is so high that he is willing to do almost anything for it," the venerable Dr. Aaron E. Ballard, president of Ocean Grove Association and of Pitman Grove, about to enter upon his ninety-fifth year, consented to give an afternoon's interview to a representative in his home in Ocean Grove the other day.

Dr. Ballard rejoices in the fact that he is a "Christmas child," as he was born on December 25, 1820. He was the second of ten children, and his older sister had been born on Christmas Day of 1818. "Strange? yes," he said, "but that is not all of the strange story. A few steps down on our family ladder another sister arrived on a December 25, and about twenty-five years ago my own daughter came to us on Christmas Day." In spite of the approaching ninety-fifth year the speaker's voice is vibrant, his handclasp warm and firm, his eye clear and twinkling with fun, and his whole attitude one of strength and poise.

The Ballards, who came to this country early in the seventeenth century, are of Welsh descent; the mother's forebears were Holland Dutch and came over with the Huguenots. His grandfather was a captain in the Revolutionary War. His father, whose home was in Bloomfield, N. J., in 1796 married Hetty Brown, a lineal descendant of Anneke Jenks, the original owner of the property now held by Trinity Church in New York City.

When the father, who had been a well-to-do blacksmith, was overtaken by hard times, he removed to Newark. The family fortune was at so low an ebb as to make it necessary for every member to contribute toward the household purse. Young Aaron, then only seven or eight years old, began by selling radishes from the family garden. At the age of twelve years he became an apprentice in a tobacco factory, where after four years he became a journeyman, remaining in that business until he entered the ministry.

"Quite a step from a tobacco factory to the pulpit!" exclaimed the interviewer; "how did it happen?"

"It didn't happen. It came at the close of several years of life which I do not like to recall; the part of my biography I don't like to remember."

A shade of sadness creeps into the aged man's voice even yet, as he tells of his wild and wayward youth. In view of these experiences, it is interesting to note, by the way, that Dr. Ballard is the author of the much disputed "Paragraph 248" of the Methodist Discipline, relating to forbidden amusements for church members. Through all the distressing years, however, he clung to his mother's love, and the one bright thought of those dark days is the fact that he "cannot remember ever having given his mother a saucy word."

At last the crisis came when the Rev. David W. Bartine saved the situation. Converted and started on the right road, Aaron Ballard pushed straight ahead step by step. Naturally gifted with brains and eloquence, courage and persistence, he, in due time, procured a license for public speaking, and became a sort of junior preacher on a circuit of fifteen appointments—without pay. "No cars of any kind in those days. And I couldn't afford a horse. I used to walk from one appointment to another, distances of from eight to fifteen miles. I have always kept up the habit of walking daily, although my limit is about four miles."

Then followed admission to conference and a succession of changing charges. Dr. Ballard was a member of the General Conference and of the Book Committee, to which the "great book trouble" was referred.

For some time the idea had been agitated that Christian people should have some sort of summer resort where they might enjoy the beauties of nature unmarred by uncongenial social features. As a result, Ocean Grove was selected as a seashore resort with E. H. Stokes as president of the organization in control, and on December 22, 1869, a special charter was granted by Legislature, and Pitman Grove was chosen for a mountain resort, with Dr. Ballard as president. Since the death of Mr. Stokes and his successor, Bishop Fitzgerald, Dr. Ballard has served as president of both associations. Later on he was appointed to the presidency of the Federated Churches and temperance societies of the State, in an effort to procure a local option law, and to this he gave from nine to twelve years of time and effort. To foster the growth of these organizations Dr. Ballard gradually relinquished his hold upon clerical positions, and great as was his sorrow at giving up pastoral duties, he now looks back with a realizing sense of the law of compensation. "In all this the remuneration was scanty and the prospect less inviting," he says. "But here comes in God's fulfilment of the promise that if a man would forsake his houses and lands and brethren for the kingdom of heaven's sake his reward would follow, both here and hereafter. In some way, incomprehensible to myself, my faculties have remained unimpaired, and at an age when no minister is assigned to a charge I am honored with one to which no pastorate compares in importance, with a membership that no appointment equals in influence, and a support that no church could have given to these advances of age—the love and support of an association of men whose superiors do not exist in any combination of the world's best people, and whose love and affection make my evening time to be light. Here I hope to remain until God may give me some place in one of the groves by the River of Life."

Dr. Ballard's wonderful physical activity is shown by the fact that he almost never misses a day at the office of the association and seldom passes a Sunday otherwise than preaching from the pulpit of some church. All winter long he works at his desk, first compiling the past season's annual report and later making plans for the next summer, engaging speakers and musicians and perfecting all necessary arrangements. All this involves endless correspondence. Yet so kindly is his courtesy that it is said "he never fails to answer a letter, even from the humblest person." Graciousness, benevolence, hospitality, characterize his daily life. No word of bitterness or cruel criticism is ever allowed in his presence. He entertains the true "Pollyanna" spirit. To a caller who remarked that a yellow chrysanthemum intended for him had been left in the car, Dr. Ballard quickly replied, "Oh, well, some one else will have it to enjoy." And when "Pollyanna" was suggested, he said, "Oh, yes, I'm playing the game."

Dr. Ballard says he has promised to live to be one hundred years old, upon condition that he should be allowed one hour every day to play with his daughter's babies. The babies' mother, Mrs. Anna Ballard Lewis, is well known as a singer to Ocean Grove audiences. MARY KENDALL HYDE.

ON NEW YEAR'S EVE

A Poem of Recollection

TONIGHT four visions I renew
As through a mist of tears,
Locked by fond hips once I knew,
Departed with remembered years.
I walk in Memory's whispering halls,
And pause to hear what she may say
Before the clock at midnight calls
The dear old dying year away.

Life's experience grow warm and old:
But of them all Time still leaves
Bright among friends of jeweled gold
That reminiscence interweaves.
Precious the one I set mas trace;
Of some the essence still are clear.
And even years could quite efface
Those once to me and mine so dear.

The playground and the village street
I see and go again a boy,
When life was beautiful and sweet,
Yet not to live and love was joy.
Mates with all good-natured fun,
What careless merry times were ours:
We felt we were afloat upon
A summer sea of sunny hours.

Ah, those who joined my childhood's plays!
I long have sought for them in vain;
Of friends who cheered my later days,
How few there are who now remain.
Some are in other lands, and some
Are passed from earth for many a year;
Yet oft, in kindly thought, they come
As if communing with me here.

Remembering all the joys I had
In years forever passed from sight,
I half forget that I am sad
Here in my loneliness tonight;
For from the bells on every side
The slow clear strokes of midnight fall:
A New Year dawns, unknown, untried—
May it be joyous to recall!

GEORGE BIRDSEYE.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

SUSPECT A MONARCHICAL PROPAGANDA IN THIS COUNTRY. Alleging that unnamed persons of importance see in the several enormously endowed benevolent organizations in this country, such as the Rockefeller Foundation, a menace to our republican form of government and the foreshadowing of a monarchy, and believing in addition that these huge untaxed funds can become dangerous in shaping industrial policies, the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations will, on January 11, in New York City, begin an investigation of the Rockefeller Foundation, the Russell Sage Foundation, the Cleveland Foundation, the Carnegie Organized Charities and the Baron de Hirsch Fund, calling as witnesses practically the best known financiers of the country, in order to determine what are the rights, powers and functions of these self-perpetuating organizations, and to what extent their charters may be stretched, and what are the policies as related to industrial conditions, behind the benevolences and investigations conducted by the organizations. Hundreds of millions of dollars are held in trust by the corporations named, their endowments being untaxed because of the charitable purposes for which they were made.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO THE LETTER CARRIERS. The Post Office Department asks Congress for an appropriation of $321,700,514 for the next fiscal year, about $22,000,000 in excess of the sum named in reorganization recommendations. The department will experiment this year in carrying rural free delivery mail under trunk-line contracts, hoping to save in the neighborhood of $20,000,000 a year over the cost of the present individual route system; the experiment will be made in one county in each State. The idea of experimenting in aerial delivery has been put over for another year.

LO, THE POOR PATRIOT! The appropriation bill for the expenses of the government administration establishment for the year ending June 30, 1916, as reported to the House calls for an expenditure of $28,744,733.50, the half-dollar possibly being left on to show how carefully the estimates have been compiled. This is something over a million dollars less than the former appropriation, and involves the elimination of 187 specific salaries and reduction of congressional mileage from twenty cents to five cents, with no increase of salaries in any of the departments, and the cutting down of supplies. A census of agriculture and live stock, costing about two and one quarter millions, is a new item in this bill and for comparative purposes must be omitted, making the decrease over last year much greater; 1,000 temporary clerical positions not under Civil Service requirements are created by the item, a census to be taken in 1915 and one every ten years thereafter. The secretary of labor is to be allowed to lease a modern fire-proof building for his department, if the bill passes. Statistics of the Bureau of the Census show that the total receipts of the United States as a whole have increased 52.3 per cent. in the ten years since 1903, and the total payments for all accounts have increased 59 per cent. The figures are: Receipts for 1913, $2,049,813,606, as compared with $1,345,618,540 in 1903; and payments in 1913, $1,997,372,649, as against $1,241,872,109 in 1903.

THE DEATH OF THE OLD YEAR AND THE BIRTH OF THE NEW is the appropriate time for making good resolutions. We would suggest that among your "high resolves" for 1915 you should not fail to include the following:

I will renew my subscription to my favorite journal, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I will do it NOW.

By doing this you will be beginning the New Year on a good footing. You will assure your home circle fifty-two pleasant weekly visits, paid with unfailing punctuality; you will be kept in touch with all that is worth while in the world's march of progress and you will bring joy to our hearts, for we don't want to miss a single friendly face from our Circle, but to have all its members in harmonious association at our weekly reunions. That is your New Year's message of cheer and encouragement which you can send to your editor. Will you send it? Then—do it now.

REV. LEN G. BROUGHTON MAY RETURN. The noted Baptist minister who accomplished so much during his ten years' pastorate of the Baptist Tabernacle in Atlanta, Ga., and since April, 1912, has been pastor of Christ Church, London, is being importuned by members and friends of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church of Boston to return to America as pastor of that church. Dr. Broughton has successfully introduced his ideas of hospital work as an adjunct to the modern institutional church into the activities of Christ Church, as he had previously done in Atlanta, where he inaugurated various welfare features. His evangelistic work is widely known. A strong effort is being made to induce him to come to this country again in accordance with what is understood to be his own private preference.

BUREAU OF MINES ON THE TRAIL OF WASTERS. Director Joseph A. Holmes of the United States Bureau of Mines is quite properly wringing his hands over our annual preventable waste of coal, brass and other minerals in the process of mining and in manufactures. He estimates that in mining 600,000,000 tons of coal, 300,000,000 tons are rendered unusable, of which two-thirds could be saved. A million dollars' worth of minerals a day wasted is the round figure. And the director points out that minerals do not, like plant life, grow up again. One comforting note in his report is to the effect that radium can now be produced at $40,000 a gram; formerly it was three times that price. (A glance into the cellars of the nation might have added to the bureau's depression over our coal waste.)

UNIVERSITY TO TEACH SUNDAY SCHOOL METHODS. A one-hundred-thousand-dollar endowment has enabled Boston University to inaugurate a school in connection with its regular work for the training of Sunday school instructors and other Bible teachers. It will be called the Department of Religious Psychology and Pedagogy, and representatives of the Boston Sunday School Superintendents' Union will be on the committee having supervision of the new work. A very comprehensive course of study is contemplated, and speakers will be sent out to address conventions and institutes.

YOU—AND THE FEDERATION OF THE WORLD

YOU read Dr. Crane's ringing message in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week calling upon the President in the name of the Christian churches to inaugurate a United States of the World. You will doubtless read his second stirring message on the editorial page of this number. We shall be much mistaken if you are not moved by these arguments to strongly aid toward the accomplishment of this profound project. One thing at least you can do, and you may be sure it will have effect: that is, write to the senator from your State and the congressman from your district, letters or even postal cards, signed with your full name and address and reading like the form below, unless you prefer to couch your letter in some other way. We urge you to do this one thing at once. We suggest that you get your friends together and have each one write just such a letter or postal. We urge you to bring the matter to the early attention of your church, have Dr. Crane's first article read to the congregation, get everybody to sign it, and forward the completed document to the President in Washington. Please let us know what you do, so that we may be posted as to the strength of the appeal throughout the country. Write to us quickly for as many copies of Dr. Crane's article printed with space for signatures as you can advantageously use. This movement will have its greatest force if it is a simultaneous one throughout the United States, so do your part without delay.

Hon. A. B. See, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

The undersigned would call your attention to the article by Dr. Frank Crane which appeared in the Christmas number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, voicing the wish of the Christian Churches of America that President Wilson shall call on Congress to inaugurate a Federation of all Nations in a United States of the World. You are urged to use your influence in every right way for the advancement of this idea at this time.

FEELING OUR PULSE AT THE CANAL ARTERY. The Navy Department has been requested by Colonel Goethals, governor of the Canal Zone, to despatch two swift torpedo-boat destroyers for patrol duty at the entrance to the canal because of obstreperous conduct on the part of some foreign colliers which seemed inclined to ignore the rules laid down for vessels using the waterway. The administration did not leap at this opportunity to take a hand in the present international hostilities, but eventually naval vessels were placed under orders of Colonel Goethals. On December 17 two British vessels were refused clearance papers through the canal until their exact status could be determined. A million dollars has thus far been collected from vessels passing through the canal.

FREIGHT RATES GO UP. The Interstate Commerce Commission on December 18 finally granted the five per cent. freight rate advance to Eastern railroads, excepting on a number of specified commodities, live stock and packing house products among them. The Commission states that it has taken this action "in the interests of both the general public and the railroads."

KENTUCKY DISCARDS COMPENSATION LAW. On December 11, the Kentucky Court of Appeals declared the Workmen's Compensation Act, which had been passed by the General Assembly, unconstitutional, by a divided opinion, the minority declaring Kentucky to be the first State to hold such an act unconstitutional—a position that makes any effective workmen's compensation law impossible. The Federal Commission on Industrial Relations in a recent report to Congress named nine causes of industrial unrest, namely: (1) Desire for better living conditions; (2) revolt against [illegible] and improper working conditions; (3) desire on the part of the workers for a voice in the determination of conditions under which they labor; (4) unemployment and insecurity of employment; (5) unjust distribution of the product of industry, [illegible] understanding and prejudice between workers and employers; (7) activity of agitators in the interests of workmen; (8) cost of living outstripping income; (9) belief that redress for injuries and injustice is impossible through existing institutions. Huge immigration is mentioned as a contributory cause.

YOU ARE SAVED FROM $10,000,000 TO $20,000,000. The proposal of the railroads east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers to increase their rate on live stock, fresh meats and packing-house product would, according to the estimates, have added $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 per annum to the cost of such commodities to the public. The Interstate Commerce Commission on December 14 refused to permit the increase in freight rates.

OHIO COAL MINE TROUBLES. After a deadlock lasting eight months between the miners and operators in the Eastern Ohio coal fields—the result of a strike for increased wages—it was announced on December 12 that 2,000 of these miners would return to work at the Fairport, Ohio, mine under the Pittsburg wage scale and that the West Wheeling mine would resume operations on a profit-sharing basis. There are still some 16,000 miners out, but if the co-operative plans, on being tested, prove satisfactory, it is believed that many of the mines now at a standstill will soon resume under some mutually agreeable arrangement of a similar character. It is understood that steps have already been taken with that end in view.

IS THE INDIAN FIT FOR CITIZENSHIP? That our native red man should not remain permanently a ward of the government, but should gradually be led into the privileges of free American citizenship, is the suggestion conveyed in the annual report of Secretary Lane of the Interior Department, lately submitted to Congress. The secretary does not believe in the advantages of what he calls our present "almshouse policy" toward the Indians. Our conscience, our sense of justice and our traditions, he declares, will not allow us to cast the Indian out upon the world unprepared; but "he should not be permitted to think that he is forever to remain a government ward." We should lead him to look to the day when he would be a free Indian citizen, and the secretary further adds that we should "cast the full burdens of independence and responsibility upon an increasing number of the Indians of all tribes." He believes that, as the head of his department, he has the authority to do this in individual cases and proposes to employ it. There is little doubt that the progress of our Indian wards has been retarded through various causes, chiefly political. Now, if the opportunity has come to do him justice and to square the national conscience, we should not let it pass by unimproved.

JAPANESE STEPPING-STONES ACROSS THE PACIFIC. The press of December 18 contained despatches stating that as Japan's ultimatum to Germany promising the return of German territory in China and the Pacific taken in the war, was conditional on its being yielded up without opposition, the price of blood and money paid by Japan to overcome German resistance have bought such conquered territory for the Mikado, and commissions have already been sent out to determine the colonization possibilities in the islands, and industrial interests are planning for the extension of commerce in former German territories.

MERCHANTS TO CIRCUMNAVIGATE SOUTH AMERICA. An expedition of business men is being arranged to embark in the good American-built ship Finland at New York January 27, and at Baltimore January 29, for a cruise of 106 days with frequent stops on the way around South America and through the Panama Canal, a distance of about 16,000 miles, the object being to gain a comprehensive knowledge of the trade possibilities in the countries to the south of us, and to open South American eyes to the wonders of things "Made in the United States," an exhibit of which will be on board. Bankers and manufacturers as well as merchants will join the party.

A NEW YORK AUDIENCE LET LOOSE AMONG LIONS. On a recent evening five trained young lionesses missed the doors of their individual cages when being dismissed from their performing cage at a New York theater, and sauntered out upon the stage and down in the aisles, where they immediately became panic-stricken among some nine hundred men, women and children who with one accord were yelling and making for the various exits. The big cats were unable to escape, though one ran out of the door with the fleeing people, and was cornered and shot to death by policemen, one officer also being shot in the excitment; the other four beasts were rescued inside the house and returned to their cages. A spectator who evidently knew all about pretending to be dead when attacked by a wild animal lay down on the floor as one of these lions approached him and was walked on, receiving a scratch. Beyond the fright and whatever injuries were received in the stampede the rest of the audience were unharmed by the animals.

DEBORAH AND BARAK

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JANUARY 10. (JUDGES 4: 4-16)

Bundles and Chariots

GEORGE ELIOT once said wisely, "A woman's lot is made for her by the love she accepts." This is true in the narrower sense, of the man whom she chooses to wed; it is true also in the larger sense of the ideals she adopts and the hopes she cherishes. Deborah was in love with her country. Miss Willard was in love with the temperance reform. Mary Lyon was in love with the ideal education for women. Florence Nightingale was in love with cleanliness and order and health. Grace Darling was in love with courage and daring helpfulness. The love that each of these great women accepted fashioned her life.

The Israelites went to Deborah to decide their disputes because she was wise. A little girl, who was just beginning to go to kindergarten, was much impressed by the experience and asked her mother solemnly one afternoon: "Mamma, do I know as much now as I don't know?" Doubtless Deborah was sadly conscious often of the inadequacy of her knowledge and wisdom. Doubtless she was like the citizens of Leyden in Holland centuries later, who defended their town so bravely against the Spaniards that the Prince of Orange offered them their choice: exemption from certain taxes, or a university; and to their everlasting honor they chose the university, which became one of the most famous in the world. "Wisdom is the principal thing," thought Deborah, and so thinking, she became the wise judge of Israel.

We may think that it did not require much courage in Deborah to urge Barak to fight Jabin, king of Canaan, and his mighty general Sisera, but, though Deborah would not fight in person, she would fight in spirit. In war the women have more of the battles than the men. Their courage is severe, not in open combat, but in such work as was done by Lieutenant Doughty and Sergeant Rose when the tunnels mine was to be exploded in front of Petersburg in the Civil War. The fuse was lighted, but no explosion followed. Three men volunteered to examine the fuse, and explored the long, dark gallery of the mine, not knowing but that any minute would bring them the most horrible death. At last they found the defect in the fuse, spliced it and returned to the light. Thus women's courage is shown in the dark, silent passes; but it is not quite as heroic as men's?

We may not admire Barak for declining valor, but we must admire his humility. He confesses his need of a woman; he would not go to battle without Deborah. "Humility," said Confucius wisely, "is the solid foundation of all the virtues." Indeed, "humility" comes from the Latin word which means "ground." Ruskin once asserted, "The first test of a truly great man is humility"; and William Penn put the same truth in a metaphor. "Jesus rides with a double bridle when it is set in humility. An able and yet humble man is a jewel worth a kingdom." Such a jewel evidently was General Barak.

Not many generals would go on a campaign if assured by one woman they believed as Barak believed Deborah that the warfare would not be in their hands. But the triumph would fall to a woman. But Barak had at heart a cause rather than himself. It is said that in the bedroom of Kaiser William is a scroll bearing a motto, whose thought is strangely different from that often attributed to the emperor: "The world is so large and we are so small that everything cannot possibly revolve around ourselves." Barak lived in the large world of national glory and not in the little world whose circumference was his own fame.

Barak's army must have looked very insignificant when compared with Sisera's splendid array, his glittering host and his nine hundred chariots of iron. But the Lord does not look on the outward appearance. One of Lincoln's neighbors, when he heard that he had been nominated for the Presidency, exclaimed, "What! Abe Lincoln nominated for President of the United States! Can it be possible? A man that buys a ten-cent beefsteak for breakfast and carries it home himself!" Barak was willing to carry his own bundles on foot, and the Lord gave him those nine hundred chariots to ride in.

"Let us have faith," said Lincoln, "that right makes might, and in that faith let us dare to do our duty as we understand it." Lincoln's saying might well have been Barak's proclamation to his army. It is the thought of all these quiet, steady, forceful men, who, keeping themselves in the background and the interest of some great cause in the foreground, push the cause ahead of them up the slope of victory.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. J. R. Miller, D.D.

The righteous cried, and Jehovah heard, and delivered them out of all their troubles." —Ps. xxxiv. R.V.

Prayer makes all the difference. Let it be clearly understood that there are things to be obtained by asking, which will not come to hand unless we ask for them. People excuse themselves from prayer by saying that they are content to leave God to do as he may for them. They have not, because they ask not. Certainly there are many daily mercies, such as the necessaries, and even the luxuries and adornments of life, which are perennially bestowed by the heavenly Father, who sends sun and rain on the evil and the good, the prayerless and the prayerful. But deliverance out of trouble is an especial boon, which is given to the righteous when they cry. If, then, you are passing through a time of extreme trial and trouble take it as a sign that God wants you to pray about it. Even if you cannot pray in words, and have no language but a cry, go to him with your sob, your groan. "Shall not God avenge his own elect which cry day and night unto him?" "Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon thee; thou saidst, Fear not. O Lord, thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul; thou hast redeemed my life."

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

DEBORAH means "hornet," and Barak means "lightning," both names indicative of character and probably given after the characteristics of the two persons became fully known. The voice of a devoted woman rouses the nation to duty and a man does the fighting. A superb combination in any age.

The Kishon, "the tortuous," is the crooked river that drains almost the whole of the plain of Esdraelon, the greatest battlefield of the world. Five natural gateways lead into the plain, guarded by strong fortresses in all ages. It is not only the key to the possession of Palestine but to the road between Asia and Africa. Here fought the ancient Egyptians sixteen centuries before Christ; here Deborah and Barak met and defeated the Canaanite kings; here fought Gideon and his brave three hundred; here died Saul and Jonathan; here Josiah attempted to stop the army of Pharaoh Necho and was carried from Esdraelon mortally wounded to Jerusalem. During the period of the Jewish wars this plain resounded to the tramp of armies and the noise of battle. Here camped the armies of Alexander, the Cæsars, the Saracens and the Crusaders, and from this plain Napoleon began his first retreat. Turkey and the Allies now being at war, Merj Abu Amir (its present name) will be the field of decisive struggle. In the vision of the Jewish seer (Rev. 16: 16) the most fitting place whither "the kings of the whole world shall be gathered together unto the war of the great day of God the Almighty," are the level reaches of Megiddo—another name for Esdraelon—which level reaches give the type and echo in the Hebrew Har Magedon (Armegeddon). This defeat of the Canaanites under Sisera took place at Megiddo (Tell el Mutasellim), where still exist the ruins of an old castle dating from the twentieth century B.C., with an ancient enclosing wall twenty-eight feet thick. It lay on the military road from Egypt to the East and the extent of its ruins prove the importance of the location, which was at the time of the Judges the royal city of the Canaanites.

"The stars in their courses fought against Sisera." The tortuous Kishon flows through treacherous ground. A sudden storm transformed the plain into a sea of mud in which Sisera's chariots of iron were hopelessly engulfed. I have crossed the same plain in spring when at certain points mules and their loads actually disappeared in the almost bottomless mire.

A MILLION NICKELS FROM A MILLION SCHOLARS FOR A MILLION TESTAMENTS FOR A MILLION SOLDIERS

THE movement to raise A Million Nickels from a Million Sunday School Scholars for a Million Testaments for a Million Soldiers in European Hospitals, Prison-camps and Battlefields, has met with a ready response from those who believe that after all the most thorough going way to help the needy is to put them in vital touch with pure religion and the forces of the unseen world.

Mr. Marion Lawrance, general secretary of the International Sunday School Association, wired us the other day that the executive committee of the International Association, then in session, had given their endorsement to the Million Testament plan and would do all in their power to advance it. The New York State Sunday School Association has taken similar action and other State and county Sunday school organizations are co-operating splendidly.

Although the results of the efforts of these associations could not be expected to appear for several days the World's Sunday School Association has already received orders for thousands of the souvenir bookmarks which we are giving to contributors as the official acknowledgment of the receipt of a nickel for a Testament.

"A little Georgia Cracker," who is learning to read the Bible and already loves the Old Book, and who sympathizes with the sufferers over the sea, sent a dime to pay for two Testaments, one for a soldier and one for a sailor. Children's letters are coming in every day, showing how young hearts are being stirred by this opportunity to send the comforting Gospel of Jesus to the soldiers of Europe in their hour of danger and pain.

If you are a Sunday school superintendent or a pastor please have announcement of this Million Testament plan made in your school and write a letter about it to the editor of your local newspaper. If you are a Sunday school teacher please show this page to your superintendent and then go to work among your friends. Notify us how many bookmarks you will need and send remittances to cover the nickels you receive to Mr. Arthur M. Harris, treasurer, Metropolitan Tower, New York City.

Superintendent Beginners' Department

I. Required book on Sunday school organization. One of the following: The Efficient Sunday School (Cope), The Sunday School Organized for Service (Lawrance), The Organized Sunday School (Axtell), The Superintendent and His Work (Brown), The Graded Sunday School (Meyer), The Sunday School at Work (Faris).

II. Specialization book for student preparing as superintendent of Beginners' Department. The Elementary Work (Jacobs-Lincoln), The Beginners' Department (Wray), The Teacher of Beginners (Danielson), The Beginners' Department Leaflet No. 3, S. S. Series, M. E. Board of Sunday Schools, 1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

III. Method Material.

1. Beginners' Department Organization.

(a) Age of Department Scholars.

For those under six and over three years of age. In many primary classes scholars of these ages are found. Owing to the immaturity of these younger children the primary teacher finds difficulty in fitting the primary lessons to those under six. Hence the need of division.

(b) Rooms.

Use a corner of the primary room, or of the main schoolroom, the church parsonage, or a corner of the church. In summer meet out of doors. Curtain or screen off these little folks for the lesson. If there is no separate room or space let the Beginners meet with the Primary class for the opening and closing exercises and separate them for the lesson teaching.

(c) Superintendent and Officers.

A Beginners' superintendent or class teacher should be appointed the same as in the Primary, with assistants, and where the department room will permit of it, a secretary and a musician.

(d) Classes and Lessons.

A class for the four-year-olds and one for the five-year-olds is the usual plan, so that the Beginners' two-year graded course lessons can be taught. Where but one teacher can be found the two-year course can be taught by one teacher, but it would be best to have the four-year lesson, which begins with the idea of God, taught first.

These special two-year Beginners' lessons are part of the International Graded Series, and are beautifully illustrated with large uncolored pictures for class use and by smaller copies for scholars' use. These can be obtained of the denominational houses or Perry Picture Co.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Our Denominational Boards

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for January 10. (II Cor. 8: 8-15)

"DENOMINATIONAL Boards" certainly sounds like an uninteresting topic. A "board" sounds like something dry and lifeless and hard. And "denominational" is, to say the least, a long word.

But let us consider what this is all about. Think, for instance, of a little tugboat nosing around the mysterious islands just off the coast of California and Oregon, tying up at a wharf, ringing its bell and blowing its whistle, inviting people to come aboard to church—people who had not had an invitation to divine service in months. They hear the Gospel, sing the Gospel, and have an opportunity, while the tug is in the harbor, of purchasing Bibles and other religious books. There you have something interesting. But that, reduced to terms of correspondence and management, means the work of the American Baptist Publication Society, arranging in this and other ways for the dissemination of Gospel literature.

Or think of a scene in some distant land, perhaps a wild land. A letter from a missionary in Madagascar came to Miss Sangster a few weeks ago, to which she referred in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, telling of the unbelievable cruelties practiced there upon babies. Every week is divided arbitrarily by the medicine men into "good" and "evil" days. If a baby is born on an evil day it must be sacrificed alive. And the longer it can be made to suffer before death the better the god will be pleased. The missionary went on to describe fantastic plans for prolonging the torment of these little bodies in ways too terrible to mention. That is something which touches your heart, is it not? And such practices are being stopped and such hideous suffering ended by the influence of the missionaries and the authority of the new government, the island now being owned by the French. This means that a certain "board" of a certain "denomination" has sent out men and women to tell these poor mothers that they need not torture and slay their babies to please God and that to do so, instead of being right, is an immeasurable sin. In India the mothers used to throw their babies into the Ganges to appease the gods. In China little girl babies are still exposed to die, not for any religious motive but because a girl baby is an undesirable addition to the household. Do you want to help stop things like these? Then get your society to contribute liberally to the Foreign Mission Board of your denomination.

Back again in our own country, think of some neglected spot in the West or South, some rough mining town where rum is god, or some Southern mountain home where there is little to eat and nothing to read and nothing to hope for. Then think what it means to have a bright-faced young woman or sturdy man come along with books and papers and hymn books and Bibles and start a Sunday school, and later help build a church whose Sabbath bell reminds all the neighborhood that God is love and that Jesus has shown a way to heaven. Isn't that interesting? Then don't stay away from church the next time the representative of the Home Missions Board of your denomination comes to your church to take a collection.

CONCERNING RESOLUTIONS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

IT WAS New Year's Eve and the two girls were sitting before the log fire waiting for the clock to strike twelve times.

"I am going to make some big resolutions this year," said the Small Brunette, suddenly breaking the silence.

The Blonde Girl propped her chin on her hands.

"Resolutions are like jellies and canned fruits," she said. "It is much better to have a small amount well preserved than a large jar that will spoil during the year."

The Little Brunette pouted.

"Do you mean," she questioned, "that you think my resolutions will spoil?"

The Blonde Girl hurried to make amends.

"Oh, my dear," she exclaimed, "of course I didn't mean that. But"—she hesitated thoughtfully—"it's hard to surely know what you will do. For instance, if it's a very serious resolution, very hard to keep, it might be better never to make it than to smash it up after you have made it!"

The Little Brunette gazed into the fire with long-lashed, inquiring eyes. Then she smiled.

"All right," she agreed, "my resolutions this year won't be as huge as I expected them to be—but," she laughed, "little as they are they'll keep."

With a low, self-satisfied bell-note the clock began to usher in the New Year.

The making of resolutions is a habit that a great many young people acquire. It is rather a nice habit, and yet I am sure that some people make resolutions that sound large and praiseworthy with the thought uppermost in their minds of the applause that they will get from a handful of friends. There are other folk who make promises to themselves which they keep faithfully and yet never tell a soul about. These well-kept, almost sacred resolutions are the kind that should be written about, told about, for other young people to see.

I had a letter from a busy correspondent of mine yesterday and the contents pleased me so much that I am going to quote it all to you.

"When I read your article entitled 'Personally Conducted,' I said, 'now is the chance for me to present a suggestion which just flashed through my brain like lightning.' It is this: For the girls, old or young, to give in a few words their ambitions and purposes for the New Year. With a variety of thought from so many we cannot help but be benefited and inspired to the higher and loftier ideals in life.

"I am a busy woman, but if you consider it a splendid idea, Miss Sangster, I, too, will steal a little time to give the girls my plans and ambitions for the new year.

"I would be very much delighted if each one would respond in her own way and give us all something to help make the New Year more profitable than the old one."

I do think that the idea is a splendid one and I hope that my girls will think so, too. For I am sure that ambitions and purposes and, yes, even resolutions, told in this way, will not only do a great deal of good, but will make a very interesting article.

Holidays—different holidays—have very different meanings to me. Easter is a solemn, religious day and Thanksgiving is a joyous time of prayer. Christmas is the day of childish happiness, but New Year's Day seems as symbolical of a number of things, as the Egyptian hieroglyphics on an ancient crumbling tower. It is symbolical of a new beginning, of the fresh white page in a torn and blotted copy-book. It is a fresh, bright sort of a day, that seems like the meeting of two roads, one labeled "past" and the other "future." The road that you have traveled may be full of ruts and boulders, with mighty few sweet grassy places; but the new road stretches out clear and smooth as far as the eye can reach.

I once read about a little boy who made his mother a promise. It was a very hard promise for a small kiddie to keep, but he struggled with it manfully. At last something made him forget it and, thoughtlessly perhaps, he smashed it into a thousand pieces.

The mother felt very badly about the broken promise. She cried about it, and prayed about it, and then she took the child to task.

"Darling," she said tenderly, but oh, so sadly, "darling, you have made mother very unhappy!"

The little boy's eyes filled.

"What has I done?" he quavered.

The mother looked into the tearful eyes.

"You have broken your promise," she told him. "What will you do?"

The little boy hesitated for a moment. Then slowly his tears dried and his little face beamed with a smile.

"I's sorry," he told her, "but, muvver dear, I'll make another jus' as dood, and I'll keep it—truly—this time!"

Friends of mine, if you have made resolutions that, like the huge jar of preserves, spoiled during the year, remember that though you have failed once it will not be hard to make another resolution "jus' as dood" that with faith and trust will keep. And because I think that it will help my girls, and some who are not yet my girls, to know what your plans for the year are going to be, I am going to ask you to unlock them from the secret part of your heart and send them in.

Malden, Mass., or G. P. Brown & Co., Beverly, Mass., or Sunday school supply houses.

(e) Equipment.

If a separate room it should be carpeted. Small chairs with rubber tips should be used. Pictures of the children, brought by parents, may decorate the walls, as well as copies of the masters, such as "The Boy Samuel" and the "Age of Innocence" by Sir Joshua Reynolds, Murillo's "The Divine Shepherd," or pictures of home life by Peter De Hooch, which almost all include children. There should be a cabinet for supplies, hooks for the children's wraps, and a blackboard, which may be used also as a screen, if needed, to separate the departmental classes.

(f) Mothers' Class.

Organize the mothers, who come naturally with these younger children to the Sunday school, into a Beginners' Mothers' class, to be taught the Bible lesson for the day while the children are being taught their lesson. This mothers' class should meet monthly on a week afternoon or evening for social purposes, a talk upon some practical topic and to plan ways of helping other mothers. When the children are promoted the mothers' class could then become a Primary Mothers' class. A Mothers' Association of Beginners and Primary mothers may be formed, and the mothers put upon committees to work out a program. Frequently these young mothers have been former Sunday school scholars, and make excellent teachers for the Beginners' classes. A mothers' library should be obtained for circulation.

(g) Department or Class Program.

Where a separate room is possible the exercises may include the following items: 1. Opening song and prayer. 2. Circle work, including a good morning song; birthday recognition with offering and song; welcome to the new scholar. 3. Class groups for lesson. 4. March, with song, during which chairs will be rearranged. 5. Song. 6. Bible texts and memory verse. 7. Good-by song, wraps and distribution of lesson picture.

Send for Outline of Supplemental Lessons for Elementary Grades (leaflet 11 of M. E. Board of Sunday Schools, 1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago), for the memory and drill work adapted to the Beginners' Department or class.

(h) Promotion.

At the annual promotion day, have the class recite the memory texts and class hymn and present each scholar with a promotion certificate.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

you little rascal—quit that! he broke off in laughing reproof as a bushy-tailed squirrel leaped to his lap and began to nose in his pockets. "Guess we'd better give them their dinner or they'll be tryin' to eat us," chuckled the boy. "That's Sir Lancelot. He's always first, you know."

From somewhere the boy produced a small pasteboard box which he opened guardedly, mindful of the numberless bright little eyes that were watching every move. All about him now sounded the whir and flutter of wings, the cooing of doves, the saucy twitter of the sparrows. Sir Lancelot, alert and eager, occupied one arm of the wheel chair. Another bushy-tailed little fellow, less venturesome, sat back on his haunches five feet away. A third squirrel chattered noisily on a neighboring tree branch.

From the box the boy took a few nuts, a small roll and a doughnut. At the latter he looked longingly, hesitatingly.

"Did you—bring anything?" he asked then.

"Lots—in here," nodded Pollyanna, tapping the paper bag she carried.

"Oh, then, perhaps I will eat it today," sighed the boy, dropping the doughnut back into the box with an air of relief.

Pollyanna, on whom the significance of this action was quite lost, thrust her fingers into her own bag, and the banquet was on.

It was a wonderful hour. To Pollyanna it was, in a way, the most wonderful hour she had ever spent, for she had found some one who could talk faster and longer than she could. This strange youth seemed to have an inexhaustible fund of marvelous stories of brave knights and fair ladies, of tournaments and battles.

The Ladies' Aiders were forgotten. Even the glad game was not thought of. Pollyanna, with flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes, was trailing down the golden ages, led by a romance-fed boy, who—though she did not know it—was trying to crowd into this one short hour of congenial companionship countless dreary days of loneliness and longing.

Not until the noon bells sent Pollyanna hurrying homeward did she remember that she did not even yet know the boy's name.

"I only know it isn't 'Sir James,'" she sighed to herself, frowning with vexation. "But never mind. I can ask him tomorrow."

CHAPTER IX

JAMIE

POLLYANNA did not see the boy "tomorrow." It rained, and she could not go to the Garden at all. It rained the next day, too. Even on the third day she did not see him, for, though the sun came out bright and warm, and though she went very early in the afternoon to the Garden and waited long, he did not come at all. But on the fourth day he was there in his old place, and Pollyanna hastened forward with a joyous greeting.

"Oh, I'm so glad, glad to see you! But where've you been? You weren't here yesterday at all."

"I couldn't. The pain wouldn't let me come yesterday," explained the lad, who looked very white.

"The pain! Oh, does it—ache?" stammered Pollyanna, all sympathy at once.

"Oh, yes, always," nodded the boy, with a cheerful matter-of-fact air. 'Most generally I can stand it and come here just the same, except when it gets too bad, same as 'twas yesterday. Then I can't."

"But how can you stand it—to have it ache—always?" gasped Pollyanna.

"Why, I have to," answered the boy, opening his eyes a little wider. "Things that are so are so, and they can't be any other way. So what's the use thinking how they might be? Besides, the harder it aches one day, the nicer 'tis to have it let up the next."

"I know! That's like the ga—" began Pollyanna; but the boy interrupted her.

"Did you bring a lot this time?" he asked anxiously. "Oh, I hope you did! You see I couldn't bring them any today. Jerry couldn't spare even a penny for peanuts this morning, and there wasn't really enough stuff in the box for me this noon."

Pollyanna looked shocked.

"You mean—that you didn't have enough to eat—yourself?—for your luncheon?"

"Sure!" smiled the boy. "But don't worry. 'Tisn't the first time—and 'twon't be the last. I'm used to it. Hi, there! here comes Sir Lancelot."

Pollyanna, however, was not thinking of squirrels.

"And wasn't there any more at home?"

"Oh, no, there's never any left at home," laughed the boy. "You see, mumsey works out—stairs and washings—so she gets some of her feed in them places, and Jerry picks his up where he can, except nights and mornings; he gets it with us then—if we've got any."

Pollyanna looked still more shocked.

"But what do you do when you don't have anything to eat?"

"Go hungry, of course."

"But I never heard of anybody who didn't have anything to eat," gasped Pollyanna. "Of course father and I were poor, and we had to eat beans and fishballs when we wanted turkey. But we had something. Why don't you tell folks—all these folks everywhere, that live in these houses?"

"What's the use?"

"Why, they'd give you something, of course!"

The boy laughed once more, this time a little queerly.

"Guess again, kid. You've got another one coming. Nobody I know is dishin' out roast beef and frosted cakes for the askin'. Besides, if you didn't go hungry once in a while, you wouldn't know how good 'taters and milk can taste; and you wouldn't have so much to put in your Jolly Book."

"Your what?"

The boy gave an embarrassed laugh and grew suddenly red.

"Forget it! I didn't think, for a minute, but you was mumsey or Jerry."

"But what is your Jolly Book?" pleaded Pollyanna. "Please tell me. Are there knights and lords and ladies in that?"

The boy shook his head. His eyes lost their laughter and grew dark and fathomless.

"No, I wish there was," he sighed wistfully. "But when you—you can't even walk, you can't fight battles and win trophies, and have fair ladies hand you your sword, and bestow upon you the golden guerdon." A sudden fire came to the boy's eyes. His chin lifted itself as if in response to a bugle call. Then, as suddenly, the fire died, and the boy fell back into his old listlessness.

"You just can't do nothin'," he resumed wearily, after a moment's silence. "You just have to sit and think; and times like that your think gets to be something awful. Mine did, anyhow. I wanted to go to school and learn things—more things than just mumsey could teach me; and I thought of that. I wanted to run and play ball with the other boys; and I thought of that. I wanted to go out and sell papers with Jerry; and I thought of that. I didn't want to be taken care of all my life; and I thought of that."

"I know, oh, I know," breathed Pollyanna, with shining eyes. "Didn't I lose my legs for a while?"

"Did you? Then you do know, some. But you've got yours again. I hain't, you know," sighed the boy, the shadow in his eyes deepening.

"But you haven't told me yet about —the Jolly Book," prompted Pollyanna, after a minute.

The boy stirred and laughed shamefacedly.

"Well, you see, it ain't much, after all, except to me. You wouldn't see much in it. I started it a year ago. I was feelin' 'specially bad that day. Nothin' was right. For a while I grumped it out, just thinkin'; and then I picked up one of father's books and tried to read. And the first thing I see was this: I learned it afterwards. so I can say it now.

"Pleasures lie thickest where no pleasures seem:
There's not a leaf that falls upon the ground
But holds some joy, of silence or of sound."*

"Well, I was mad. I wished I could put the guy that wrote that in my place and see what kind of joy he'd find in my 'leaves.' I was so mad I made up my mind I'd prove he didn't know what he was talkin' about, so I began to hunt for 'em—the joys in my 'leaves,' you know. I took a little old empty notebook that Jerry had given me, and I said to myself that I'd write 'em down. Everythin' that had anythin' about it that I liked I'd put down in the book. Then I'd just show how many 'joys' I had."

"Yes, yes!" cried Pollyanna, absorbedly, as the boy stopped for breath.

"Well, I didn't expect to get many, but—do you know?—I got a lot. There was somethin' about 'most everythin' that I liked a little, so in it had to go. The very first one was the book itself —that I'd got it, you know, to write in. Then somebody give me a flower in a pot, and Jerry found a dandy book in the subway. After that it was really fun to hunt 'em out—I'd find 'em in such queer places, sometimes. Then one day Jerry got hold of the little notebook and found out what 'twas. Then he give it its name —the Jolly Book. And that's all."

"All—all!" cried Pollyanna, delight and amazement struggling for the mastery on her glowing little face. "Why, that's the game! You're playing the glad game, and don't know it —only you're playing it ever and ever so much better than I ever could! Why, I—couldn't play it at all, I'm afraid, if I—I didn't have enough to eat, and couldn't even walk, or anything," she choked.

"The game? What game? I don't know anything about any game," frowned the boy.

Pollyanna clapped her hands.

"I know you don't—I know you don't, and that's why it's so perfectly lovely, and so—so wonderful! But listen. I'll tell you what the game is."

And she told him.

"Say!" breathed the boy appreciatively, when she had finished. "Now, what do you think of that!"

"And here you are, playing my game better than anybody I ever saw, and I don't even know your name yet, or anything!" exclaimed Pollyanna, in awestruck tones. "But I want to—I want to know everything."

* Blanchard. Lyric Offerings. Hidden Joys.

In order that you may know how much we workers and students of Peck School appreciate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. First of all, we read the inspiring and helpful articles. Then, in our Home Decoration Class, we mounted the covers for bedroom decoration. The pictures that seemed to be favorites with the girls were "The Lost Sheep," the various landscape scenes, and "Sunset in the West." It is our object to train the girls so that they will be able to enjoy the master pictures, instead of the cheaply, highly-colored prints so often found on the market. We have no good wall pictures, consequently we seize every opportunity to teach the true worth of a picture. At one time the following motto was placed in the room of a wilful young boy: "The only way to have a friend is to be one." About six months later he remarked to his mother: "I read that motto on my wall every morning when I wake up. The real meaning of it has just come to me. I believe it must be true." I wonder how many of us could look at the picture of "The Lost Sheep" without saying: "How true! Our Saviour surely does reach out his hand to guide."

clear your skin

Try Resinol Soap for a week. You will be gratified to see the improvement in your complexion even in that short time. And it is so easy, too!

Just bathe your face for several minutes with Resinol Soap and hot water, working the creamy lather into the skin gently with the fingertips. Wash off with Resinol Soap and more hot water. Finish with a dash of cold water to close the pores.

Do this once or twice a day, and you will be astonished to find how quickly the healing, mildly antiseptic Resinol medication soothes and cleanses the pores, removes pimples and blackheads, and leaves the complexion clear, fresh and velvety. The same treatment keeps the neck, hands and arms soft and white.

Resinol Soap is not artificially colored, its rich brown being entirely due to the Resinol it contains. Twenty-five cents at all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For a guestroom size trial cake, write Dept. 16-C, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

WHAT 15c WILL DO

The little matter of 15c in stamps will bring you the Pathfinder for 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's Capital, for the Nation; a paper that gives all the news of the world and that tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 22d year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is at last. Send only 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in New Friends. Address The Pathfinder, Box C, Washington, D. C.

Questions and Answers

J. F. I heard a minister make the statement recently in a public meeting that "God allowed people to do as they wished." I was much surprised, as I had formed an entirely different opinion from the Bible and other books as well as from the prayers of Christians, who pray that they may be kept in hours of temptation from doing the things which they may wish. Besides, I know from personal experience that I have often been kept by the restraining grace of God from doing what I wished. The very thought that my heavenly Father will keep me from doing these things which I may desire or wish to do in the hours of temptation is an anchor to my soul.

What the minister intended to emphasize was the doctrine of the freedom of the will. It is true that some denominational bodies reject this doctrine as a theory, but in actual work most clergymen and Christian workers appeal to all their hearers to choose the good, with the implication that all are free to do so. The problem you bring up is quite distinct from this. James speaks of a "double-minded" or "two-souled" man. (James 1: 8 and 4: 8.) Paul describes a phase of this conflict between a man's good and evil self in Romans 7. He evidently passed out of this particular phase of that conflict, for there is nothing in his other writings to indicate that he continued this life of gloom or was conscious of constant spiritual defeat. Indeed his epistles abound with testimonies to his spiritual gladness and light and victories. But even Paul, in these years of spiritual triumph, felt that his physical nature was warring against his spiritual nature, and had to be strenuously fought. (I Cor. 9: 27.) It is one or the other of these forms of struggle to which you refer. Our better self longs for victory over our inferior nature. In this sense we pray to be kept from doing what we are inclined to do. But this very situation shows that our real self wishes to do the better thing, so that even in this interpretation of his words the minister was correct, that we are allowed to do the thing we wish to do.

N. W. B. Is it necessary for every Christian to testify for Christ in public meetings?

It should be the joy and privilege of every sincere Christian to confess Christ whenever a fitting opportunity offers. This may be either in conversation, in the home circle, among your business friends, on the cars, or in the prayer meeting. Never will you regret doing this, for it always brings a blessing. It is a special privilege to confess him in the assembly, when others are acknowledging their faith and allegiance, and you should try to do this also when the opportunity arises. We know there are some people so sensitive and nervous that the suggestion of a public confession is painful to them; but once the thing is done, you will never again hesitate. Indeed, you will rather be glad to welcome each fresh opportunity. The Christian church has grown until it reached us, because Christians were willing and eager to state what Christ has done for them. They overcame the enemy "by the blood of the Lamb and the word of their testimony." We know the Master is deeply grieved when any of his followers is unwilling to show his colors. In fact he has distinctly made our confessing him before men a condition of his confessing us before his Father. (Matt. 10: 32; Luke 12: 8.) How can we be "ashamed of Jesus!" If we are, we must seek a closer walk with him, a warmer friendship for him. We must let him bless us so richly that, like the apostles, "we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard."

H. E. M., Dickie, Wyo. Your duty as a Christian should be considered as more important than your duty to society. You do not need to care what people think or say, if you know you are doing what Jesus would have done. He saves "to the uttermost," and you should try, as far as possible, to help those who need saving. Don't be like the Levite who passed by on the other side. There are many ways to help a poor fallen fellow creature, but the simple ways are the best. Your own good sense and kind heart will prompt you to do the right thing. She may need advice, and a kindly word will go far; or she may want to be helped to employment. You can aid her without really giving offense to your friends, if they understand your motives.

A Subscriber, Dooley, Mont. What is the meaning of the line from Holmes' poem, "The Chambered Nautilus": "Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast"?

The poet speaks of the soul as living in a temple of its own building. Each soul chooses whether to live in a great temple or a small one. He exhorts the soul to keep building larger temples for its occupancy. He has not the remotest idea of hinting that these temples shut us from heaven in any spiritual sense. He is picturing great temples in which the roof or dome, marking the temple's height, shuts off the light of the sky. The line is merely a poetical expression of the idea that the temple roof should be very high and the enclosed space vast.

H. C., Monroe, Iowa. Although much has been written concerning the nature of angels, very little is really known, beyond the fact that they are God's messengers, endowed with spiritual bodies (see I Cor. 15: 44), and employed as the ministers of the divine will. The Bible sheds little light on the nature of angels, although it mentions them many times. One commentator writes: "They are represented as being in the widest sense agents of God's providence, natural and supernatural, to the body and to the soul; thus the operations of nature are spoken of as under angelic guidance fulfilling the will of God." The ministry of angels is mentioned in various passages, including Matt. 13: 41-49; 24: 31; Luke 16: 22, etc. Jewish rabbinical literature has preserved the tradition of the rebellion and fall of the apostate angels, and the reference in Isa. 14: 12 has sometimes been interpreted as related to this tradition. In Jude 6 there is a well-known passage on the same subject. Milton in Paradise Lost described the fall of Lucifer in a famous poetic passage. (See also Luke 10: 18.) Beyond these references, all is conjecture.

G. I. B., Genesee, Idaho. Please state why the patriarch Jacob (Matt. 8: 11) retained his name and the apostle James (Matt. 10: 2) is called James in the English translation of the Bible?

The New Testament word for "James" is, as you indicate by the Greek letters in which you have written both names, a Hellenized form of the Hebrew name "Jacob." That is, it is a Hebrew word made over into Greek and given a regular Greek termination. But where the ancient Jacob is referred to in the New Testament the new Greek name is not used; instead of that, the old Hebrew name is merely written in Greek letters. So it remains, to all intents and purposes, a Hebrew word. In the English language the Greek form of the name became changed to James while the Hebrew form remained Jacob. In the French, Italian, Russian and Spanish forms of the name its ancient derivation from Hebrew is still noticeable.

C. L. W., Castleton, Kan. In answer to a recent question in the Mail-Bag you give a number of Scripture passages to show that the disciples were converted before the day of Pentecost. How could they have been converted before the atonement was made?

To say that there were no regenerated persons in the world before Christ's death on the cross would be to ignore the spiritual attainments of Enoch, Abraham, Joshua, David, Hezekiah, Daniel, Isaiah and a host of other Old Testament saints. Some of the sublimest utterances of devotion and spiritual blessedness occur in the Old Testament. Mary herself, our Lord's mother, attained her wonderful experience of piety and communion with God before her divine son's death. Not only his mother and his disciples but other companions, like Martha and Mary and Lazarus, entered into spiritual life before his death on the cross. To many he said definitely: "Thy sins are forgiven." Surely, with this word they felt the coming of a new life. He had power in himself, before his death, to change the hearts of people and bring them into fellowship with God. Yet now that his death has taken place, it becomes an infinite help to all who would seek God. We see in it an overwhelming demonstration of God's love. There is in it an appeal that ought to be irresistible. Who can refuse to accept grace and salvation backed by such a proof of love? The fact that many did come into communion with God before that event, only increases the condemnation of those who, with the fact of the cross before them, refuse to yield themselves to God's forgiving love.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. H. B. H., Hornick, Iowa. See Deut. 14: 11-12 for the Mosaic laws concerning forbidden fowls.

L. A. H., Landersville, Pa. The presumption is, of course, that Barabbas was set free, in accordance with the ancient custom which gave the Jews the release of a prisoner as a boon on a certain day in each year.

H. C. C., Seaside Heights, N. J. 1. It is still in existence. Address Tribune Building, New York. 2. You are probably right concerning the passage in Mark 7: 19—the last clause may be an interpolation by the evangelist.

L. M., Beattytown, N. J. Honoré de Balzac was a distinguished French novelist, born 1799, died 1850. His best known works are the Comédie Humaine, Père Goriot, Eugénie Grandet, and Les Parents Pauvres.

Reader, Oregon. The law justifies extreme measures in resisting such attacks as you mention. It is certainly a dreadful condition of affairs that makes such crime possible in a civilized community and the severest punishment should be given to the perpetrators.

A. D., Petersburg, Va. Forgetting and forgiving are two entirely different operations. The last is voluntary; the first may be wholly beyond our control. In forgiving an injury it may be impossible to forget the occurrence; yet the remembrance brings with it no bitterness when the hurt is truly forgiven the offender.

J. R. M., Bloomington, Ill. The Marys mentioned in the Scriptures were: Mary the Virgin, Mary Magdalene (supposed to have come from the village of Magdala on the western shore of Lake Tiberias), Mary the wife of Clopas (John 19: 25), Mary the mother of John (Acts 12: 12), and Mary the sister of Lazarus (Luke 10: 40).

Mrs. A. M. W., St. Louis, Mo. The verse you refer to, Isa. 63: 1, is one of the most clearly Messianic passages in the Old Testament. Some of the other Old Testament prophecies which are believed by conservative scholars to refer to the Messiah are held by more radical interpreters to apply to other persons and events, but this passage even radical critics accept as foretelling Christ. George Adam Smith comments as follows: "The keynote of the piece is the loneliness of the Hero. The avenging Saviour has the fierce joy of being alone. We see one great form in the strength of one great emotion."

X. Y. Z., Lebanon, Pa. In the passage in Matt. 19: 8-13 Jesus, who had previously explained the sacredness of the marriage tie, told his questioners that Moses sanctioned a relaxation of the severity of the law dealing with divorce "because of the hardness of your hearts." Their low moral condition had made them unable to fully obey the original law. Moses granted the relaxation to prevent greater evils. Jesus impressed upon his hearers the fact that the relaxation was purely civil. Such marriages, he implied, are liable to prove a snare rather than a blessing. On no occasion can his language be construed to approve of marriage by those who have been divorced.

Our Cover Picture

EAST of Jebel Harun (a great mountain which tradition has identified with ancient Mount Hor, and upon which the tomb of Aaron is pointed out to travelers in the Holy Land) lie the ruins of the ancient city of Petra. This is generally believed to be the town of Selah mentioned in II Kings 14: 7. For many centuries the city disappeared from history, and was rediscovered by Burkhardt's excavations in the nineteenth century. Among the ruins are 750 tombs, hewn out of the rock walls which surround the town. El Jerra, called by the people El-Khazneh, the treasury, is an ancient temple of Isis. It is entirely carved out of the solid rock, whose unhewn portions make a gigantic frame for the exquisite picture of the temple façade, as shown in the frontispiece of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This façade is sixty-five feet high. The beauty and size of this exquisite work of art are enhanced by the natural hues of the ruddy sandstone of which it is composed. "The red rocks of the Sik (the gorge in which the temple is located) with their wonderful range of tints and ever-changing play of light afford a spectacle of unique beauty, especially in the early morning."

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COUNSEL

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is without charge of any kind to them and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter envelope and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

Neither THE CHRISTIAN HERALD nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do try, however, to make sure of the integrity of the advertising before admitting them to our columns. And value given is an expression of opinion only, based upon information we believe to be reliable, but we must not be held responsible should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

MRS. W. A. R., CONNECTICUT. (1) Wet seasonal farm mortgages are generally regarded as one of the soundest forms of investment. (2) We form you nothing either excessively high or unusual errors. (3) Your father's bonds come from a reliable investment. He should have dealt with a more responsible firm.

REV. E. D. D., VERMONT. One of the safest, surest, and easiest ways to accumulate a sum sufficient to pay for your son's college course twenty years hence is to regularly buy bonds. If you can save $8 each month and invest the money at 6 per cent. interest you would have $4,219.51 at the end of twenty years. A number of permanent investment banking firms assist prudent and thrifty people to accomplish saving results through partial payment plans.

MRS. N. E. W., (1) Adams Express stock at 88 is not regarded as a woman's investment. (2) Baldwin Locomotive preferred is better. (3) Keep away from Norfolk & Southern.

S. W. W., DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. (1) American Light & Traction is one of the most successful companies in the United States. The common stock is selling at about 3½ times the par value and the preferred at 111. (2) Binghamton Gas Works first gold 5s are regarded with high favor. The Binghamton Gas Works is a subsidiary of the A. L. & T. Company.

C. A. B., INDIANA. The Cooper Handbook, Vol. XI, says: "The Butte & Great Falls Mining Company is developing the Genevieve group of claims, near head of Dixie Gulch, 3½ miles northeast of the Butte & Superior property. Property not regarded favorably but management honest. All 'Prospect' mining stocks are extraordinarily hazardous.

F. A. E., GEORGIA. Better wait awhile before buying. The stock issues of United States Steel Corporation, Republic Steel, Railway Steel Spring, Bethlehem Steel and Lackawanna Steel intrinsically are perhaps worth just as much as before the war, but the fact that enormous amounts of these shares are yet held in the hands of European investors, who will naturally sell in on higher prices, will act for some time as a set balance on any attempt to create a better market for any of the steel stocks.

MRS. A. C., INDIANA. John T. Hull, self-pleased moral reformer, Columbus Creek, was arrested by United States postal authorities on Friday, the 13th of November, charged with the use of the mails in promoting a fraud. It is fortunate that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had the opportunity to caution you before you sent your money.

E. S. H., RHODE ISLAND. There is absolutely no market for Cincinnati, Dayton & Ironton 5s at present, on which you not paid interest since September 1, 1914. Although the Cincinnati, Dayton & Ironton Railroad is one of corporate existence, the first gold 5s are secured by a lien on a hundred and sixty miles of road from Dayton to West Jefferson, Ohio, and from Bryan Junction to Bryan, Ohio. The remainder of these bonds are secured by the C. H. & D. Railway Company's general mortgage. The First and Refunding Mortgage 5s due July 1, 1959. We are informed that the bonds are absolutely self-sustaining and that no dividends in arrears will be paid from them. If the next part of the coupon is not paid when due, the general mortgage trustee will have the right to foreclose the mortgage and appoint a receiver to operate the road. Under such circumstances the bonds would be worth considerably more than they are selling for at present.

R. S., OHIO. As regards Westinghouse Air Brake Company, there is no statement obtainable for publication. Its shares are not quoted on the curb or in the open market. The last dividend paid was 1½ per cent. on the common stock, on August 15, 1914. The company is a subsidiary of the American Brake Company.

R. E. L., DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. The [illegible] of the present time to believe [illegible] investments. These stocks may sell in advance of [illegible] but should [illegible] than [illegible] [illegible] many years, [illegible] of such [illegible] in America, as Penn. Pennsylvania, Delaware, Northern Pacific, Southern Pacific, Southern Railway, and Southern Railway [illegible] common stocks, other fairly sound investment propositions. At the present time we are advised of the rumor to the effect that the Interstate Commerce Commission has decided to grant the railroads the rate increase which they have been asking for. If this rumor proves true, the investment situation, as it affects railways, is sure to clear up and offer, apparently, a considerable additional degree of assurance for the investor buying the common stocks of the railways.

W. H. B., NEW YORK. The lumber and coal stock you have under consideration for your investment is considered one of the poorest speculations on the market. Keep out of it. Let us know about how much money you have to expend and we shall be very glad to direct your attention to such securities as may be deemed sound and fairly profitable.

H. N. C., MICHIGAN. Minneapolis, St. Paul, Rochester & Dubuque Electric Traction Company stock, otherwise known as the Dan Patch, is not considered among regular investment issues, nor do we believe that you could find a market for your shares. We would not recommend a purchase of the 8 per cent. notes of the company.

M. P. T., WEST VIRGINIA. The Boyertown & Pottstown Street Railway leased to the United Traction Company's first gold 5s, due August 1, 1936, are believed to be a sound investment issue. We think that these bonds are all that William McIlvain says they are in his letter to you of August 18.

D. M. P., MASSACHUSETTS. You are quite right. The New York Stock Exchange has reopened for public trading, and is publishing quotations of entire list of stocks and bonds. A minimum price limit, however, has been fixed.

E. S., FLORIDA. Complete description of all regular corporation securities is found only in extensive volumes like Moody's and Poor's Manuals. These are too expensive for the small investor. The Investor's Pocket Manual, containing about 275 pages of condensed information about all the listed securities, should be all you need. A single copy costs 25 cents, prepaid.

MRS. A. S. S., ILLINOIS. County of Arkansas, Gillet Drainage District 6 per cent. bonds are of a class of municipals becoming exceedingly popular with prudent investors. We see no reason for not making the purchase.

T. P. R., VIRGINIA. Pacific Gas & Electric Company common stock has been advanced on rumors of both a cash and stock dividend distribution early in 1915. Such disbursements may be doubted. Better buy the bonds instead of the stock.

H. B. B., NEW JERSEY. Bonds of the United Water & Light Company are quoted at 5s. The company is an affiliate of the American Water Works & Electric Co. The company's office has been removed from Pittsburg to 60 Broad Street, New York City.

N. A. W., ARKANSAS. (1) The notes are backed by a responsible firm and are believed to represent the best form of commercial paper. (2) Other short-term notes:

	Price	Yield
B. & O. 4½s, June, 1915	100	4.50
U. S. Steel 5s, June, 1916	100	5.00
Erie 5s, April, 1916	99	6.06
Hocking Valley 5s, Nov., 1917	99½	6.15
Southern Railway 5s, March, 1917	98¼	6.85

W. T., IOWA. You say that you have bought some stock of a local coal and ice business company and are now considering the purchase of additional shares. We cannot recommend doing this. Such stock is rarely a safe purchase, and besides once you get your money into shares of this company it is practically there to stay, for usually these stocks are established matters and never pass to other hands for sale the shareholders are generally loath to sell except at a long time to find a buyer. The concern has invested most heavily with the stocks of gas, life and fire insurance companies. There seems to be a craze upon the part of the public to buy these speculative issues. Comparatively few of the new enterprises still make good. According to Bradstreet's these reports are too optimistic with regard to the nature of life insurance companies, only one new one having got out of a total of nearly one hundred and fifty companies promoted during the year 1913 have so far paid dividends. This record doesn't the peak our confidence for new insurance investments.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK

NINETEEN FIFTEEN ushers in a year of the most profound interest to the commercial and financial world. As we view e state of affairs which exists to-y, for which there is no parallel, criterion, it is well to recount efly the factors responsible there-, as well as to inventory the prin-ai constructive events which have urred since the war's start, and deavor to obtain a glimpse of what in store for business during the ceeding twelvemonth.

The year which has just closed will into our financial history as an och replete with untoward condi-ns of unrivaled severity. Perhaps passing marks the end of the long awn-out business depression, which nd birth in the so-called "Roosevelt nic" of eight years ago, and was ven additional vigor by the open and gressive hostility to constructive in-stry by our political representatives law-making bodies, and again re-ived renewed impetus by Europe nen the nations thereof, in the ring of 1911, commenced to liquidate merican investment securities in eparation for the approaching war hich everybody abroad knew must ash upon the world shortly.

This business depression, militant id cumulative, has entailed sinister id far-reaching influence upon prac-cally all departments of American dustry. Its more noticeable effects e the following: Withdrawal of pital from the arteries of trade and anufacture; decline in bank clear-nces; impoverishment of railway rnings and mounting costs of opera-on; widespread unemployment of th common and skilled labor; un-ecedented number of commercial ilures; a languishing stock market; endless succession of new laws, vowedly detrimental to creative ef-rt; a spirit of distrust and fear mpant throughout the land; and, nally, in the last days of July, when e financial sky seemed as dark as ght, the awful impact of the war's ash terrified capital as never before nce the fall of the Roman Em-ire, demolished our wonderfully con-ructed machinery of international redit, bringing a complete cessation f many activities which had been pre-iously kept alive through the long eriod of business stagnation preced-ng the breaking of the conflict across he sea.

The momentous events of 1914 and f the preceding seven years have now ecome a part of history. They mark chapter both tragic and destructive. Ve shall now commence a new record f events, as yet unborn; but we may o some extent prejudge the quality f these events by the actualities in ront of us as 1915 commences to as-ume form. As we cross the thresh-old of the new year we discern nmistakable evidence that popular ysteria has given way to constructive rogress, and even the most cursory glances at the weather-glass of busi-ess reveals an enormous measure of ccomplishment.

With no effort at chronological ex-actness, let us set down a few of the nore striking incidents and influences at work, which mark the present and he immediate past. Perhaps the most mportant of all the visible forces at work to reconstruct prosperity is a general movement largely brought into entient form by a general knowl-edge of the war's waning power to exert further its blighting effects upon our domestic concerns and actions. The United States is the richest na-tion on the globe; our granaries are filled to the bursting point; we are at peace with all the world; our mills and manufactories have the products the rest of the world must buy for cash or its equivalent; our people, having thrown aside the senseless fear that assailed them when the war com-menced, are now imbued with a general impulse of courageous action; we are assuredly in an enviable position.

Here are a few of the many things actually accomplished toward the goal of prosperity: International credit has been restored. The Federal Reserve Bank Act has become operative, and thus some $400,000,000 in gold and potential credit to the amount of pos-sibly $2,000,000,000 have been released for the purposes of legitimate in-dustrial expansion; and money panics, which formerly at periodical inter-vals rendered our banking system a travesty, are assured against. The great New York Stock Exchange, closed on July 30 against the impend-ing avalanche of foreign-held Ameri-can securities, which had threatened to wreck every bank in the United States, reopened for public trading December 12. Bank clearances are visibly in-creasing and general business, though still far from normal, has perceptibly improved, and the gloom which had thickly pervaded the commercial at-mosphere has markedly lifted. Many classes of skilled labor have returned to their respective vocations. There has been disseminated throughout the States a feeling that our big corpora-tions have not been awarded a square deal and that "they shall be met with a spirit of candor and justice," as President Wilson declares. Business-baiting political propaganda is now becoming an outlawed pastime for the men who hold the levers of power. Our domestic exports to foreign countries have increased by leaps and bounds and the end apparently is far off. South and Central America invite our merchants to accept their custom of upwards of $2,000,000,000 annually, and when our business men find a way to adjust credits and shipping they will gain this rich prize, heretofore awarded to Germany and England. And, just as this is written, we have the news that the Interstate Commerce Commission has awarded a rate in-crease to the railroads, an act of tre-mendous bearing on the future well-being of our great common carriers.

Despite the knowledge that the present monstrous but senseless Euro-pean war, which has shocked the busi-ness world as no other war in all history, is still evincing no signs of abatement, and that some billions of wealth and hundreds of thousands of the very flower of Europe's productive manhood have been wiped out of ex-istence; despite the inevitable placing upon the nations abroad of a crushing burden of war indemnities, thus weak-ening the purchasing power of our former customers across the ocean; despite these potential factors of most sinister import, we, the American people, are decidedly optimistic over the prospects of our own material well-being.

Evidences of this revivifying spirit, so characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race, are multiplying daily. The daily press and the magazines are carrying most refreshing interviews with and autographic articles by America's foremost financiers and merchants. The general tenor of these reviews is of the same import; it breathes of ap-proaching prosperity for the United States. "The road at last lies clear and firm before business," says Presi-dent Wilson in his message to Con-gress. Abnormal prosperity has al-ways followed in the wake of every big war, such as the Napoleonic, the Crimean, the Franco-Prussian, the Boer war, and the four-year Civil war. It is said that history always re-peats itself.

It is quite true that all is not fair and serene on the financial horizon, and business enters the uncharted courses of the New Year with con-siderable hesitation and fear. There may lurk many dangers ahead. But however uncertain the distance to be traveled, we are on the course and neither the influences of the war nor the effects of the depression which as-sailed business seven or eight years before the war, can stay our progress. We are on the way unless all signs fail.

Your January Funds

Where to Place Them to the Best Advantage

PRINCIPAL, Interest and Dividends available for invest-ment can be wisely and profitably placed in the 6% bonds of the American Real Estate Company, based on its extensive ownership of real estate in the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx, in New York City, and in the City of Yonkers, adjoining New York City.

Since 1888 these bonds have been favorably known to thousands of individual investors as A-R-E Six's, and it may be to your advantage before placing January funds to know about the American Real Estate Company, its bonds, and the successful busi-ness back of its bonds.

In the assurance of income and the safety of principal, real estate and obligations based upon it offer unusual attrac-tions at this time when the general security market is upset.

A-R-E Six's are not mortgage bonds,—they are deben-ture bonds, and have been bought by the public for 27 years without a dollar lost or gone astray. They are the direct contract obligations of the American Real Estate Company, issued in two forms, as follows:

6% Coupon Bonds

In denominations of $100, $500, $1000 and upward, interest payable semi-annually by coupons attached, and principal maturing in ten years.

6% Accumulative Bonds

Maturing in ten, fifteen or twenty years, for $1000 and upward, purchasable by installments. The install-ments bear interest at 6%, which is compounded annually, accumulated and paid with the total install-ments at maturity.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

"SOME time ago," writes L. D., "I wrote you to ask prayers for a young friend whose mind had become unbalanced, that he might be restored to health. The prayer has been graciously answered, and he is as well as ever and able to attend to his business affairs as well as other work. He is an earnest Christian and does much for the church." E. J. M. writes: "Some months ago I asked the prayers of the league for a dear friend who for a year and a half had been suffering from a very distressing mental condition, caused by a serious nervous disorder. She has been fully restored, after four physicians had said she would never be right again." Mrs. C. A. A. writes from Excelsior Springs, Mo.: "I asked the Prayer League to pray that we might have a glorious revival here and the Lord has graciously answered the prayer. Sinners are being brought into the kingdom of Christ and his people are being awakened as never before." A subscriber in Connecticut writes: "Some time ago I wrote, requesting prayers for my husband, to save him from the drink habit. He is restored. I thank the heavenly Father for answering prayer."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from many others, whose testimonies are held till next week for lack of space.

A sad letter comes from a father and mother in the South, saying: "We are in great distress over our wayward boy. We have prayed for him continually. Please present our case to the Prayer League." A telegram is received from Mrs. J. R., St. John, N. B.: "Request special prayer for daughter's recovery from operation for cancer in the breast." Another Canadian mother writes: "Please beg God to convert my only son. He is going to the war and I am heartbroken." Miss F. L. writes: "I have written before, but I cannot help asking once more that special prayers may be offered for the healing of a brother who is insane and also afflicted physically. He was a remarkably good student, a university graduate, but is now a mental wreck."

An Oklahoma Reader, the mother of four small children, asks prayer for relief from mental depression, renewal of spiritual strength and healing of child. Mrs. J. J. H. asks special prayer that a terrible sorrow may be averted, that she may be given strength and courage in a coming trial, that health may improve, for blessings upon her home and that faith may be strengthened. Mrs. V. P. S. asks prayer that her daughter's health may be restored, that her husband be reclaimed, her son converted and that she may be given strength to bear her afflictions and be in all things submissive to the will of God. Mrs. E. C. L., Des Moines, Iowa, writing to tell of the great revival occurring there under the leadership of Evangelist Sunday, asks special prayers for the salvation of a brother, other relatives and friends, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon a Sunday school and congregation at Des Moines, and for better health for father, mother, sister and herself.

C. S. asks prayer for the success of revival meetings at Green Ridge, Mo., and for blessing upon a Sunday school class; a discouraged mother and superintendent in Hamilton, N. D., for blessing upon a Sunday school; Mrs. S. M. W., for deep spiritual awakening and revival at Athens, Ohio; J. A. H., for outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the Lord's work at Gonzales, Texas; M. E. K., for a revival in church and blessing upon pastor at Orlando, Fla.; A Friend, for outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the churches and Sunday schools of Downsville, N. Y.; E. J., for State-wide prohibition in South Carolina; Mrs. H. B., of Bessemer, Ala., for the upbuilding of Christ's kingdom; Mrs. E. S. Questions and Answers

T. G. T. Please give your opinion of the duplex envelope, whether it is a benefit or a detriment to a church. Though it may for a time greatly increase contributions, what are its lasting results? Does it not keep out of the church thousands of good people in moderate circumstances, especially wage-earners who must economize rigidly to keep out of debt? Would it not be better to put directly into the work of the church the money now paid for these envelopes?

The chief purpose of the duplex envelope is to impress church people with the obligation of giving for outside benevolences, especially foreign missionary, as well as for their own local church needs. Not only its immediate, but its lasting results are good because it trains people in the habit of systematic giving, helps them to continue the habit, and emphasizes the fact that the obligation to give to outside causes is as great as to give for local needs. It certainly ought not to keep even the poorest away from church; it is an appeal not first of all to make the contributions large, but to make them regular. Many very poor families could afford to put at least a five-cent piece in each portion of the envelope. If this is too much, a nickel could be put in the local department of the envelope one week, and in the foreign department the next. The cost of the envelopes is so slight as to be almost negligible. Ask your church treasurer what he pays for them, and you will see that they cost almost nothing. Whatever slight expense they necessitate is made up many times by the increased collections when congregations are trained to give regularly and systematically.

A. R., Whitestone, N. Y. The passage in Rev. 20 relative to the binding of Satan for "a thousand years" has thus been interpreted by some commentators: "As the number seven implies universality, so a thousand implies perfection, i. e., that the world during that period is to be perfectly leavened and pervaded by the divine." Others have held that it means a thousand years literally.

A. F. S., Eagleville, Conn. The contention as to whether the world is growing better or worse is an old one and interminable, since the answer must depend altogether upon the point of view. If one were to judge from the present European war, it might be said that the world is growing worse; but that would be a narrow view. We believe that the human race is making progress Godward, and that there are more real Spirit-filled, earnest Christian people living lives of service and love and kindness today than in any previous age.

H. C. E., Ohio. Is there any reference in the Bible which tells of baptizing with fire, and also with ashes? Could this mean the same as baptism with water?

There are many Scripture references to baptizing with fire. John the Baptist declared that Jesus came to baptize with fire. (Matt. 3: 11; Mark 1: 8; Luke 3: 16.) In Acts 1: 5 Jesus himself refers to this prophecy of John, and promises that this baptism is near at hand. It came on the day of Pentecost in tongues of fire upon the waiting apostles. (Acts 2: 1-4.) There is no reference to a "baptism" with ashes, but in Hebrews 9: 13 reference is made to the Mosaic ceremonial "water of separation," which contained the ashes of a heifer and was sprinkled upon unclean persons or things for their purification. (See Num. 19.) It is stated that Christ's blood has greater purifying power than the blood of sacrificed animals, or their ashes. The baptizing with water is a sign of our adoption into Christ's family and our becoming heirs of his blessing. The baptism with the Holy Spirit may occur at the time of water baptism or later in the Christian's experience.

Theophilus, Alta., Canada. Please explain John 18: 36. What do you think of modern warfare, with its terrible means of human destruction? It seems to me utterly opposed to the Spirit of Christ and the germs of Christianity in short, worse than heathenism. How can men (ministers and others) if they truly believe in Christ wantonly go and slaughter their fellow men? What can the world think of this in the light of the Sermon on the Mount? Also 8th Romans and Luke 9: 54-56.

1. In the discussion with Pilate in the judgment hall, the question was raised as to the charge that Jesus had claimed to be a king. It was intentionally given the color or appearance of treason against the Roman Government. Failing to convict him of anything criminal, his accusers had resorted to this final charge hoping that Pilate would find it sufficient for conviction. Jesus' reply swept away the whole force of treasonable accusation. (See verse 36.)

CHRISTMAS
By
Margaret E. Sangster Jr.
'T WAS many hundred years ago the angels sang their story,
And far above there shone a star that silvered all the snow;
And crouching in a hay-filled barn—the wise men all adoring—
The Mother Mary soothed her babe with whispers soft and low.
The angels' song is silent in the sky and on the meadows,
The snow is trampled blackly with a nation's marching feet,
And cannon thunders to the stars that silently are keeping
A vigil on the men that die—while all of life is sweet.
A bugle sounds, the columns dart together, and a slashing
Is heard as sabre cuts through flesh, as bullet screams its mirth;
And wise men cry, and brave men die as armies strive with armies,
And in a blood-red way they keep the Saviour's day on earth.
The city streets are crowded with the rich and poor together,
And satin gowns rub elbows with the rags of grief and shame,
And golden coins are flashing as a gem—a dainty trinket—
Is purchased for some thoughtless one, a present "In His Name."
Oh! all the paths are filled with slush, and in the darkened heavens
The pale stars gleam behind a mist with fitful yellow light,
But smiling sweet, with noiseless feet, the Christ Child may be walking
Throughout the earth to see how people keep His birthday night.
'Twas many hundred years ago the angels sang their story,
And far above there shone a star that silvered all the snow;
And praying in a hay-filled barn—the wise men all adoring—
The Mother Mary kissed the Babe of heaven here below.

It was, as one commentator remarks, as though he had said: "This kingdom of mine is not of this world, but is a spiritual kingdom in the hearts of men. If it were a worldly kingdom like that of Cæsar, then my subjects would fight rather than permit their king to be delivered to the Jews to be slaughtered; but my kingdom is not from hence, and there is no need for them to fight to prevent me from being delivered into the hands of mine enemies." Force, violence, bloodshed, murder, formed no part of the divine policy. Even the authority of Pilate would not be resented, although Pilate himself would have been powerless "except it were permitted him from above" (see chapter 19, verse 11). The whole episode is an unanswerable argument to prove that force is opposed to the spirit and teachings of Jesus. Yet the church, which names him as its Founder, has gone through many bloody wars. Even today we find the church, or a considerable portion of it, ranging itself on the side of war, and invoking the divine blessing on the efforts for the destruction of human beings.

Miscellaneous

Reader, Logan County, Ohio. The passage quoted is not in the Bible.

Mrs. T. H., Ontario. There is no present prospect of serious trouble of the kind you mention.

G. N. M., Richmond Center, Wis. The use of the word "poppycock" in the connection you mention is certainly slang.

J. M. K., Landisburg, Pa. The passage in Isa. 11th chapter is held by many commentators to refer to the millennium, the date of which no man can foretell. The reference can hardly be suitable in a debate such as you mention.

Mrs. E. M., La Rue, Ohio. Although it is not certain who was the oldest of the disciples, the general impression is that Peter was the senior of his associates. He was probably between thirty and forty years of age at the time of his first call, about A.D. 26. There is nothing in the Scriptures or early Christian writings to indicate which was the elder.

A. H., Cedar Vale, Kan. Dr. Döllinger, at the Bonn Conference of old Catholics in 1875, said: "Purgatory, as a burning-away of sins, was an idea unknown in the East as well as the West till Gregory the Great introduced it. He added the idea of a tormenting fire. This the schoolmen gradually converted into doctrine, which they associated with papal indulgence till it came to apply to the dead generally, which, of course, made all seek indulgence. It went on to have degrees; some could receive indulgence for a few of their sins, others for all, and so on; so that eventually the Pope, having already the keeping of heaven and the dominion on earth, obtained also sovereignty under the earth." Such is the history of the beginning of purgatory as a papal doctrine, from a responsible authority.

F. M. E., Mansfield, Ohio. Card-playing at any time is a doubtful occupation, if for no other reason, solely because of the influence of our example upon others. Cards are the implements of the gambler, and are inseparably associated with gambling. If one believes it to be the duty of a Christian to "avoid even the appearance of evil," then he will not play cards. Further, even in a worldly view, it is an undesirable amusement and one which, coming to the ears of an employer, would not be likely to promote the advancement of his employee. We have yet to hear that expertness at cards was ever considered a desirable qualification for a young business man, but rather the reverse. The same remarks apply to women card-players, but in a greater degree. A "social game of bridge" has in many cases been found a sure road to gambling.

An Appeal to the President from the Christian Churches of the United States

By DR. FRANK CRANE

The Church of Jesus Christ to the President of the United States, GREETING:

WE ARE at an unexampled crisis of history.

Civilization is in danger. The world points with scorn at the amazing outbreak of violence among so-called Christian nations.

Twentieth century States are fighting with the ferocity of Huns, with the cruelty of ancient Rome, with the unreason of medieval fanatics.

Never in time has such ruin, such horror been let loose on earth. Unnumbered corpses of men lie mangled in the fields. Thousands of women are widowed, their lives blighted. Homes everywhere are darkened. Poverty stalks in all lands. Pestilence follows.

The judgment of Christ thunders above the wretched ignorance of nations: "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword."

The United States of America is the only one of the great powers of the world that is at peace.

Under your wise guidance we have so far avoided disastrous entanglements.

But how shall we use the privilege of our fortunate isolation?

Shall we merely take advantage of it to capture the markets of the world and make money out of the distress of other nations?

WE BELIEVE that you believe that States are as morally bound to do right and to act nobly as are individuals. From your public utterances we know that you reject the pernicious doctrine that the nation's only morality is expediency; its only righteousness force. You have often spoken of this country's duty to "serve mankind."

Is it "serving mankind" to stand aloof when brother nations are in extremities, or get gain from their disaster?

There is but one way to serve the world at this juncture. That is to take such steps as will eliminate the possibility of future wars.

And there is but one way to do this. It is to begin the formation of the Federation of the World.

It is to substitute the court of law for the arbitrament of war in settling the disputes of nations.

It is to have one army and one navy, under the orders of this court, whose duty it shall be to prevent war and not to make war, even as city police prevent and not make street brawls.

THE fundamental error is that each nation now is the judge and executioner of its own case. This is practical anarchy. And international anarchy is as horrid as anarchy among private citizens.

To continue to make treaties with separate nations is useless so long as each nation is its own judge, backing up its decrees with its own guns. The absurdity of this to be realized needs only to be stated.

The Federation of the World is not Utopian. It does not have to wait for the millennium. It is practical right now.

It is not necessary to "change human nature." All that is needed is to substitute law for violence. This we have already done in all civilized communities; and what has been accomplished in Holland and in Ohio is feasible for the whole world.

Some nation must begin the movement. This is the nation.

We are the richest country on the globe, the most powerful in the resources of men and money.

We are not mixed up in any of the complications, jealousies nor rivalries of the Old World.

At the close of this war we shall have probably the naval supremacy of the world.

A proposition coming from us would command the respectful attention of all the earth.

We therefore earnestly petition you to do this one thing in the name of that Christ whom you and we desire to obey.

CALL upon Congress to invite all nations to join us in a World-Federation, that shall leave to each land its entire independence and that shall confine itself to the adjudication of international disputes.

We need not wait for all to come with us. Let us commence the Federation with any who will come in. We believe all the American republics will join us. We believe that China is ready. We believe that, as the war wears on, the European States will be glad to escape from their deadlock and unite with us.

We are not peace fanatics. We do not stand for cowardice nor dishonor. But we do stand for law as against anarchy; and for an intelligent government of the world as against such gigantic ignorance and folly as have led the European nations into this senseless whirlwind of waste and wickedness.

AND you, Woodrow Wilson, are the man to act.

We elected you. We believe you want to serve us. We believe you are listening very closely to hear the will of this great people and to do it, in the fear of God.

It is our will, and also the will of all the peoples of earth, that war shall cease; war, the supreme misgovernment, the prime stupidity; for we know that justice comes not from trial of arms, and that while princes sometimes profit from war the people never do.

Let our Congress issue its call to the nations. Let it back up this in sincerity by placing our armament at the disposal of this Federation. Let us spend hundreds of millions, not in fortifying our coasts, Panama, the Philippines, but perfecting the Federation.

Let us send our most representative men abroad to preach world-unity; such men as our ex-Presidents and others whose ability and distinction entitle them to a world-hearing.

WE WOULD not so address you did we not believe you have the courage, the vision and the high statesmanship requisite for this, so great a matter.

Lead us! The great American people are with you.

Proclaim the United States of the World!

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THIS last week has witnessed the end of all the German men-of-war on the high seas, except two, each of which is in a rather difficult situation.

On Tuesday, December 8, about 7.30 in the morning, near the Falkland Islands, which, by the way, in 1831 came very near belonging to us, off the extreme tip of South America, the German squadron, lately victorious over the Monmouth and Good Hope, found itself in the presence of a British squadron under the command of Admiral Sturdee. An action followed, with the result that the two most important German ships, the Gneisenau and the Scharnhorst, besides a light cruiser, the Leipzig, were sunk after a five-hour fight. Two other light cruisers, the Dresden and Nürnberg, took to flight, but one, the Nürnberg, was caught up with and sunk, while the Dresden seemed to have gotten away. The latest news is to the effect that the Dresden also has gone down.

The Gneisenau and Scharnhorst, named after two famous generals of the early part of the last century, were both armored cruisers of 11,500 tons displacement with a main battery of eight 8.2-inch guns and of a speed of 25 knots. Each vessel carried a crew of 775. The Leipzig and Nürnberg were small cruisers of 3,250 and 3,400 tons respectively, and a light battery, but fast. According to the reports very few of the crews were saved, and the German loss in lives will probably run well over 2,000, including the admiral, Count von Spee.

Only the Dresden, if she is successful in eluding pursuit, which is very improbable, and the Karlsruhe are now left of the German navy outside of the main fleet at Kiel and Wilhelmshaven. The practical effect of this victory, therefore, is to render Great Britain undisputed mistress of all the seas of the world except one, the North Sea. There she still has some work to do.

Another effect of this victory will be to render the commercial routes between the United States and South America safe for British trade with South America, which will no longer be interrupted.

This fight disposes of three of the nine units of the armored cruiser class of the German navy, and about evens up the score of the naval fighting on the open sea between Great Britain and Germany.

The squadron which destroyed the German vessels was one composed and started specially from England for that purpose. The admiral commanding was not known to the English public to have relinquished his former position as chief of staff, nor was anything known of the sailing of the squadron, which doubtless was a strong one.

The British loss in men was very light and no vessel of the squadron was seriously damaged.

The rebellion against the British in South Africa has completely collapsed. General DeWet is a prisoner about to be tried for high treason, General Christian Beyers was killed during the week trying to escape from a pursuing force. The few rebels remaining have scattered, and the whole rebellion is at an end. This will enable General Botha to carry out the operations originally planned against the German colonies in the south of Africa.

Japan has officially announced that no decision has been arrived at by that government as to the ultimate disposal of Kiaochau, and intimates rather strongly that she will probably retain this former German colony.

The British Government has put a stop to the football finals. The enormous attendance at the football games, largely composed of young men, none of whom manifested any intention of volunteering, had become a national scandal.

During the week the German Emperor has had a slight attack of influenza as a result of exposure on the eastern battle front, but according to late reports he is recovering rapidly and is in no danger.

There has again been trouble in the concentration camps, not only in England, but in Holland also. In this latter country the Belgian soldiers who took refuge in Holland at the time of the fall of Antwerp attempted a revolt the latter part of last week at the camp in which they are interned, and the Dutch troops guarding them were compelled to fire on them with considerable loss of life as a result.

The results of the campaign between Russia and Turkey still remain very vague and unsatisfactory. Both sides claim a victory every now and then, but neither seems capable of a sustained advance in any direction. One reason as far as the land fighting is concerned is the extreme cold, as the scenes of combat in the Caucasus and in Armenia are nearly ten thousand feet, sometimes more, above the sea level.

The Holy War does not seem to amount to very much. There are rumors, but only rumors, of a certain amount of trouble caused by its proclamation in Tripoli, but Egypt, Algeria and India seem perfectly calm, and even Afghanistan does not seem at all troubled. It may now well be doubted whether this weapon will be of much service to the Sultan.

Poor little Albania and her fate seem to be completely escaping notice in the absorption of the larger issues. There are said to be conditions of almost absolute anarchy prevailing in that unhappy country, and the misery and destitution there are alleged to be worse than in Belgium, although, of course, fewer persons are affected.

FRENCH GUNS PLANTED ON GROUND TORN UP BY GERMAN FIRE

THE GERMAN FLAGSHIP SCHARNHORST SUNK OFF THE FALKLANDS

The French champagne vintage of this year has been saved almost completely in spite of the fact that a large portion of the district in which this grape grows was violently fought over, which state of affairs is one of the curious things of the war.

Though much of our information concerning the events of the war is unsatisfactory, we are still better off than they are in Great Britain. There the censors permitted the British papers to give an inkling of the loss of the Audacious only on December 1, and even then all they were permitted to publish was that a British superdreadnought had been lost, the name, place and time being suppressed.

It is a little difficult to see what advantageous end this policy attains. Concealment of projected movements of ships or troops is necessary always, until the movement is completed, but the five weeks' concealment of a fact, such as the sinking of the Audacious, which in the course of time must inevitably be known, seems foolish and short-sighted.

The campaign in the west in both France and Belgium has languished during the week. The British fleet bombarded the coast towns twice, but, excepting to drive the German troops back from the shore, with apparently little result.

Neither side seemed at any point in the long line to desire to initiate any really serious offensive, and except for occasional bombardments here and there, the whole line has been very quiet. Though the weather has again been bad this hardly accounts for the extreme quietness. It looks as though both sides were tired and desired a rest.

Naturally, under these circumstances, the changes in position amounted to little; in fact, there were practically none. In confirmation of these statements I quote from Colonel E. D. Swinton, the British observer on the battle front, who said as recently as December 6: "Of major tactical operations by the British forces there has recently been an entire absence; nor for some weeks has any strategical advantage been won in a geographical sense, since there has been no advance and no gain in ground."

The Austrian campaign against Servia seems to be progressing with reasonably satisfactory results to that Power. The Austrian forces have advanced about forty miles southward toward Nish, and it does not seem as though Servia could interpose any serious obstacle to their further advance. The Servian cabinet made an appeal to Russia for aid during the week, and the King of Montenegro announced that, though the casualties in the Montenegrin army amounted to a third its total strength, it would continue to fight.

The President of France and his cabinet have returned from Bordeaux to Paris, in which latter city the Chamber of Deputies is called to meet on the 11th of December. The offices of the government are, however, to remain at Bordeaux for a short time longer.

The German invasion of Poland has been moving forward during the week. Commencing in the early part of the week with a victory over the Russians at Lodz and the occupation of that Polish city, which

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

[SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS TAKEN PLACE: Mrs. Carew, a rich Boston woman, lives almost as a recluse in sorrow over the disappearance, years ago, of a little nephew Jamie. Her sister, Miss Wetherby, was Pollyanna's nurse during her stay at the Sanatorium where she was so wonderfully brought back to health and strength by Dr. Ames after her accident. Miss Wetherby persuades Mrs. Carew to invite Pollyanna to spend the winter with her, feeling sure that the result will be her restoration to happiness. Letters from Miss Wetherby and Dr. Ames persuade Dr. and Mrs. Chilton to let Pollyanna go, they themselves planning to spend the winter in Europe. Pollyanna is greatly delighted with Mrs. Carew's magnificent home on Commonwealth Avenue and with all that she sees of Boston. At the end of her first week she strays into the Public Garden, where by her conversation and her description of "the glad game" she starts an ex-convict toward a useful life and saves a young woman from temptation. Leaving the park, Pollyanna wanders in the wrong direction and loses her way.]

CHAPTER VI—Continued

IT WAS at a noisy corner where two broader streets crossed that Pollyanna finally came to a dismayed stop. This time the tears quite overflowed, so that, lacking a handkerchief, she had to use the backs of both hands to wipe them away.

"Hullo, kid; why the weeps?" queried a cheery voice. "What's up?"

With a relieved little cry Pollyanna turned to confront a small boy carrying a bundle of newspapers under his arm.

"Oh, I'm so glad to see you!" she exclaimed. "I so wanted to see some one who didn't talk Dutch!"

The small boy grinned.

"Dutch nothin'!" he scoffed. "You mean Dago, I bet ye."

Pollyanna gave a slight frown.

"Well, anyway, it—it wasn't English," she said doubtfully; "and they couldn't answer my questions. But maybe you can. Do you know where Mrs. Carew lives?"

"Nix! You can search me."

"Wha-at?" queried Pollyanna, still more doubtfully.

The boy grinned again.

"I say not in mine. I guess I ain't acquainted with the lady."

"But isn't there anybody anywhere that is?" implored Pollyanna. "You see, I just went for a walk and I got lost. I've been ever and ever so far, but I can't find the house at all; and it's supper—I mean dinner time and getting dark. I want to get back. I must get back."

"Aw! Well, I should worry!" sympathized the boy.

"Yes, and I'm afraid Mrs. Carew'll worry, too," sighed Pollyanna.

"Well, if you ain't the limit!" chuckled the youth unexpectedly. "But, say, listen! Don't ye know the name of the street ye want?"

"No—only that it's some kind of an avenue," responded Pollyanna.

"A ave*noo*, is it? Sure, now, some class to that! We're doin' fine. What's the number of the house? Can ye tell me that? Just scratch your head!"

"Scratch—my—head?" Pollyanna frowned questioningly and raised a tentative hand to her hair.

The boy eyed her with disdain.

"Aw, come off yer perch! Ye ain't so dippy as all that. I say, don't ye know the number of the house ye want?"

"N-no, except there's a seven in it," returned Pollyanna, with a faintly hopeful air.

"Won't ye listen ter that?" gibed the scornful youth. "There's a seven in it—an' she expects me ter know it when I see it!"

"Oh, I should know the house if I could only see it," declared Pollyanna eagerly; "and I think I'd know the street, too, on account of the lovely long yard up and down the middle."

This time it was the boy who gave a puzzled frown.

"Yard?" he queried, "in the middle of a street?"

"Yes—trees and grass, you know, with a walk in the middle of it and seats, and—" But the boy interrupted Pollyanna's description with a whoop of delight.

"Gee whiz! Commonwealth Avenue, sure as yer livin'! Wouldn't that get yer goat, now?"

"Oh, do you know—do you, really?" besought Pollyanna. "That sounded like it—only I don't know what you meant about the goat part. There aren't any goats there. I don't think they'd allow—"

"Goats nothin'!" scoffed the boy. "You bet yer sweet life I know where 'tis! Don't I tote Sir James up there to the Garden 'most every day? An' I'll take you, too. Jest ye hang out here till I get on ter my job again, an' sell out my stock. Then we'll make tracks for that 'ere avenue 'fore ye can say Jack Robinson."

"You mean you'll take me—home?" appealed Pollyanna, still plainly not quite understanding.

"Sure! It's a cinch—if you know the house."

"Oh' yes, I know the house," replied the literal Pollyanna anxiously, "but I don't know whether it's a—a cinch or not. If it isn't, can't you—" But the boy only threw her another disdainful glance and darted off into the thick of the crowd. A moment later Pollyanna heard his strident call of "Paper, paper! Herald, Globe—paper, sir?"

With a sigh of relief Pollyanna stepped back into a doorway and waited. She was tired, but she was happy. In spite of sundry puzzling aspects of the case she yet trusted the boy and she had perfect confidence that he could take her home.

"HULLO, KID; WHY THE WEEPS? WHAT'S UP?"

"He's nice, and I like him," she said to herself, following with her eyes the boy's alert, darting figure. "But he does talk funny. His words sound English, but some of them don't seem to make any sense with the rest of what he says. But then I'm glad he found me, anyway," she finished with a contented little sigh.

It was not long before the boy returned, his hands empty.

"Come on, kid. All aboard," he called cheerily. "Now we'll hit the trail for the avenue. If I was the real thing now I'd tote ye home in style in a buzz-wagon; but seein' as how I hain't got the dough, we'll have ter hoof it."

It was, for the most part, a silent walk. Pollyanna, for once in her life, was too tired to talk, even of the Ladies' Aiders, and the boy was intent on picking out the shortest way to his goal. When the Public Garden was reached Pollyanna did exclaim joyfully:

"Oh, now I'm 'most there! I remember this place. I had a perfectly lovely time here this afternoon. It's only a little bit of a ways home now."

"That's the stuff! Now we're gettin' there," crowed the boy. "What'd I tell ye? We'll just cut through here to the Avenue, an' then it'll be up ter you ter find the house."

"Oh, I can find the house," exulted Pollyanna, with all the confidence of one who has reached familiar ground.

It was quite dark when Pollyanna led the way up the broad Carew steps. The boy's ring at the bell was very quickly answered and Pollyanna found herself confronted not only by Mary, but by Mrs. Carew, Bridget and Jennie as well. All four of the women were white-faced and anxious-eyed.

"Child, child, where have you been?" demanded Mrs. Carew, hurrying forward.

"Why, I—I just went to walk," began Pollyanna, "and I got lost, and this boy—"

"Where did you find her?" cut in Mrs. Carew, turning imperiously to Pollyanna's escort, who was at the moment gazing in frank admiration at the wonders about him in the brilliantly lighted hall. "Where did you find her, boy?" she repeated sharply.

For a brief moment the boy met her gaze unflinchingly; then something very like a twinkle came into his eyes, though his voice, when he spoke, was gravity itself.

"Well, I found her round Bowdoin Square, but I reckon she'd been doin' the North End, only she couldn't catch on ter the lingo of the Dagos, so I don't think she give 'em the glad hand, ma'am."

"The North End—that child—alone! Pollyanna!" shuddered Mrs. Carew.

"Oh, I wasn't alone, Mrs. Carew," fended Pollyanna. "There were ever and ever so many people there, weren't there, boy?"

But the boy, with an impish grin, was disappearing through the door.

Pollyanna learned many things during the next half hour. She learned that nice little girls do not take long walks alone in unfamiliar cities, nor sit on park benches and talk to strangers. She learned also that it was only by a "perfectly marvelous miracle" that she had reached home at all that night and that she had escaped many, many very disagreeable consequences of her foolishness. She learned that Boston was not Beldingsville and that she must not think it was.

"But, Mrs. Carew," she finally argued despairingly, "I am here, and I didn't get lost for keeps. Seems as if I ought to be glad for that instead of thinking all the time of the things that might have happened."

"Yes, yes, child, I suppose so, I suppose so," sighed Mrs. Carew; "but you have given me such a fright, and I want you to be sure, sure, SURE never to do it again. Now, come, dear, you must be hungry."

It was just as she was dropping off to sleep that night that Pollyanna murmured drowsily:

"The thing I'm the very sorriest for of anything is that I didn't ask that boy his name nor where he lived. Now I can't ever say thank you to him!"

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

The Nation's Opportunity

TO THE pastors, officials, and lay men and women of all Christian churches:

A few days ago, at an editorial conference of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD staff, an officer of the company stated that a thoughtful friend had declared that the only thing which could stop the war would be the utterance of an inspired message by some inspired man. He wondered what man there might be in the world who would speak that God-given word. If Henry Ward Beecher were alive, he said, he might speak it. But what living man could be found to make the utterance?

The third day after this a member of the editorial staff was asking Frank Crane to write a Christmas message to the people of America. Here is the message. Is it not also that magic, longed-for word?

That depends upon what you yourself will do about it.

Before this page reaches you Dr. Crane will have had an interview with President Wilson and Secretary Bryan. They will know that you have been asked to express your wishes in this, the gravest crisis which the peoples of the world have ever faced.

If you believe in what Dr. Crane has written, if you wish President Wilson to do this thing that he urges, go to work at once. There is something you can do—every one of you. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will supply free of charge to every one who asks for it a copy of this message to the President with space for signatures. Every pastor is asked to present the petition to his congregation for signatures at his Sunday morning or evening service. But your pastor may not have happened to see this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Take your copy to him at once and show him this message (if you cannot find the pastor take it to some church official), and urge him in the name of the peace-loving Christ to present the petition to your congregation for signatures. You yourself can circulate a copy of the petition and get signatures on your own account.

Forward these petitions to the President as fast as they are signed. We will keep you supplied with fresh copies for new names. For every petition sent to the President send one also to your congressman and another to your senator, copying the names which appear on the sheet going to the President. We will supply you with all the copies you need. The President and Congress cannot refuse to act upon a demand like this expressed by the peace-loving, God-fearing men and women of America. The President will surely be willing if he knows that the people are behind him. Show him that you are behind him. Act now. Send for your petition, fill it with signatures, send it on and get another. Do not fail to notify us, stating how many names have gone in.

Act now. Act, everybody. Act—in the name of the Prince of Peace.

Just now we are God's chosen people. Chosen to show the way to peace. And YOU are the nation. Do not disappoint God.

Christ's Gift of Peace

CHRISTMAS gladness and Christmas peace! Can they come to us now, in spite of the anguish and turmoil of the peoples at war? Yes, they can. While God's peace is for states, and nations, and worlds, it is pre-eminently and first of all for individual hearts.

"Let the peace of God rule in your hearts," urged Paul. "Now the Lord of peace himself give you peace always by all means," he wrote again. "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you," said Jesus to the little group of disciples gathered wonderingly about him during the hours of that last sad night.

This would make it appear that no matter what outward conditions may be, nor how far peace may be from abiding there, it may come continuously in any believing heart that will welcome it. When we consider the surroundings of Jesus at the time he was speaking calmly of his peace and offering it to his companions, we see that everything about him would naturally have tended to consternation and dismay. A company of soldiers coming to arrest him; a friend ready to betray him; a city ready to be thrown into hostile turmoil against him; mockery, judgment and a cross awaiting him. Yet he spoke of his peace and offered to share it with his friends.

Just so he offers to share it with us now, and tomorrow, and next year, and forever. It is God's Christmas gift to the world, to us. The gift of heaven's peace brought to us by the Babe of Bethlehem, who grew to be the Carpenter of Nazareth and became the Saviour of the world.

We ought to grieve for the world's great woe. We ought to quit us like men in seeking to undo earth's wrongs and relieve its sorrows. But steadily in our own souls and our own homes radiantly in peace of Jesus. Make room in your heart for the peace that Jesus brings. Let him quiet your anxieties and relieve your soul's distresses. Let him shine in your life like the bright sun shine of Christmas over gleaming fields of snow. Make sure that you are added to that army on which the Lord is counting to win the world—the army of those in whose trusting hearts his peace is reigning.

The President's Message

IT IS a new rôle for a great nation to stand calm and unafraid at a time when "half the world is on fire," and when alarmists are sounding the note that is meant to rouse a peaceful people to prepare in hot haste for dangers that are far removed from us and which may never happen.

This is the attitude that is unequivocally set forth in the President's message, read in Congress on December 8, in which he deals with the question of our national defenses. He refuses to permit the administration to be stampeded into militarism, or to take such defensive measures as might be interpreted by other governments as having a sinister object.

It was not to be expected that a message of this character would meet with approval from those who have been actively disseminating rumors depreciating the value of our navy. "Let there be no misconception," says the President. "The country has been misinformed. We have not been negligent of national defense. We are not unmindful of the great responsibility resting upon us. We shall learn and profit by the lesson of every experience and every circumstance; and what is needed will be adequately done." A powerful navy we have always regarded as our proper and natural means of defense, and it has always been of defense that we have thought, never of aggression or of conquest. We need no large standing army, and it is not our purpose to turn the country into a vast military camp, as the European nations have done. With our citizen soldiery, our National Guard developed and strengthened and an efficient navy at our command, there is nothing in the present situation "to justify apprehension, or which should inspire us with any thought of hostility or cause us to make fearful preparation for trouble."

Such is, briefly, the language and manner in which the President meets the criticisms of the administration in the present crisis. It has been accused of being indifferent in a time of danger; of neglecting the nation's defenses and allowing the navy to sink into a condition of almost total inefficiency in all its branches. To these disturbing reports, which have been widely circulated, he opposes a firm, calm, dignified denial. The administration is abreast with the times, he says. Nothing is neglected or overlooked.

But the message carries with it a vision that reaches far beyond material questions. Consistent with the policy he has followed in previous communications to Congress, he keeps high moral principle clearly in view. "We are at peace with the whole world," he declares, and need dread no other nation while we remain "the champions of peace and accord." We owe it to mankind to set a nobler example than is to be found in the attitude of an armed, militant nation. We must be prepared, when the time comes, to render a greater service to Europe, as a nation at peace, than is possible of one ready for war. We should "exemplify the counsels of peace and amity." This is the ultimate attitude which he desires on our part toward other governments and peoples. Hence, his voice is for calmness and moderation.

The President's words convey reassurance and will inspire what is needed more than anything else—national moral courage to take up the rare rôle of a nation superior to fear and above the temptation to yield to panic at a time when an example is needed to save a world which seems to have lost its bearings.

It is the right time for such an example as he has set before us in this history-making message. Can this nation rise equal to the occasion? We believe that it can—and will.

A Notable Symposium

SELDOM has a series of contributions presenting the views of foremost Americans on a topic of vital interest appeared in our columns so well worth careful reading as that on the "Church and the Workingman," which will be concluded in an early issue. It is true, there is found a great diversity of views in these letters; yet all have gone to the mark in one essential conclusion: That the teachings of Christ can be applied with profit by the church to present-day problems and that this application should be practical and not theoretical. Even those writers who claim that the mission of the church is purely spiritual recognize the fact that Jesus himself put emphasis on the condition of labor in his day, and it assuredly has claims upon the church's recognition and sympathy now. Were he here today, what would he say to a church which confined itself largely to spiritual ministrations, while the multitudes were struggling with poverty and unemployment? The church must stand for what Jesus would have stood for—no more and no less. Then the common people will be drawn to it and closer relationship will follow when it is demonstrated that the church takes a real interest in the lives of men here as well as hereafter.

We are especially pleased with the candor with which our correspondents have written on this subject and with the unanimity with which they give voice to the conviction that the church must take up the workers' cause as its own, and deal with present-day problems with all the power and influence at its command. But there should also be a new spiritual stand taken by the workers themselves. The alliance must be mutual. Religion must be made to the worker the very essence of a man's life today; he must learn that by seeking first the kingdom of God he will find that all the influence of his new spiritual ally is to be brought to bear in his behalf, for justice here, while he is living and working and believing. While the world has made progress in many things, the teachings of Jesus and his whole attitude towards the burden-bearers are today as vital as when he uttered them nineteen centuries ago.

Civic Federation Meets

THE fifteenth annual meeting of the National Civic Federation, which was held in New York, brought together a number of prominent leaders in American life, listened to suggestive and constructive reports and addresses and closed with the passage of a number of important resolutions. Dr. Seth Low, president of the Federation, spoke particularly of the immigration problems which will be presented at the close of the European war. He said: "One would think that every man in Europe who can get to the United States would want to go, but on the other hand, after such an appalling destruction of life, there may be in the countries that are at war such a large opportunity for profitable employment that the motive for coming to America will be less strong than it was before. It is quite certain that in some of the warring countries, if not in all, the governments will make determined efforts to keep their men at home. There is some reason to fear that the nations will strive to keep at home the able-bodied and sound, but will be quite willing to facilitate the departure of the weak and dependent."

Such widely differing authorities as Professor Jeremiah W. Jenks, Samuel Gompers, Dr. David Starr Jordan, Franklin D. Roosevelt, August Belmont, William R. Willcox and George W. Perkins were given the platform.

The friction of trained minds is a strong stimulus to fresh and correct thinking. The American Civic Federation is doing a public service in bringing together these men and women of experience and facilitating their discussions. In this country of free thought and free speech we advance steadily toward the ideal national life by free expression of personal convictions. America's opportunity grows steadily greater to solve rightly some of the grave problems which have confronted civilization since its beginning.

Canaries Sing for Prize

THE Central Canary Breeders' Association had a meeting the other day, and there was a test of songsters for a prize. New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Milwaukee were represented. Four birds were entered for the test. Each cage was covered till it came time for the test, and on seeing the light the happy little creatures burst out into an ecstasy of song. The birds did not know they were in any competition for prizes; they were full of joy, and could not keep from singing. The Christian sings when he sees the light of Christ's love. Then it is not for the contests nor prizes of life; he sings because he is so full of love he cannot keep from singing. The child of God and the heir of heaven has a right to be full of sunshine and of song. "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." (John 15: 11.)

Storm Along Atlantic Coast

THE storm that started off the Virginia Capes on December 5 swept along the coasts of Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and all the way along the Eastern States, destroying hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property and seven precious lives. Rehoboth, Del., a summer resort, was all but wiped out at a loss of $175,000. Coney Island beach suffered a loss of $100,000; Seabright and Atlantic City, $200,000 each. There were many yachts overturned and sunk in the harbors, and shipping in most of the coast cities suffered damage. Rains are necessary. Lightning and winds are necessary to purify the atmosphere. The severe side of nature sends the storms of winter and her gentle mood the calm of summer. And we have such storms in the spiritual world, and must see to it that we have a refuge from them. "And there shall be a tabernacle for a place of refuge, and for a covert from the storm and from rain." (Isa. 4: 6.)

Receive Victoria Cross

TEN men of the British army have, since the European war began, received the decoration of the Victoria Cross, the most highly coveted military prize, given for unusual bravery in the face of the enemy. Three of the ten lost their lives by their daring. Some of the number have been awarded commissions as officers also. The highest decoration a soul can wear is the cross of Christ with "for valor" inscribed on it, involving a life lost in sacrifice for others. We have here expressed an appreciation of this honor: "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." (Gal. 6: 14.)

Death Penalty for Graft

WAN CHIH HSING, ex-prefect of Shuntienfu, the metropolitan district in which Peking is situated, has been executed by shooting because of bribery and corruption, for selling offices under him and accepting graft. Wan Chih Hsing held the military rank of lieutenant general. The case has caused great excitement in political circles in China, especially as the malefactor was a special personal friend of the president of the republic. Yuan Shi Kai sent to the family of the general informing them of his regret at having to fulfil the law to stamp out corruption, and of his intention to provide for the maintenance of his family. We of the West do not feel that the death penalty should be visited upon theft, but for centuries China has chopped off the heads of its people for stealing. What a deep disgrace, a fearful fall was that of the Chinese official, and yet there is not a nation on the earth, uncivilized or civilized, where there is not some official corruption, and in some nations it is open and notorious. We are happy to believe that the average officeholder is honest, is as true as steel, and pure as gold, and that he would scorn a bribe as he would a scorpion. If it were not so we should fear we had not made good use of our free government or our religion. The death penalty is pronounced upon sin. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." He who came to Bethlehem brought a pardon from the Judge to save us from the penalty. The prophet thus refers to this pardon: "And let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." (Isa. 55: 7.)

Second Seaport in Country

THERE are fifty deep-water ships in the harbor of Seattle loaded or to be loaded for foreign ports or the Atlantic seaports of the United States, making the voyage through the Panama Canal. The port of Puget Sound has for years been the second American port in the volume of the tonnage employed in its foreign traffic. It holds the position of the first American seaport in the proportion of tonnage under the American flag. During the year 1913 there cleared from Seattle in the foreign trade 3,058,504 tons, as compared with 14,370,619 from New York, and 2,766,775 from New Orleans. And the figures for 1914 will show a great increase for the Seattle port. It has a direct trade now, in spite of the war, with nearly every great country in the world but Germany and Austria. A majority of all the people of the world who are to eat, and wear, and have the conveniences of life live on the shores of the Pacific Ocean. Its trade will be the greatest on earth when the Far East becomes thoroughly civilized and Christianized, and it will create some ports on our west coast of greatness and importance which will take their places in the comparatively near future among the most populous and wealthy cities of the world, ancient or modern. Most of the great cities of the world have had their water communication. Joppa was the seaport for Jerusalem. From it Jonah set sail in a merchant vessel. "But Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord, and went down to Joppa; and he found a ship going to Tarshish." (Jonah 1: 3.)

CHRISTMAS SHIP JASON REACHES EUROPE

THE people of all parts of the country who took part in loading the Christmas ship with gifts for the war orphans of Europe will be glad to learn that the United States naval collier Jason bearing the presents has reached Plymouth, England, and then Genoa, Italy, and that the gifts will be distributed to the dear fatherless children in Belgium, France, Germany and Austria in ample time for Christmas. The gifts to the number of six million, it is said, were a gigantic benevolence, and the spirit of love back of them was divine. No tongue can tell the joy the darling little creatures will have at sight of the dolls, and balls, and tops, and other toys of infinite variety, and the useful articles as well, and at the thought that children and people over a wide sea were thinking of them in their sorrow, and planning a Christmas for them. And the children receiving the presents will not be more happy in receiving than the people and children of our land will be who sent the presents to them. The Jason was called a Christmas ship because it carried presents to be given in honor of Christ's birthday, an event which brought to earth all that heaven could give to it and at which the angels sang: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." (Luke 2: 14.)

Faith-Healing Colony Quarantined

A RELIGIOUS colony in a Western State, which does not believe in the use of medicine, but in the anointing of oil and prayer, has recently had a very unhappy experience. A case of smallpox appeared, and no vaccination or medical treatment of any kind was allowed. Such things the members said would displease God, and discredit their own faith. The result of their fallacy was that no patient was cured, and thirty-two cases of smallpox threatened the decimation of the colony, and the spread of the foul pest to neighboring communities. The authorities, against the persistent protest of the colony, formed a quarantine for the community and compelled sanitary regulations. Christ cured the sick without the use of physical remedies; by divine authority his apostles and disciples sometimes did the same; his believers in modern times doubtless have seen physical healing in answer to earnest united faith without the discovery of any secondary causes; but a majority of the diseases are affected by material remedies, either with or without Christian faith. Such healing does not discredit faith, nor God who has made these curative forces of nature for man's benefit, and has led his children to discover their secret properties. Hezekiah was dangerously ill. He was restored by agonizing prayer, but a human remedy was employed by the divine command. There is no remedy much better for a carbuncle than a poultice of figs, and this was used: "And Isaiah said, take a lump of figs. And they took and laid it on the boil, and he recovered." (II Kings 20: 7.)

Putting Gravity to Work

THE story of material progress is that of harnessing up the laws and forces of nature and fastening them to the burdens necessary to be carried or work to be done. Fire, water, light, electricity, gravity have all had the harness put upon them and been compelled to bear so many of the burdens of the world. Gravity is an old force that was long utilized before men knew what it was, in catching the sweep of the rivers to transport their crafts, and make them turn the wheels to grind grain. Gravity in pulling the waters over falls and down the valleys to the sea is now used to manufacture the electric current, the latest of our lighting and motor forces. The latest practical use of gravity is in the moving of goods in manufacturing establishments. Goods are dropped down from the top floor by chutes to the next till they reach the bottom. Some new buildings are in contemplation for the use of gravity, which is the cheapest motor force in the world, costing almost nothing. The raw material is to be delivered to the top floor, and the first process of manufacture carried on there. It is conveyed by chutes to the next lower story, where the work on it can be continued, and so on to the ground floor, where the finishing can be done, and the completed product packed for shipment. Besides straight chutes, there are spiral gravity conveyors that will bring all kinds of finished goods in stores or unfinished parts in factories from one story down to any one below as desired. The plan is expected to save much time and money. The subtle forces of nature so utilized by man now as never before are types of the subtle forces in the spiritual realm so practically employed by millions of Christian men and women; such forces as the light of truth, the water of life, the flame of love, the magnetism of mercy, and the gravitation of the cross. The pull of the earth on objects, which we call gravity, suggests the drawing power of Christ's love as thus expressed by himself: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." (John 12: 32.)

The Christmas Message in War Time

A Sermon By Rev. F. B. Meyer B.A.

Text: Isaiah: IX: VI

"For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon His shoulder."

WHAT message shall we give for this Christmastide, which over great tracts of Europe threatens to be the saddest for many years? May we not go further and say for a century! Fields without crops, houses without inhabitants, churches without worshipers, families without husband, father, or son! Where are the angel-choristers? Do they hang their harps upon the boughs of the Tree of Life, and cover their faces to hide their despair?

No, not so! Beneath the turmoil and hubbub of war, which sends its tremors, though not its bloodshed, right round the world, the Christian ear may still detect the sweet music of the song that broke over the fields where shepherds kept their flocks the night when our Lord was born. Still the message for Christmas is contained in Isiah's great Messianic prophecy.

The very introduction of the passage suggests that it emanated from a time of gloom and anguish, of darkness and the shadow of death. "They shall look unto the earth, and behold, distress and darkness, the gloom of anguish, and thick darkness." But the prophet goes on to predict that amid all these conditions, there would be the clear shining of hope: "For there shall be no gloom for her that was in anguish. In the former time he brought into contempt the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali; but in the latter time he hath made it glorious." When we deal with God we must distinguish between appearances that sweep through this world of illusion, and these eternal facts which are as steadfast and enduring as the azure blue of heaven, as contrasted with the clouds which drift angrily and heavily across the sky.

Bringing Strength and Comfort

WE will suppose that a respectable family has become much reduced in its circumstances; the mother finds it difficult to make the meager provision suffice for her hungry little ones; their clothes get more ragged; the father's threadbare coat makes it less and less possible for him to obtain the situation which his qualifications deserve. But a child is born into that home, quite unlike the rest of the children—beautiful in feature, quick in intelligence, winsome, gifted, spiritual. As he grows up he manifests unusual powers, rapidly distances his compeers, passes from the elementary school to the college, and thence to the university. Presently tidings begin to come back of his success, his growing fame, his prizes, the assured certainty of his becoming a great man; and as they arrive in letter, and rumor, and newspaper, the mother's eye gets brighter; the father no longer evades the associates of earlier days; the home becomes better furnished and the table better spread; the other children are better clothed and educated and put forward in life, and the one glad explanation of it all is found in the words, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given." And as the years go on, whilst money pours in, on the one hand, to the successful student, it will find its way increasingly to the family in the old home; and each member of it will reap the benefit of association with its child and son, all that is needed being to prove a distinct need, and to put in an appropriate claim. What a mine of wealth would be opened up by the counsel, strength, resources, influence, and position of that beloved and trusted son and brother!

This will illustrate the prophet's thought. As the oppressed Jews, groaning in their brick-kilns, were glad for Moses given to lead them forth from the house of bondage; as England, travailing under the cruel exactions of the Danes, was glad for the great Alfred; as the Netherlands were glad when William the Silent arose to arrest the bloodthirsty rule of Alva; as Italy was glad when her Victor Emmanuel overthrew the dark misrule of the Papacy, so may we be glad because God has given himself to us in Jesus.

Are you needing guidance amid the tortuous perplexities of this mortal life? Unite yourself with him who was born of Mary, and you will become immediately aware of the entrance to your soul of the mysterious light which the presence of Jesus brings with it. He is Counselor. Dark things become illumined. Problems that had baffled yield their secret. You find a clue to the maze, stepping-stones across the brook, the chalk-stones along the road. "I," said our Lord, "am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." Let your eye be single towards him, and your whole body will become full of light. Reckon that his Spirit is in and with you; then act to the best of your judgment; watch the corroborating drift of circumstances; take the judgment of two or three impartial friends; and when you have acted for the best, so far as you can discern it, dare to believe that you were directed aright, and that any other path would have been impracticable.

The Prince of Peace

ARE you in need of strength? Reverently and believingly turn to Christ, and claim from him the power of the Eternal. You touch infinite resources in Jesus. He is the mighty God. The more weak and helpless you are, the more certainly you may put in your claim. "He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might he increaseth strength." Paul went so far as to say that he preferred the weakness induced by the thorn in the flesh, so that there might be an added argument for the power of Christ to rest upon him. You will not feel the power until you begin to use it. Dare to believe that Jesus will not fail, and as you begin to speak or act, you will become aware that he is all-sufficient.

Are you lonely and sad, because of the inevitable changes which time has brought with it? The dear forms that gathered with you in your home-circle are missing. The sweet voices which comforted and soothed you in hours of petulance and foreboding are hushed. You think that there is no balm in Gilead, and no physician that can assuage your inward hurt! You are mistaken! Jesus is the Father of the Ages. "In him God made the ages," as the majestic opening words of the Epistle to the Hebrews informs us.

Are you restless and tossed with tempest and not comforted? Jesus is the Prince of Peace. He is in your heart, as formerly in the boat on the lake. Ask him to arise and bid the storm cease. He is able to control your circumstances that threaten to engulf you. He sits as King above the floods, though they lift up their voice on high. Dare to believe that he will interfere; and calm yourself. "Hope thou in him, for thou shalt yet praise him." Yes, and he is the Prince of the kings of the earth. He is overruling war to bring war to an end. The peace we long for will never come merely by crushing the enemy. It must be founded on mutual respect and good understanding. And this can only be attained through the diffusion of the Spirit of Jesus. Let us pray that that authoritative Voice will soon be heard! "He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder, and burneth the war-chariot in the fire."

When such a peace, founded on righteousness and cemented by mutual respect and good will, is brought about, and when the thousand years of peace have commenced their beneficent reign, then again Isaiah's anticipations will be realized. Then they will joy according to the joy of harvest, as men rejoice when they divide the spoil. For the yoke of the war-lord and the staff of military depotism will be broken as in the day of Midian.

It is the harvest time, and the long patience of the husbandman has met with its reward. The fields are cleared of their precious spoils; the last of the sheaves, goldened by the glorious sunshine, has been carried to the barn, and throughout the countryside there is the joy of completed labors, fulfilled hopes, and plentiful provision against days to come. "They joy before Thee according to the joy of harvest!"

The scene is changed. It is the close of that great struggle for freedom in which Gideon led his people against the hosts of Midian, which, like locusts, devoured the land. Bitter indeed had been the years of bondage, during which crops had been confiscated, homes pillaged, and thousands killed or enslaved. The exultation was, therefore, the more jubilant when the youngest son of Joash the Abiezrite, with his three hundred Ironsides, inaugurated a tide of victory, which rose and gathered force till Midian was driven over the frontier, suffering a defeat which paralyzed the nation for a century. Ah! what joy there was throughout the land! "Thou hast broken the yoke of his burden, and the staff of his shoulder, the rod of his oppressor, as in the day of Midian."

Again the scene is changed, and the prophetic vision beholds that blessed hour when war itself shall die, after which the bugle will never again summon embattled hosts to meet in conflict, and the grass will never again be dyed with the rich blood of men, and nations shall never again be proud of victories won at the awful cost of their noblest sons. What a day that will be when museums shall be erected to preserve as curiosities the implements and accoutrements of war! The children of the New Era, which is soon to break, will find it hard to believe that men should ever have forged them to prey on the innocent and weak, or even on foemen of equal prowess. Then from vale to mountain peak, from river bank to ocean shore, shall ring out a note of joy so high, so resonant, that the very stars shall tremble in their silver spheres: "Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!"

The Government Upon His Shoulder

THERE is, obviously, the personal aspect of all this. The laws that rule in the outer operate in the inner kingdom. Obviously, the majority of men will have to acknowledge the supremacy of our Lord before the world can participate in the results of his reign. And it is so in the soul. We must put the government where God the Father has placed it, on the shoulders of Jesus. It is there by right; but it must be there also by our choice and consent. When these conditions are conceded, there is no limit to our appropriation of the fulness of God, which dwells in him bodily. All of God lies open to him who will be all for God. Nor is it such a dreadful thing to resign the government of the life to Jesus. Napoleon, standing amid the ambassadors of Europe, reassured the entire continent by the utterance of his New Year's motto, "The empire is peace." But with far greater truth may we apply the words to Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace, whose rule over the soul is the synonym of peace unspeakable and full of glory. And as his government spreads further and further over the soul, with its growing area there is growing peace, until they shall both become complete to all the heights, and depths, and breadths of blessedness. Of the increase of his government, and of our peace, there is no end.

This may seem shadowy and far away; difficult, if not impossible, to realize in our life. But we may take comfort in the assurance that the zeal of the Lord of Hosts will perform what we cannot accomplish. There is grace enough in him, and patience, and strength. He will not fail nor be discouraged. Hand over the entire matter to him; leave yourself in his hands; accept what he sends; do what he bids; and you will drink deep draughts of that joy which the prophet glowingly describes.

Because, then, of what Christmas means in its deepest significance, let us arouse ourselves, as cherishing a hope that cannot be ashamed, to give to others a joy which dwells in our own heart, and wells up there like springs of fresh water from the briny depths!

Dr. Meyer, who is well known in both continents, is pastor emeritus of Regent's Park Chapel, London (Presbyterian).

DAILY MEDITATIONS

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, December 27. John 8: 49, 50. "I have not a devil; but I honor my Father, and ye do dishonor me. And I seek not mine own glory; there is one that seeketh and judgeth." This is the patient rejoinder to a very offensive remark which the Jews had just hurled at Christ. They had declared that he must be demon-possessed and a low-bred person—an alien from the elect race, like the despised Samaritans—to speak to them as he had just done. Without bitterness he pushes the opprobrious terms aside as one pushes aside a noisome insect, and reminds them that the very words he had just spoken to them, just as everything else he has been doing, were for the glory of God. When the Son of God came among the sons of men, angel choirs over Bethlehem's plains announced his entrance and declared his mission to be a glory-mission. What Christ said to men, and about various characters and classes of men, all bore the stamp of heavenly truth and fairness. Christ is not greatly concerned about the personal affront he had just suffered from the Jews. Men may asperse his fair name and seek to becloud his fame by the vilest calumnies; it will not hurt him, but only increase their responsibility. His name and fame and the success of his entire work are in the hands of the Father, who has declared that all should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father. With him all the revilers of Christ will have to settle their accounts. Conscious innocence and loving forbearance are still speaking to the world from this text. May all whom it concerns heed these words.

MONDAY, December 28. John 8: 51. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." The taunt with which the Jews had met the Lord's teaching, and the meek way in which he received it, might have caused his followers to falter in their faith in him. For this reason the Lord follows up his patient remark in the preceding text with the solemn assurance now before us. And from this assurance he does not exclude even his present opponents. Instead of being offended at his words, let men guard them as a precious treasure; for his words are the panacea for every ill in this life and the antidote against the last and most terrible effect of sin, death. Death in its profoundest sense shall not touch any person who clasps the words of Jesus to his believing heart. Aged Simeon, with the infant Jesus in his arms, spoke joyously of his impending departure in peace. Death had no terrors for him. Its gloomy portals he beheld opening to admit him to rest and peace and joy unspeakable. He knew that, with the promise and pardon of the Gentiles' Light and Israel's glory in his believing heart, the coming agony of his dying hour would be but the last gasp of earthly misery, and after that life, blessed life, life in its fullest, noblest, grandest meaning, would be his for evermore! To die thus does not deserve to be called dying. O precious promise of my Jesus, that takes the venomous sting out of mortal pang! O lordly message of my Prince of Life, let me grasp and hold thee as a priceless jewel of divine grace, that I may make bold to despise death, because thou teachest me that dying I shall live!

TUESDAY, December 29. John 8: 54, 55. "If I honor myself, my honor is nothing: it is my Father that honoreth me; of whom ye say, that he is your God: yet ye have not known him; but I know him; and if I should say, I know him not, I shall be a liar like unto you: but I know him, and keep his saying." The Lord's promise to such as keep his word, that they shall be immune from death, has staggered the Jews. They consider it a vainglorious assertion for a man—that is what they held Christ to be—to speak thus. Greater men—in their estimation—than this Jesus had arisen among them, notably their father Abraham and Moses, David, Isaiah. All these had died. Did they not have the Word of God? It was intolerable conceit and a reckless attempt to deceive the people for this Jesus to utter such an impossible promise. The Lord's reply is a calm reassertion of his wonderful relation to the Father whom the Jews pretended to worship as their God. He knows that in what he has said to them there is not one extravagant word; it is all truth and fact, and the Father will verify every syllable of what he has said. The world shall behold the strange spectacle of men facing the ordeal of death unflinchingly and dying rejoicing, for Jesus' sake. Jesus will be honored in all zones and climes by the death of his saints. Thus our Lord refuses to permit the objection of these Jews to disturb his consciousness of the fact that the Father is with him and he with the Father. Yea, he declares that he would fail of executing his mission to them, if he should withhold from them the statement he has just made about the believers not seeing death.

WEDNESDAY, December 30. John 8: 56. "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad." Abraham's greatest distinction was not what the Jews in the days of Christ imagined it to be, his legalism and work-righteousness, but his unwavering faith in the promise made to him that from his race should spring One in whom he would be blessed and who would prove a blessing to all the nations of the earth. Against all physical odds, Abraham clung to his future seed, and staggered not at the word of God through unbelief. It was this faith in the coming Christ that was counted to him for righteousness. In anticipation of the days when the Son of God incarnate would walk among men, teaching them how to obtain from his work that righteousness which avails before God, Abraham rejoiced and exulted with an exceedingly great joy. In prophetic vision he saw in advance the glory of Christ's ministry. That was to him a theme of absorbing interest. He had, with the saints of old, anticipated the joy of Christmastide, the adorable "mystery of godliness: God manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." Thus did Abraham; let his children go and do likewise.

Ye seed of Israel's chosen race,
Ye ransomed from the fall,
Hail him who saves you by his grace,
And crown him Lord of all!
Hail him, ye heirs of David's line,
Whom David Lord did call:
The God incarnate, Man divine:
And crown him Lord of all!

THURSDAY, December 31. John 8: 58. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am." This is the majestic utterance with which our Lord closes this conversation. The Jews had understood his remark that Abraham had seen his day to mean that Jesus claimed to have lived at the time of Abraham. Declining to enter upon a minute refutation of this puerile notion, Jesus answers the Jews' question: "Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?" by declaring his eternal existence. In his human state, Jesus had a beginning in time. We date our years from his coming into the world. We close tonight the 1914th, and begin this midnight the 1915th year after his birth. But as a personality, Jesus existed before he became man. He does not say: "Before Abraham was, I was," but: "I am." He always is, is, is, never was, nor will be. He is the eternal God, coequal in existence, power, and majesty with the Father and the Holy Ghost. During his brief sojourn on earth, there were changes in his personal aspects; but Jesus himself never changed. The Jesus whose mercy lifted up contrite Adam and Eve in paradise is the Jesus in whose redeeming love Abraham exulted, David rejoiced, Isaiah beheld the whole world comforted. The Jesus who dispensed heavenly truth and unnumbered deeds of kindness to the men of his generation, is the Jesus to whom our faith looks up, suppliantly and trustingly, from out of the changeful scenes of this fleeting life. He is the Rock of Ages, "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, today, and forever." Sheltered beneath the wings of his everlasting mercy, we lift to the eternal Christ our evensong in the gloaming of this waning year:

Swift to its close ebbs out life's little day;
Earth's joys grow dim, its glories pass away;
Change and decay in all around I see:
O Thou who changest not, abide with me!

Beginning the Meditations for 1915

FRIDAY, January 1, 1915. John 15: 15. "Henceforth I call you not servants; . . . but I have called you friends." Friendship is one of life's sweetest words. There is sometimes an uncertainty as to what love means, but about friendship there is no doubt. When love is interpreted in terms of friendship it becomes clearer and simpler. Even those sad souls who believe themselves friendless have a longing for friendship and know what it means to have a friend. That is Christ's dearest wish—to be the friend of every one. He is the great World-Friend. He knows that his friendship will brighten life's skies and lighten life's burdens and give strength for life's battles. Many a problem that is distressing and almost baffling when we are thinking of Christ as our Master becomes suddenly simple when we begin to think of him as our Friend. What would we do for our best friend if he were in our position? How should we endeavor to help him if he were in our distress? That is the thing Jesus will do for us. How should we equip our friend for his hard task if our resources were unlimited? That is the way Christ will fit us for the tasks that this year holds. Only his care for us is infinitely greater than ours could ever be for any friend, and he is "able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask of him." Abraham was called "the friend of God." Moses talked face to face with Jehovah, "as a man talketh with his friend." Jesus said to his disciples: "Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends." What shall we be to him this year—servant or friend? He has declared his own preference. Shall we accept his invitation and walk through the year hand in hand with him, our matchless Friend?—Arthur Hoag Howland.

SATURDAY, January 2, 1915. Matthew 5: 41. "And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain." What must I do is the language of the first mile; what may I do, of the second. The first is narrow; the second an infinite ideal. The first is the letter; the second is the spirit. The first is justice; the second, grace. There is no end to the second mile. The first mile of duty is a good beginning; the second mile of self-sacrifice is gilded all the way. Faith is the first mile; works, the second, for faith must walk on two feet. John the Baptist was the preparatory mile; Jesus, the eternal journey. The strait gate is the first mile; the highway of holiness, the everlasting second mile. The Golden Rule is the first mile; the rule of Christ—"Love one another as I have loved you"—the second mile. The Pharisee went the first mile, measured it and stopped. The publican and prodigal went all the way. When a man compels you to go with him a mile and you willingly consent to go the two miles, he will come back with you. You have won him, and for yourself have changed duty into beauty, drudgery into delight.—Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell.

Daily Meditations will appear in each issue during 1915. Dr. J. H. Jowett contributing the Sunday thoughts; Rev. Edwin W. Caswell, Dr. F. B. Meyer and Professor Clayton Sedgwick Cooper the thoughts for the remainder of each week.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

[illegible] ADMIRAL [illegible]

[illegible] is one of the most important of Russia's industrial [illegible] the Germans have kept up a sustained advance in the east-ward with their army of the centre, and are now, on December 11, within a few miles of Warsaw.

Judging from the latest wireless from Petrograd, it may be the Russian intention to withdraw [illegible] for what are stated to be strategic reasons, and to allow it to fall into German possession. During this advance in the centre the Germans are said to have captured a very large number of prisoners and a large quantity of materials of war.

While this invasion was taking place in the centre, another German army was moving against the Russians on the north bank of the Vistula, starting from Mlawa and reaching Pultusk at the end of the week, the Russians retreating before it. Once before, Warsaw was near capture but escaped at the very last moment by a Russian rally, and history may repeat itself.

In the south, between Czenstochowa and Cracow, there has been hard fighting nearly all the week between the Austrians and the Russians. There are reports that these latter are besieging Cracow, but the evidence in support of this contention is not very strong. In the rest of Galicia the situation remains much the same as it was last week. The unpronounceable Przemysl is still holding out.

The project to have suspension of hostilities on Christmas Day has been agreed to by Germany. It is to be hoped that the other combatants will also adhere to this plan, as the idea of having a day of peace on Christmas Day is a very pretty one.

PROMINENCE has been given in the news of late to the alleged shipment from this country of large quantities of munitions of war. The exact nature of such activity is not yet known, and its effect upon the neutrality of the United States is under discussion. When Charles M. Schwab returned to this country from England a short time ago it was stated that he had news of moment which he was not at liberty to divulge. It now seems that this had to do with a contract with the British Government for the construction of twenty-seven submarines for use in the war. But the delivery of these submarines when completed will be postponed in deference to the urgent wish of the President and the Secretary of State, there seeming to be no room to doubt that a seven-million-dollar contract of this character, fulfilled, would be a real violation of our neutrality.

PROTECTED CRUISER LEIPZIG

ARMORED CRUISER GNEISENAU

ON December 8 the Governing Board of the Pan-American Union met in Washington and unanimously adopted a resolution offered by Argentina, which is intended to effect a neutral zone in the waters of this hemisphere which will be compulsory upon the nations now at war in Europe. The resolution calls for the creation of a commission which shall investigate the conditions and submit a plan to the Governing Board. Secretary of State Bryan, who is chairman of the board, presided, and every Latin-American nation, excepting Mexico, was represented by its diplomatic representative in Washington. It is even suggested that the neutral zone extend to midway in the Atlantic and Pacific between the Americas and the rest of the world. The project is looked upon as of great importance.

GERMAN ADMIRAL VON SPEE

A NEWS despatch from Paris states that the cases brought to the military hospitals requiring operations under anesthetics give remarkable proof that the practically enforced total abstinence from the use of alcohol on the part of the soldiers enables the men to recover from anesthesia, over-indulgence in alcohol being known to react against anesthetics.

JOHN E. REDMOND, the Irish nationalist leader, states that official statistics show that on November 30, 89,000 Irishmen were with the regular forces, and that enough more had recruited since the war began to bring the total serving the Crown at the front to 140,000. Mr. Redmond claimed that this was but a beginning of Irish participation in the war.

A news despatch attributed to Petrograd states that the Russian minister of finance estimates the cost of the war to Russia up to November 13, at approximately $892,500,000.

NEW CONTRIBUTIONS FOR THE RELIEF OF WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF THE WAR

THERE is no let-up, nor will there be, to the fearful need that exists in Belgium and other parts of Europe, due to the war and the season of winter on the [illegible] unabated necessitate that no [illegible] any at all to our [illegible] be the stream of generous gifts flowing from America to relieve this [illegible] misery. Perhaps the most gratifying [illegible] we could make of space in our Christmas issue would be to print page after page of acknowledgments of your gifts that are steadily coming in and increasing; but it has seemed best to do otherwise, and so excepting the less acknowledgments printed below we can hold the lists until next week, when we shall again give more space to this [illegible] acknowledgment of gifts that we know so many [illegible] and sympathize.

The latest cablegram received from Dr. Barrows outlined that he had [illegible] his mission and would sail for America next with his reports and with a collection of wonderful [illegible] taken by our special photographer, Mr. Karl Harrison, [illegible] us in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Communication with him has been interrupted by causes unknown to us, so that at the time of going to press we are unable to say more than that we hope to [illegible] ourself right amid the scenes of suffering. We are looking forward, however, to having some [illegible] of great interest to publish next week. Interviews with Mr. Barrows [illegible] to the press of America and those [illegible] what he had already written to our readers.

Winter is now in full sway in Europe. A bitter Christmas will be [illegible] by bitter hearts of the gifts you have sent. The New Year will be braver and more hopeful because of the generosity which we know you will continue to show for these unfortunates of the earth. Please address all remittances for the widows and orphans of the war to the Widows and Orphans' Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

HOLIDAY GREETING

On the threshold of a New Year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD brings greetings to its friends everywhere, and to all good people, near and far, who love the cause it represents. May the coming year be one rich in blessing to our beloved Family Circle. May it restore Peace to the world and bring the Nations back to God, the Bestower of all good Gifts. And may it be a year full of Health, Happiness and Prosperity to all who have sat down with us in the past, and also to the new members of our Circle, to whom we now extend a hearty welcome.

Your Year of Loyal Service

What have you done for Christ and humanity in the year [illegible] closing? Your work has not been small. You have given over $80,000 for the widows and orphans [illegible] distribution by relief committees in Belgium, Holland, France, Austria, Germany, Servia, [illegible] relief and orphan work in the Balkans. You have contributed over $20,000 for the supp[illegible] in China, and you have maintained hundreds of other orphans in India and Japan. [illegible] of missionaries in distant fields of service by your gifts, which you have scattered from [illegible] America to Japan. You have maintained a small army of missionaries, native and white, as your [illegible]

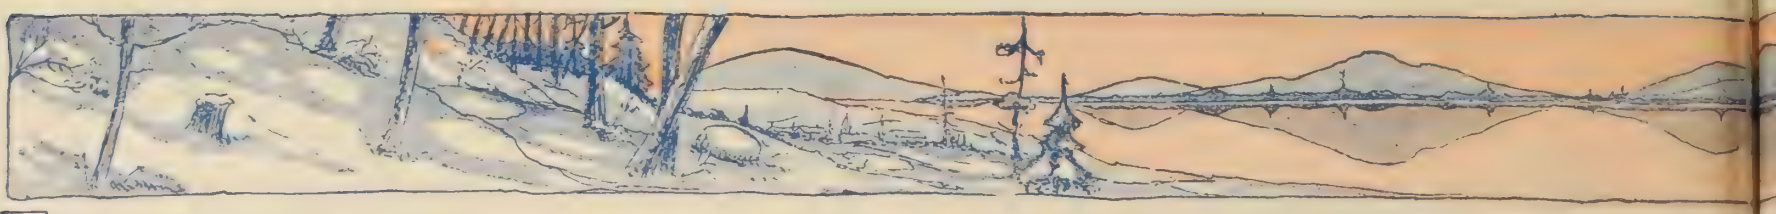
Nor can we omit to recall the fact that you have done an infinite amount of loving, generous labor in a great variety of good causes at home, never forgetting the need at our own door. You have given over 2,000 tenement children a summer outing at Mont-Lawn, the beautiful charity which your generosity founded. You have supplied 148,000 midnight breakfasts to the men of the Bowery Mission "Bread Line," and you have sheltered over 20,000 homeless and friendless in lodging houses. You held up the hands of our Army and Navy Chaplains during the Mexican trouble and helped to clothe and comfort hundreds of refugees on our Southern border. All these and many other good, worthy objects have felt the impulse of your gifts and prayers. You have fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and given the Gospel to multitudes.

Did you remember these things? Possibly not; but we could not forget them, and we thank God that the old CHRISTIAN HERALD has again been made, as in the past, the chosen channel of your beneficence and of your good deeds, done for His dear Son's sake.

And now we sound the note for further service. The New Year will bring new duties, greater opportunities. Let us gird ourselves to meet them, and in the months to come, God willing, we shall do valiantly in His name and for His glory.

A Call to the Colors

Here in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices we never lose sight of the fact that our readers constitute a great body of Christians. We know that you are scattered not only over the continent, but throughout the churches of Christ. You are really an organization doing great things for Christ and His Church and for mankind, with practically none of the visible machinery of an organization; your subscription payments are in effect annual dues, for they enable us to maintain the paper through which you act. We believe that it lies within your power, humanly speaking, to bring about a tremendous revival of spirituality and zeal throughout the entire Christian Church. The year 1915 is going to witness the most violent attacks upon the Church of Christ which it has ever yet withstood. The war in Europe among Christian nations will give a host of able thinkers the opportunity to launch against the Church a furious bombardment of denunciation and ridicule. Every wavering soul and every actual enemy of righteousness will be swift to array themselves behind such leaders. It will be a time for every humblest Christian as well as for every leader in the cause of Christ to rally to the colors of our Lord and King, to put on the whole armor of righteousness, lay hold of the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, and in the power of a pure and blameless life to overthrow the enemies of the Prince of Peace within and without the Church and emerge from the conflict a united body of believers, strengthened in faith, purified in spirit, valiant for God. Will you do your part in this crusade if THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does its part? Your part is first of all to fulfil your Christian duty right where you are. Our part is to gather from you and in other ways all possible information on the state of the Church everywhere, and to publish a paper throughout 1915 that will ring with truth and cheer and newsiness and helpfulness.



The Voice of the Preacher

Our aim in the New Year is to make THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Pulpit a positive force in the individual life. In the past the greatest preachers of the day have spoken from this pulpit to hundreds of thousands. They will continue to do so through 1915, bringing fresh messages upon the new problems that confront the individual, the church and the nation. You will have in these pages in 1915 the best sermons from such leaders in religious thought as Jowett, Parkhurst, Quayle, Burrell, Chapman, Steffens, Wagner, Simpson, Eaton. Besides these and other famous preachers, some new voices will be heard, ministers well and highly known in their respective denominations for their stirring messages, but whose voices are still to reach the Church at large. We believe our Sermonic Department in 1915 will be on a higher plane of helpfulness and power than ever before.

You and Your Soul

The strong personalities in the religious life have been those who have given time, even at high cost, to serious meditation upon the Scriptures. And those families are the happiest and the most useful in the church and community, we believe, which devote some period in the day to worship. Make use of this secret of power and join the company of those who put the spiritual life first! If we may use a pertinent phrase of the day, get the meditation habit and sit down each day of the new year to consider for a little while the Bible thoughts contributed out of the riches of experience by Dr. J. H. Jowett, America's foremost pastor; Rev. F. B. Meyer, Professor Clayton Sedgwick Cooper and Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell. These four delightful writers will carry on the Daily Meditations in 1915, which were conducted with such great thought and reverence by Professor W. H. T. Dau in 1914.

Uplifting the Sunday School

There is no mistaking the trend toward [illegible] Sunday School workers. Sunday School workers [illegible] demand better methods in [illegible] in school management. The Sunday [illegible] religious organization [illegible] proportionately effective in the life of the Church. No one better appreciates the [illegible] that lie in the Sunday School than does THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We are looking out for the best ways and means to make our Sunday School page helpful in every line to our readers. In 1915 the International Lessons and Sunday School routine will be handled by Dr. F. B. Meyer, Frank L. Brown (General Secretary of the World's Sunday School Association), Dr. Franklin E. Hoskins, Amos R. Wells, Edwin Whittier Caswell, Arthur H. Howland, Dr. and Mrs. W. F. Crafts and others. This page will help every worker fortunate enough to receive it weekly.

"I Am Praying for You"

Wouldn't that be a comforting message received in a time of trial from five thousand Christian men and women? The present enrolled membership of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League outnumbers that by far, and it is evident from the stream of letters received that there are few absentees from this week-long prayer meeting. Specific testimonies to answered prayer flow in upon us. The membership freely presents its many needs for the prayers of the League. New names are added daily to this continent-wide prayer circle and we believe the department devoted to this purpose is doing a vast amount of good. Why not share in this good? Why not contribute to it? The day of prayer for peace in Europe evoked an avalanche of letters to the press, particularly to one New York newspaper, reflecting a troubled attitude on the part of the public as to the efficacy of prayer. Perhaps it rests with us to prove to the world that faith is not dead.

Work That Helps

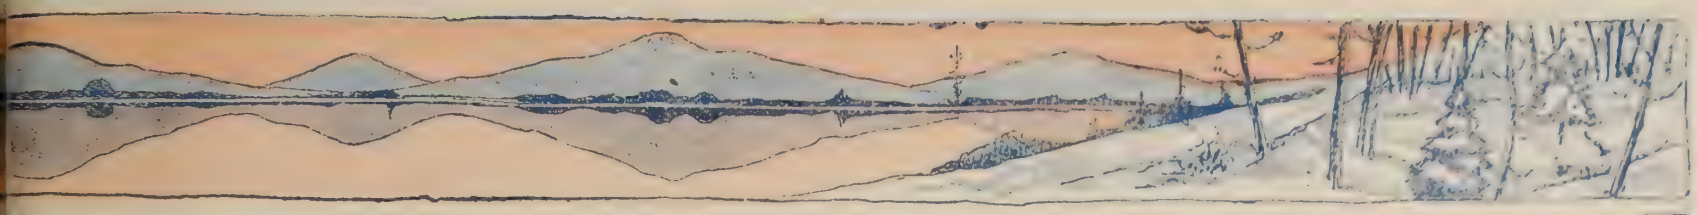
It seems to be a fact that everybody is doing something for somebody else today. Which is an encouraging fact. It is more encouraging when we realize how well organized and widely needed is some of this help. It is downright cheering when we come to understand what some of these organized movements have accomplished in changing the conditions of the poor, in improving the chances of boys and girls to become able men and women, in checking the encroachment of disease upon the human race, in sweetening and strengthening and elevating life in many directions. The stories of many of these welfare movements read like romances, but they are rock-bottom truths—and some of the truths make startling reading. We are going to tell several of these stimulating stories in the coming weeks.

The World's Greatest Asset

What would you say was the most important domain of the United States? Its water resources constitute one domain, its land another, its food animals another, etc. This coming year we are hoping to give our readers some attractive and informative articles dealing with what is really the most important domain under the Stars and Stripes: childhood. (By the way, much of the contents of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD makes enjoyable reading for the average boy or girl. If there is a boy or girl over twelve years of age who cannot richly appreciate "The Return of Pollyanna," for example, we shall be glad to take his or her case in hand and find out what is the matter). We are looking forward to giving you a great deal of satisfaction in these childhood articles.

Why You Should Go to Prison

We do not want you to tell us—we propose to tell you. And in telling you we shall publish one of the most gripping autobiographies of an ex-convict that has yet appeared. The story was taken down word for word in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office. It proves anew that the prisons of America are still unexplored regions. It is a genuine story and the telling of it is a public duty. And when you read it, and when you understand what the after-effects have been of this man's confinement and his conversion while in prison to the Christian life, you will have the answer why you should go to prison. "I was sick," said One, "and in prison, and ye visited me." The prison reform movement, which is now gaining impetus throughout the country and presents some striking developments, will find a place in our series upon the great welfare movements of the day.



The War in Europe

The war in Europe will be a topic of first importance for years to come. At present the actual warfare holds attention. Then will come the great moment of peace and the epoch-making terms upon which peace shall be arranged; then the readjustment of world affairs to altered world conditions. There are able analysts of events who believe the war will end and this readjustment begin in 1915. We shall keep our readers closely posted on the progress of events. Mr. Anthony Arnoux, a staff writer for European journals and an authority in military affairs, will continue to review the events upon the field of war with the unbiased mind of an American critic, so that our readers will receive the facts so far as they are received in the despatches. Profound changes which the war will effect in the world will be discussed by men eminent for sound judgment and broad knowledge of world interests.

Let Us Have Peace

If we asked "What is the best thing that could happen?" would you reply, "Telegrams exchanged among the warring powers reading 'let us have peace'"? You know there is a difference of opinion as to the probability of a world of peace and as to its permanency after once begun. You cannot fail to receive enjoyment and profit from a careful perusal of the symposium which we shall publish upon this subject, to which leading thinkers on both sides of the question will contribute. We shall also describe the things that were done to signalize the completion, December 24, 1914, of one hundred years of peace between this country and England. A most interesting and profitable discussion is also being arranged on the general theme "America's Next Ten Years," which will throw a strong light on the probable state of this country in that important period.

A Hint of Variety

Both old features and new will be kept up to a high standard of interest and usefulness throughout the year. The Young People's Topics will be treated with the same illuminating care; the News of the World will be concisely summarized so that you may keep informed on what is happening; the Editorials will have the same clear thinking and fearless expression; Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart will continue to link up the Newspaper and the Bible; Miss Margaret E. Sangster's ever-widening circle of friends will find her equal to all their demands; able researchers will continue to answer the wide range of Mail-Bag Questions; the Bible Contest for prizes will continue; articles dealing with the Roman Catholic Propaganda for Political Power will appear; accounts will be given of the Newest Discoveries in Bible Land Excavations; What the Government is Doing in opening up new lands for the homesteaders and in many other ways, will be told; the Interests of the Home will have some special articles; the Panama-Pacific Exposition and the ceremonies attending the Opening of the Panama Canal will be fully treated with rich pictorial aid; the Art Features, including the first cover, will be on a higher plane than ever; the meaning and possibilities of a Holy War in the Old World will be described. And it goes without saying that to all the pre-arranged program will be added new subjects of timely interest as the year rolls on its eventful way.

Among the General Topics

It would be impracticable to even name the long list of subjects which we shall treat in the fifty-two issues of 1915. Besides those elsewhere outlined in this Prospectus we wish to mention especially the following:

Comparatively few understand the scope and real effect upon all the affairs of this country of the new Federal Reserve Banking System. In a special article this great innovation in the financial world will be clearly described.

There are signs of unusual activity in the movement that would make Palestine the seat of a new Hebrew nation. The Zionist Movement will be presented by those who know it best.

The chain of evidence of the Genuineness of the Gospels and Epistles will be the subject of a remarkably conclusive study, invaluable to all lovers of the Bible.

Early in the year we shall announce a Prize Competition in Sacred Music, open to all composers. The best compositions submitted will be published from time to time. We are looking forward to a rich treat for you all in this undertaking.

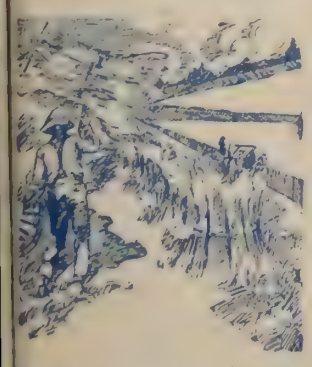
Among the Writers who will be New to our pages in the coming year will be Dr. Frank Crane, who has world-wide attention today; Charles Grant Miller, a Western writer of charm and strength; Dr. O. S. Marden, who has the faculty of showing you how to acquire an aim in life; Walt Mason, the unusual poet, who never fails to touch the spot in his odd bits of philosophy.

We are planning to have a Debate on Socialism, so clear and unbiased in its statements from both sides and by such authorities as shall enable you to form a satisfactory opinion upon this vital subject. It is our aim to report whatever is taking place Within the Different Denominations, which should be of keen interest throughout the Christian Church. Our plans are well laid for keeping you fully informed on such interesting matters throughout the year.

The Most Amazing Calamity that the world has witnessed is that which for a time changed the prosperous nation of Belgium into an almshouse, dependent chiefly upon America for its support. Our own representative has visited this stricken land and he and our interdenominational committees there and in other devastated portions of Europe will give you vivid stories of the conditions and keep you informed of the progress of this gigantic relief work.

Share This Forty Millions

Perhaps you are a farmer and want to learn "agriculture." Perhaps you are a housewife and are willing to be taught "domestic science."



Under the supervision of the United States government $40,000,000 is being spent to add a grain or two of knowledge to the farmer and to lighten the housewife's burden of home-management. Now $40,000,000 ought to pay for the distribution of a great deal of education. Enough, indeed, for everybody to have some of it. Would you not like to know about this "greatest single educational enterprise that any government has yet undertaken"? We certainly shall tell you all about it. And about other matters, too, that are of the first concern to our vast rural population. Someone has asked if the Grange is still alive and doing; we shall try to answer that query. The subject of rural credits is becoming interesting; co-operative marketing is being tried out; rural free delivery to and from the farmer is still in the experimental stage; rural schools are open to improvement. These and kindred subjects will have enlightening treatment by writers who know.

For Leisure Hours

A good story with a point, perhaps a laugh, perhaps a sob, perhaps a jolt of some kind, is necessary every now and then to everyone. We have been fortunate in the past in securing a wide range of excellent fiction and much charming verse. The serial now running in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "The Return of Pollyanna," by Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter, is a sequel to one of the very best books America has produced ("Pollyanna," first published in serial form in our pages), and is also that most unexpected thing—an improvement on the original story. Like its popular predecessor, the new Pollyanna story will be read by myriads, who will forever after be happier human beings. The story, "A Flower of the Desert," printed in this issue, is one example of the class of fiction with which we shall entertain our readers in 1915. In another class is a wonderful story, written with the inspiration of a seer, depicting in thrilling manner an aerial war upon which depends the fate of Judaism. You may look forward to great treats with modern writers of fiction and verse.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

HOED THEIR OWN ROWS TO SOME PURPOSE. Just what it all means is not quite clear, but the interesting fact remains that a thousand and more Ohio boys and girls have been flocking over the Atlantic seaboard cities in realization of the reward held out to them by their native State as an inducement to raise record crops from experimental plots of ground, bake better loaves of bread than their mothers can, improve the general utility of chickens, and accomplish something worth while in home beautifying. This host appears to have won a five-day tour, and a few among them earned special prizes for their skill. The Ohio Agricultural Commission is said to have spent $100,000 for the trip and considers it money well invested, as these prize contests all over the country are believed to be the best kind of preparation in intensive farming for the day when the population of the United States will be more than doubled. Washington, Philadelphia and New York were honored by these travelers, who marched up Fifth Avenue, New York, headed by a woman's brass band uniformed in blue velvet trimmed with leopard-skin fur.

FRANCE HONORS AMERICAN. When the retiring ambassador to France, Myron T. Herrick, with Mrs. Herrick, reached American waters on board the steamship Rochambeau December 8, the captain of the vessel, acting under wireless orders from the French ambassador at Washington, pinned a red ribbon to Mr. Herrick's coat to signify that the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor had been bestowed upon him by President Poincaré in recognition of his services in the French capital, the token itself, the highest which France can bestow, being on its way across the ocean. It is stated that there are but 45 living persons who have now been so honored. Mrs. Herrick is quoted as denouncing all stories of German atrocities as without foundation.

GERM SENTRIES AT SCHOOLHOUSE DOORS. Speaking before a parents' association recently, Dr. Harvey W. Wiley prophesied that every school will some day have a sanitary inspector on guard at the door each day to bar out every child who is in the least a menace to others. He also waved the toothbrush in air as usual, as he should, declaring it to be the flag of health for childhood.

FRIGHTFUL LOSS TO THE NAVY AVERTED. The efficiency of the navy, none too well established in the opinion of some congressmen, was jeopardized on December 5 when the dreadnought Constellation, now scarcely 117 years old (having been built in 1797 along with two sister ships) was nearly wrecked by gales while under tow from Washington to Newport, R. I., breaking loose from the navy tug Ontario and being at the mercy of the fifty-mile wind until picked up by other tugs and towed into the Norfolk navy yard. There were twenty men on board the frigate, as they used to call dreadnoughts. The Constellation is actually in commission for some kind of practical work at Newport.

ENGLAND AND THE VATICAN EMBRACE. Great Britain has joined the Powers which send official representatives to the papal court in Rome, and Sir Henry Howard, appointed as envoy November 24, has been pronounced acceptable to the Vatican by Cardinal Gasparri, the papal secretary of state.

DIE AND LET DIE. If the estimate of a social worker who addressed the Association of Life Insurance Presidents at the annual meeting in New York December 10 is correct, that "we lose by preventable deaths more than 1,700 people every day" and that we have "at least 1,500,000 people sick from preventable causes, largely for lack of health education," we as a people should quickly drop the stones we were ready to let fly at Europe. The splendid equipment in doctors, trained nurses and school buildings available for lectures for a public health crusade was dwelt upon. The association's experts reported on the causes of premature deaths and awarded the pre-eminence to alcohol. Mr. Arthur Hunt, chairman of the Investigation Bureau, declared that if Russia makes prohibition permanent that country can save 500,000 men in the next decade—a comforting hint to the Czar, doubtless, as it might be to other rulers in Europe.

WANTS CONGRESS TO PROPOSE CHRISTMAS TRUCE IN EUROPE. Senator Kenyon of Iowa has offered a resolution proposing that Congress shall endeavor to persuade the warring nations of Europe to observe a twenty days' Christmas truce in the hope that a permanent peace may result. The press of December 11 prints a despatch from Berlin stating that Germany agreed to a somewhat similar proposal by the Pope on condition that the other belligerents also acquiesce.

COLORADO STRIKE AT LAST ENDED. Stating that they were prompted thereto by President Wilson's suggestion, the United Mine Workers of America recommended to the Colorado coal miners that the strike which has been in effect for more than fourteen months be called off, and the miners in convention unanimously accepted the recommendation, agreeing to end the strike December 10. It was estimated that this bitter labor war has lost the miners more than six million dollars in wages and three million dollars in strike benefits, and that another nine million dollars has been lost by the operators. The miners repudiate the idea of a surrender of their principles, which they state they shall continue to propagate throughout Colorado.

HEAD OF REORGANIZED LATTER-DAY SAINTS DEAD. On December 10, at Independence, Mo., Joseph Smith, the son of Joseph Smith "the prophet," founder of Mormonism, died at the age of eighty-two years. His son, Frederick M. Smith, succeeds his father as president of the Reorganized Church of the Latter-Day Saints, having been so designated "by revelation" eight years ago. Joseph Smith was born in Kirtland, Ohio, but was early taken to Missouri, and at five years of age spent a night in jail with his father, whose religious teachings had aroused the enmity of older settlers. The Mormons migrated to Utah under the leadership of Brigham Young, leaving Joseph Smith behind. He formed the Mormons left in Missouri, Illinois and Iowa into the reorganized church, and was always opposed to polygamy, and denied that his father ever sanctioned it.

NATIONAL CHRISTMAS GIFT TO THE RAILROADS. The press of December 11 states that the Interstate Commerce Commission is understood to be on the point of granting the five per cent. increase in freight rates asked for by the Eastern railroads, which will produce an estimated $50,000,000 increase in revenues.

TO DISCOURAGE MEXICAN BAD MARKSMANSHIP. The existence of internal disorders in Mexico became evident in this country from the circumstance of bullets arriving through the air upon American soil near the border. And as an indication of our disfavor concerning such wastefulness in warfare the secretary of war despatched three batteries of field artillery to Naco, Ariz., diplomatic representations on the subject having proved ineffective. Exactly what was transpiring in Mexico has not yet become public news. It is understood, however, that the question of the presidency of that country is involved.

PRESIDENT ADDRESSES CLOSING SESSION OF SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS. Congress reassembled on Monday, December 7, with a program of important business ahead, and on Tuesday President Wilson read his annual message to the two Houses in joint session in the hall of the House of Representatives. It was his longest address to Congress as yet. Its chief topic was that of national defense, the President placing the PROVIDED EVERYTHING IS FAVORABLE AND NOTHING PREVENTS. The airship America built by Rodman Wanamaker to fly across the Atlantic and which gave the United States a cricket in the nest watching for the start, only after all to go across "knocked down," and be set up again for use by the Royal navy, is to be succeeded by a new and larger craft which the aviator Glen H. Curtiss will build for Mr. Wanamaker, and this airship will essay the great flight next summer, weather and other conditions permitting.

UNCLE SAM REFUSES TO BE A HEN. The efforts of the cotton planters to run in under the protection of the Federal Government during the financial storm, like so many chicks under sheltering wings, have failed, as the House on December 8 flatly rejected the Henry bill appropriating $250,000,000 in currency as an emergency loan to the cotton industry.

THE BOOKWORM'S PARADISE. The citizen who loves to browse among books is advised to move into the Library of Congress, where, according to the report of Herbert Putnam, librarian of Congress, 2,253,309 books and pamphlets are now available for reference, and approximately 125,000 additional may be counted on each year. There are also 662,474 music books and pamphlets, 141,712 maps and charts, and 375,812 prints. It takes about 350 persons to look after this huge collection, the third in size among the world's libraries.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA WANTS TO COME INTO THE UNION. The Chamber of Commerce of Washington is setting afoot a movement looking to a constitutional amendment making the District a State "in so far as it shall be entitled to representation in the Senate and House and in the Electoral College." Such an amendment would save many a parent the bad half-hour he now undergoes when his growing boy demands an explanation of the unique situation at the national capital.

THE PRESIDENT REBUKES CONGRESS. In his annual message read before Congress December 8, the President reminded that body that the recent lengthy conferences abroad between representatives of the maritime nations on safety at sea was called by the United States and its deliberations were largely influenced by our representatives, and although other governments had ratified the proposed convention as drawn up by the conference, the United States thus far had neglected to do so, and he urged early and fitting attention to this important subject. He also referred with regret to the delay in arriving at some scheme for rural credits; Secretary of Agriculture Houston, however, in submitting his annual report to the President December 10, stated that there was no emergency calling for governmental financial assistance to farmers, the law creating the Federal Reserve System having made adequate provision for that class of borrowers. The President also urged the expansion of our merchant marine, the conservation of our national resources and the hastening of a larger measure of self-government in the Philippines, among the subjects that were considered of secondary importance to that of national defense.

INVENTOR EDISON IS GIVEN A NEW START IN LIFE. Undismayed by the seven-million-dollar fire which destroyed ten buildings of his great manufacturing plant at West Orange, N. J., December 10, Thomas A. Edison, now over sixty-seven years of age, calmly stated that he would start all over again the following morning and immediately begin the reconstruction of the property. He and his wife watched the progress of the fire and it is said that, unknown to her husband, Mrs. Edison personally led in the removal of the inventor's records from his private office. Seven thousand persons are employed in the plant, about half of whom will temporarily lose their regular work. One employee is said to have died while fighting the fire, and several firemen were hurt. The departments of West Orange and five surrounding towns were called out. The Edison companies carried two million dollars insurance in regular companies and covered the balance of the risk by a self-insurance fund. An explosion in the film department, the cause of which is not yet known, opened the spectacle.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

CHAPTER VII

Two Days and Mrs. Carew

THE next morning being Sunday, Pollyanna came downstairs with a pensive countenance.

"I was thinking," she sighed, half to herself, "of the people and things you could see, Mrs. Carew."

"Do you?" Mrs. Carew's voice had the sweetness of one who humors a child.

"Yes, the parents of friends you have, and Sunday school. Where do you go, Mrs. Carew, on Sunday afternoon?"

"Well, really, I—" began Mrs. Carew, who seldom went to church and never went to Sunday school.

"To bed, to me, isn't it?" interposed Pollyanna, with humorous intuition. "But you see I like church best, on account of Jesus. I've been to one a beautiful, and it seemed as if I could be happy with Jesus and the children all day. I try to imagine how Jesus looks at times, and it helps me. I'm so glad we can imagine things, aren't you?"

"I'm not in 'pon my word, Pollyanna."

"Oh, but you think how much nicer you imagined things are than they really are sometimes, don't you? Of course, you have to imagine them a little, but Pollyanna was hurrying on. "And of course any child must appear on earth pretty soon, they used to be. But all that time I was here, even my legs didn't go. I just had to keep imagining all the time, just as hard as I could. And of course now there isn't one of those times I do be—like those before, and all that. And so to-day I'm just going to imagine it's Judea up there in the pulpit. What does he say?"

"Er—well—"

"To church, I mean."

"Yes, Pollyanna, I don't—find it so easy to—" Mrs. Carew paused, her throat very tight indeed as she realized that she was almost taken with Pollyanna's confidence. She was glad happy now, before her she could not do it.

"Well, I suppose—about another point, would we walk," she said then, almost roughly. "It's only a little way."

"Yes, I believe that Mrs. Carew on that bright September morning recalled to her that time in memory the Carew pew in the only Presbyterian church to which she had gone as a girl and which she still supported liberally—as far as money went.

To Pollyanna that Sunday morning service was a great wonder and joy. The marvelous organ, of the velvet cushions, the quiet sunlight from the stained windows, the impressive voice of the preacher and the reverent look of the worshiping throng filled her with an eagerness that left her for a little almost speechless. Not until they were nearly home was she her usually talkative self.

"Oh, Mrs. Carew, I'm just beginning now glad I got to go! don't have to live for just one day at a time!"

Mrs. Carew frowned and looked down sharply. Mrs. Carew was in no mood for preaching. She had just been obliged to endure it from the pulpit, she told herself severely, and she would not listen to it from this child. Moreover, this "living-one-day-at-a-time" theory was a particularly pet doctrine of Della's. Was not Della always saying: "Just you wait, Jane, to live one moment at a time, Ruth, and not try to see eighteen stitches for one minute at a time"?

"Well?" said Mrs. Carew now, coldly.

"Yes. Only think what I'd do if I had to live yesterday and today and to-morrow all at once," sighed Pollyanna. "Such a lot of perfectly lovely things, you know. But I've had yesterday and now I'm living today, and I've got to-morrow still coming, and next Sunday, too. Honestly, Mrs. Carew, it doesn't Sunday now, and so this way right straight. I should just dance and shout and sing! I couldn't help it. But I believe Sunday, as I shall have to wait till I get home and then take a hymn. Do you want a nice, enjoyable hymn? I can think of. What is the most enjoyable hymn? Do you know, Mrs. Carew?"

"No, I can't say that I do," answered Mrs. Carew, faintly, looking very much as if she were searching for something she had lost. For a wonder she regretted, because things are so bad, to be told that she must adopt only one day at a time. It is distressing, to say the least, to be told that, because things are so good, it is folly to dare not dare to stand but one day at a time!

On Monday, the next morning, Pollyanna were to attend for the first time school. She knew the way perfectly now, and it was only a short walk. Pollyanna enjoyed her school very much. It was a small private school for girls, and was quite a new experience to Pollyanna. Even new experiences.

Mrs. Carew, however, did not like new experiences, and she was having a good many of them these days. Pollyanna to tired of everything to be in an attitude a companionship with everything in a fresh and fascinating joy most people ought to experience, to say the least. And Mrs. Carew was more than annoyed. She was exasperated. Yet to herself she was forced to admit that if any one asked her why she was exasperated, the only honest she could give would be "Because Pollyanna is so glad"—and even Mrs. Carew would hardly like to give as honest as that.

To Della, however, Mrs. Carew did write that the word "glad" had got on her nerves, and that sometimes she wished she really never had it again. She will admit that Pollyanna had not preached—that she had not even tried to make her play the game. What the child did do, however, was invariably to take Mrs. Carew's "gladness" as a matter of course, which, to one who was not so gladness, was most provoking.

It was during the second week of Pollyanna's stay that Mrs. Carew's annoyance overflowed into definite resentment. The immediate cause thereof was Pollyanna's glowing description to a group about one of her Ladies' Aiders.

"She was playing the game, Mrs. Carew. But, maybe you don't know what the game is. I'll tell you. It's a lovely game."

But Mrs. Carew held up her hand.

"Never mind, Pollyanna," she interposed. "I know all about the game. My sister told me, and—I must say that I—should not care for it."

"Why, of course not, Mrs. Carew!" exclaimed Pollyanna in quick apology. "I didn't mean the game for you. You couldn't play it, of course."

"I couldn't play it?" ejaculated Mrs. Carew, who, though she would not play this silly game, was in no mood to be told that she could not.

"Why, no, don't you see?" laughed Pollyanna, gleefully. "The game is to find something in everything to be glad about; and you wouldn't want begin to hunt for there isn't anything about you but what you could be glad about. There wouldn't be any game to it for you! Don't you see?"

Mrs. Carew flushed angrily. In her annoyance she said more than perhaps she meant to say.

"Well, no, Pollyanna, I can't say that I do," she delayed coldly. "As it happens, you see, I can find nothing whatever to be—glad for."

For a moment Pollyanna stared blankly. Then she fell back in amazement.

"Why, Mrs. Carew!" she breathed.

"Well, what is there—for me?" challenged the woman, forgetting for the moment that she had determined she was never going to allow Pollyanna to "preach."

"Why, there's—there's everything," protested Pollyanna, still with that almost unbelief. "There—there's the beautiful house."

"It's just a place to eat and sleep—and I don't want to eat and sleep."

"But there are all those perfectly lovely things," faltered Pollyanna.

"I'm tired of them."

"And your automobile that will take you anywhere."

"I don't want to go anywhere."

Pollyanna quite gasped aloud.

"But think of the people and things you could see, Mrs. Carew."

"They would not interest me, Pollyanna."

Once again Pollyanna stared in amazement.

"But, Mrs. Carew, I don't see," she urged. "Always before, there have been bad things for folks to play the game on, and the ladies they are the more fun 'tis to get them out—and the things to be glad for, I mean. But there there aren't any bad things. I shouldn't know how to play the game myself."

There was no answer for a time. Mrs. Carew sat with her eyes on the window. Gradually the angry resentment on her face changed to a look of hopeless sadness. Very slowly then she turned and said:

"Pollyanna, I had thought I wouldn't tell you this; but I've decided that I will. I'm going to tell you why nothing that I have can make me—glad." And she began the story of Jamie, the little four-year-old boy who, eight long years before, had stepped as into another world, leaving the door fast shut between.

"And you've never seen him since—anywhere?" faltered Pollyanna, with tear-wet eyes, when the story was done.

"Never."

"But we'll find him, Mrs. Carew—I'm sure we'll find him."

Mrs. Carew shook her head sadly.

"But I can't. I've looked everywhere, even in foreign lands."

"But he must be somewhere."

"He may be dead, Pollyanna."

Pollyanna gave a quick cry.

"Oh, no, Mrs. Carew. Please don't say that! Let's imagine he's alive. We can do that, and that'll help; and when we get him imagined alive we can just as well imagine we're going to find him. And that'll help a whole lot more."

"But I'm afraid he's—dead, Pollyanna," choked Mrs. Carew.

"You don't know it for sure, do you?" brought the little girl anxiously.

"No—no."

"Well, then, you're just imagining it," maintained Pollyanna triumphantly. "And if you can imagine him dead, you can just as well imagine him alive, and it'll be a whole lot more while you're doing it. Don't you see? And some day I'm just sure you'll find him. Why, Mrs. Carew, you can play the game now! You can play it on Jamie. You can be glad every day for every day brings you just one day nearer to the time when you're going to find him. See?"

But Mrs. Carew did not "see." She rose drearily to her feet and said:

"No, no, child! You don't understand—you don't understand. Now run away, please, and read or do anything you like. My head aches. I'm going to lie down."

THANKSGIVING MASS WITHOUT THE PRESIDENT

THE most unusual Pan-American Mass was celebrated at St. Patrick's Church in Washington on Thanksgiving Day with the usual pomp of Roman Catholic ceremony, the usual musical accompaniment of the church, and the usual gathering of prominent people. The list of invited guests included all the prominent officials of the Government, headed by the Vice-President, the Cabinet, the Supreme Court, the Diplomatic Corps, and the usual gathering of lesser officials and politicians.

The one prominent man, however, who was not present was the President of the United States, who, as head of the nation, was supposed to be the principal figure in the occasion, "commanded by his church," despite the decree of the morning, which was doubtless a great disappointment to the Vice-President, Mr. Marshall, who presided over the Senate, and to the Speaker of the House, Champ Clark, who, as the two highest officials of the Government, were the principal guests of honor.

Several days before Thanksgiving, while publicity was given to the announcement that President Wilson would attend the Pan-American Mass of the usual Thanksgiving in Washington, but at the same time it was stated that he might attend an invitation to spend the day with his daughter at Williamstown, Mass. This announcement may have been only authorized, or it may have been the product of that characteristic Roman Catholic diplomacy which often turns the edge from the keenest disappointment.

One of the Roman Catholic papers, having positively asserted as information that President Wilson would have another engagement on Thanksgiving Day, announced that the Pan-American Mass was to be even dependent upon the attendance of the President, and that the celebration would have the same significance even if he were absent.

The Lutheran Pastors' Association, the Baptist Ministers' Conference, and the Methodist ministers of Chicago passed separate resolutions dealing with the attendance of the President at the Pan-American Mass, intimating their opposition to any official recognition of this Roman Catholic service. Whether President Wilson was informed by these and other protests, we are unable to say; but the fact remains that for the first time since the Pan-American Mass was inaugurated, the pew reserved for the President of the United States was not occupied by the official head of the nation. While we cannot forecast the future, yet we venture to express the hope that during the remainder of his term of office President Wilson, if in Washington on Thanksgiving Day, will follow the example which he himself made in his fellow citizens and attend a religious service on that day in his usual place of worship.

SEVEN STORIES WITH ONE CONCLUSION

WHEN Chicago was at the mercy of the anarchists and men feared to appear on the streets in certain parts of the city, a young woman made daily visits unaccompanied to the anarchist headquarters to bring comfort and consolation to the aged mother of a man condemned to death. Years later, she died in China while doing missionary work. Her name was Nellie Russell.

One of the victims of the Boxer riots in China in 1900 was a young woman missionary, brutally murdered in the streets of Chuchou. She was of Irish-Catholic descent, and in her young girlhood had suffered persecution for adopting the Protestant faith. Before going to China she had been a zealous worker as a nurse among the poor of Toronto. Her name was Josephine Desmond.

On September 3, 1901, Miss Ellen M. Stone, an American missionary, and a companion mentioned in the press despatches as a native missionary worker, were captured in Salonica by a gang of bandits and held in captivity, while the world was asked to raise a ransom of $112,000 for their release. At the last moment, in response to an urgent appeal by the American Board, $72,500 was raised, and on February 23, 1902, the world heard of the safe delivery to their friends of Miss Stone, her companion, and her companion's baby daughter. The native missionary companion of Miss Stone was Katerina Stefanova Tsilka.

On Christmas Day, 1912, a missionary in the interior of Brazil was taken ill with a mysterious malady which necessitated an immediate trip to New York for a medical examination, and perhaps for an operation. His wife helped him to start on the journey of 105 miles on men's shoulders, then by rail and river steamer, and finally by ocean steamer for New York. Then she turned back home alone to carry on his work and her own, and to wait for weeks for the first word of his safe arrival in New York and of the doctor's diagnosis of the unknown disease and of the results of its treatment. The wife's name was Laura Chamberlain Waddell.

While the Titanic was sinking, a young woman passenger, on her way home from her mission station in India to visit her sick mother, gained a seat in one of the lifeboats, and a little child was placed in her lap. Just as the lifeboat was to be lowered, she discovered that the child's mother had been left behind. She insisted upon giving her place to the mother, stepped back onto the deck and assisted the mother into the lifeboat, and herself went down with the ship. Her name was Anna C. Funk.

There was scarlet fever in Philadelphia. A young woman nurse, although her duties did not demand it, determined to visit one of the hospitals where victims were confined in order to observe the symptoms of children who had the disease, that she might be able to recognize cases if she came in contact with them in her work among the schools. All reasonable precautions were taken, but they did not avail, and she contracted the disease and died. Her name was Edith Eayre Keisker.

During the Balkan War, the Queen of Bulgaria organized a band of loyal women to minister under the Red Cross to the sick and wounded soldiers left on the battlefields. She needed strong and brave hearts for this work and found them. One of them was Mrs. Vassilka Stephanova Economoff. Another was Radka Economoff, her daughter, one of the Sisters of Mercy sent out by the Samaritan Society for work in the field hospitals. After the war, the queen delegated one of her bravest and stanchest workers to come to America to plead for aid for the widows and orphans of the war. Her emissary was Mrs. Zoritza Kara-Ivanova Furnajieff.

These seven character-sketches of Christian lives have each the same conclusion. Nellie Russell, Josephine Desmond, Katerina Stefanova Tsilka, Laura Chamberlain Waddell, Anna C. Funk, Edith Eayre Keisker, Vassilka Stephanova Economoff, Radka Economoff and Zoritza Kara-Ivanova Furnajieff had all been students at Northfield Seminary.

How the Northfield Idea Has Grown

IN these seven careers we find illustrated the central thought that was in the mind of Moody when he founded his Northfield institution, viz.: not so much to give an education in the conventional sense as to develop character and personality—to make men and women of some practical Christian influence for good in the world. To him, character was the substance of things done, and so it has been to those who took up his work when he died fifteen years ago.

Northfield has just been celebrating a double anniversary—one filled with sad recollections, the other radiant with hope and encouragement. Just fifteen years ago this week, on December 22, 1899, Dwight L. Moody, America's best loved evangelist and founder of the great chain of Christian work at Northfield, passed away. During his lifetime he had labored hard to bring to something like realization the great dream of his early ministry, and how he succeeded the whole world knows. Thirty-five years have passed since Northfield Seminary was founded, and it is now thirty-three years since the Mount Hermon school was opened. It was Mr. Moody's own thought that this should not be a theological or religious institution in a sectarian sense, but that in both, and especially in the seminary, the importance of Bible study as the basis of character-building should be emphasized. In the years that have passed there has been the great total of over 15,000 students at the Northfield institutions which Mr. Moody founded. Trained and consecrated workers have gone out from these schools to almost every section of the world. Not a few have become conspicuous in missionary and evangelistic work while others are found in home pulpits and Christian missions.

WHEN MOODY LED AT MORNING PRAYERS

It was not Mr. Moody's thought, however, that these institutions should be regarded as training establishments for the ministry or for missionary service. He really designed them for training schools for Christian laymen or schools which would insure that laymen would be trained as Christians. This is borne out by the records of their alumni associations, which show what the former students are now doing. Principal Cutler of Mount Hermon recently canvassed 2,100 former Hermon men, and compiled these figures. In business positions, 686; students, 343; ministers and evangelists, 208; Y. M. C. A. workers, 75; missionaries and colporteurs, 38; farmers and agricultural specialists, 221; scientific and technical workers, 133; physicians, 101; professors, school principals and teachers, 85; architects, contractors and carpenters, 60; in government positions, 53; machinists and plumbers, 48; lawyers, 38; musicians and tuners, 19; printers, 18; editors and reporters, 17; chauffeurs, 15; painters, 11; miscellaneous, 231. Out of the 2,400 less than fourteen per cent. were professional Christian workers.

Among the seminary students, teaching is by far the chosen occupation. Of forty-four students, twenty-five are teachers, four are missionaries, seven are studying, five are in library work, two are trained nurses, and one is a physician. There is hardly a field of activity now open to educated women which has not one or more Northfield representatives.

Now the second generation of Moody schools is arising, and there are lineal descendants of the parent institutions in all parts of the globe, and scores of others which are following faithfully one or another or several of the educational features first proposed by Mr. Moody.

The Reward of Faith

These "children of Northfield" in foreign fields are but examples of the wonderful spread of the Moody idea to be found in our own land. A school was opened in a Southern State a few years ago, modeled after the Mount Hermon pattern in that it was to have a work hour with manual labor for the boys, and housework for the girls, and in that it was to make the study of the English Bible a leading part of the curriculum. Its principal writes: "Dwight L. Moody saw further than any educator of his day. He saw the boys and girls in their homes. He believed hand should toil with brain. He believed that the Bible should be built into the foundation of culture."

The modest seed which Moody planted he saw come to fruition in his own lifetime; but he could have had no conception of the wonderful later growth in the second generation. The Hermon schools' permanent equipment, including real estate and buildings, has risen to $2,274,965, and their combined endowment has increased to $1,581,644. The "living endowment" from those who assist the schools to meet the annual deficit, is also growing.

WHERE NORTHFIELD'S HOSTS STILL LOVE TO ROAM

A Flower in the Desert

By Lida Hervey Spence

MARTHA ANN TOTTEN watched her husband narrowly as he again seated himself at the open bedroom door by the southern window and placidly unfolded the two publications of the week's reading matter. She couldn't make out by the look of him why Her'kiah was so keen on readin' a paper printed on a sheet where the very little type could be known from print was the device. Accordin' to her way of thinkin', a woman ought to a-stronger notice who just about the Lord's doing on earth, specially on Christmas Eve.

Her'kiah's yellow head broke in upon her thoughts.

"Seems that was a pretty bad storm down the road. The paper says the train wasn't on 'schedule by almost midnight, an' nearly two hours."

Martha Ann was interested at once.

"Glory, we'll hear, just you bet!" For so many people would take the Christmas 'end.'"

Her'kiah did not reply. He was again plunging indifferently over the paper. Nothing ever interested Her'kiah any more.

Martha Ann took the broom from its post behind the dining-room door. But she didn't sweep. She had all kind of fluttering about that made her feel busy. In this prim parlourette of a room there wasn't a place where a body could get a decent sweeping in around the days and nights.

She looked over cautiously at Her'kiah. Every day for six years she'd remembered. Anything might take his mind off of the important present" it be a postcard.

"Her'kiah." Her voice was low, and there was a note of entreaty in it.

"Huh?" Her'kiah never stirred, planning to look at the paper.

"I was just a-thinkin' 'twon't likely you feel like walkin' down to the depot to see if there aren't somebody there you'd like to come up an' get a bite of lunch—around supper."

Her'kiah turned the paper across his old cut apron.

"I'm just comfortable as I am. If a sudden that—that if Laury'll ever been sociable not that way we'd a-the slightest inkling. If people's sixteen months—two—"

Her'kiah turned slowly and looked drily out of the window. The paper fell to the floor and his large hands patted happily between his knees.

"Say you a-sees it, Martha Ann looked at him in helpless pity. She hadn't ought to have brought up Laury's name. If Uncle Jeremiah or she'd went Her'kiah A into one of his spells of setting and thinkin'—never opened his mouth for hours at a time.

She tidied a rush at the leaves forward on the broom and sadly resumed the dejected-looking sprint. With a two-eyed look at her face she gazed beyond Her'kiah out of the window, over across the snow-white and sunshine, toward the cherry-painted tombstone purple in the light of the setting sun.

Life'll she have had what to say tomorrow? She could follow the thoughts like rosaries a week. She'd sometimes think right now he was sensible as her own. She thought Lucy'd have come down if pickled on her an' Jeremiah and come every year to a-stirring the Lucy's nog. But that just went to show how mixed-up life is. Hadn't done a bite of good.

The shadows drowned in her eyes. She turned to the mantelpiece. There, under a pudding mold (Hannah the napoleon), was Laury's picture. Her own mother's son. Her'kiah was natural an' understand he'd never learn to. All she didn't know on the blessed day, Lucy" to do did about it—but nothing on the grave didn't mean anything to her. Laury never seemed as "her when as when she went out to the orphanage" the same day Jeremiah.

Again she sighed.

She felt a warm-fill pulse on the broom-handle and gratefully swept a bit of the white-gate shavings from around her feet. Her'kiah'll never know as he had to those last three months. When Her'kiah seemed what somebody'd to take it right off'n himself. An' when he needed you when he'd never ask—an' that was a possibility. She gazed the [illegible] to do the dusting and found a bit off the stove and threw the ashes into the fire. It crackled and she watched the pure white flames leap up and die away.

She again turned and looked out toward the darkling mountains that somehow or other kept a-growin' her in mind of her life an' Her'kiah's with-out anything a-growin' up an' a-forward. Couldn't everything she way and rather won't it just as well that she an' Her'kiah were old and about through time?

She went over and picked up the paper Her'kiah had let fall. She took off her glasses and bore her mouth at them and wiped them carefully on the corner of her cream-checked apron, holding them up to the light [illegible] to see that there wasn't any lint on them. She wasn't going to [illegible] through a glass darkly at any time if she could help it. "Where's a y'ars about the Judd Her'kiah?"

Her'kiah did not answer. He hardly ever an- swered to be sure. An' he used to be such a hand at talk.

She laid a reddish-looking hand on his drooping shoulder and shook him gently, repeating her question.

"Read the news! Oh, there ye be! I must 'a-gone over the paper. I'll show you."

He took the News, and, indicating the article with a stubby forefinger, handed it back to her. She went closer to the window and, adjusting her glasses, read it.

Across she looked out of the window into the approaching twilight. She aimed always to look at the bright side of life—"was a body's place duty. But the trembling of the last ray of the setting sun made her shiver. And the queer shadows creeping across the mountains to they loomed big and barren on the trailing light caused her to think with a nameless dread of the rest of her life—hers an' Her'kiah's—alone.

It was her bounden duty to love him up a bit some way or other, here at Christmas time when a body's thoughts naturally kept a-goin' back to other Christmases—an' children.

She pondered a second.

"Her'kiah," she said softly, "'pears as though I asked you to do very many things—but somehow or other I just can't keep from askin' you again to go down to the depot and fetch some one of them boys over there up to supper—some man, like as not, that's kind of young yet, an' away from his mother [illegible] on Christmas Eve." Her voice was very wistful.

Her'kiah said nothing. But she knew of the best in a man he'd go just to please her.

"I've got to go down after the cranberries for tomorrow anyhow, Her'kiah. I might [illegible] as well go the depot. Might be there'd be by-gee that'd care to come—an' they were a-there might."

And so after a time while Her'kiah got up reluctantly and put on his overcoat and hat. Martha Ann followed him to the door. She'd always done that—remember'd some one way an' Her'kiah'd always loved with wheat from early courtin' days till then. She pulled up his coat-collar a bit and reached up and pressed his two-days beard, seeing as she did so how yellow-looking it sometime been. He gazed down at her with that absent-minded look in his eyes and a friendly-like smile on his lips. Her'kiah's smile nowadays was just about the short-lived as those his beard.

There were a sudden pricking in her throat. But she thinking that it would never when the recollection that "maybe" an thought that were coming—there [illegible] for that. When a body came to [illegible] of it. What was had one what turned out good goodness knows it often wasn't known in life for those there hadn't would [illegible] an' would goodness for that, too.

She went back into the kitchen and closed the door. Something seemed to tell her that it'd be a young man. Her'kiah'd find a-hanging around the [illegible] depot, homeless-like. She was glad she'd just baked a spice of ginger. Stepping the eggs-and, on Christmas Eve, too! If that didn't prepare Her'kiah up a bit nothin' would.

She stirred and beat for the [illegible] and put in everything but the milk—that's as she was goin' to use baking-powder it wouldn't do to wet them with milk till she was ready to roll them out to bake. And so's to have everything ready, she got out the bread-board, biscuit-cutter and pan. As she took the geranium-edged corner from the drawer, she picked up a small one and looked at it regretfully. It'd been many a day since she'd cut out any little biscuits with it—them days were clear an' gone.

She got out the best tablecloth, and started with it toward the dining-room. then hesitated. She glanced around the big warm kitchen. It looked nice enough for any one. Half of it was kind of settin'-room anyhow—Her'kiah always liked a fireplace in the kitchen an' she kept that corner fixed up a bit with a ruffled curtain at the window and a hooked rug of bright rat-an'-mice colors in front of the fireplace. The young man'd be Her'kiah's company by—an' Her'kiah liked to eat in the kitchen, so she'd just set the extension table there.

She went to the safe through the screen doors of which neat rows of old-fashioned dishes showed. She took out a turquoise dish for the apple jelly. Her'kiah used to set a heap of store by that dish—it was one he'd picked out himself when they were first married. She also reached up and took out a little blue glass box and, lifting it from its hollow glass rest, she regarded it ruefully. There, on Easter, Her'kiah had brought it for Laury. That little blue box always allowed little children. A grown man, nearly thirty year, wouldn't think it was foolish, like as not. She sighed as she set it back.

Night came on. Her'kiah was gone longer than she "guess he'd be, she thought, anxiously. She hoped he hadn't got a fidgety spell an' gone for one of his long night walks.

She went up to the kitchen looking-glass. Through silver-rimmed spectacles, and under smoothly slicked white hair, a pair of brown eyes looked back at her in earnest appraisal. She guessed she'd pay put on her alpaca. She b'lieved the young man'd feel more at home if she was just common-like to her housework clothes. She'd put on a ruffled apron an' she'd be all right.

Hark! There was the gate a-clickin'.

She listened.

Her heart beat solemnly, and she caught her lip between her teeth. Just Her'kiah all by himself—she'd known as footsteps in a thousand. An' she'd set much store on the young man comin'.

A little droop settled itself at the corners of her mouth. Disappointment always did make her sort of sick. But she wasn't going to let on that she was disappointed—not after Her'kiah'd been good enough to go to the depot just to please her. He'd done his part—she'd do hers. So she smoothed back her hair with two trembling hands and forced a smile to her quivering lips. By the time Her'kiah came around the side walk and up the back steps to the kitchen door she was there to open it for him.

She pulled open the door.

Wonder of wonders! There stood Her'kiah, and in his hand was a little boy. A little boy with a red cap pushed back from shock light hair, an' blue eyes a-smilin' down shyly at her, and little teeth a-gleamin' white between pretty-sweet lips!

She stepped back. She reached an' caught one of the little toilers hands as it lay on Her'kiah's shoulder.

"Why, honey, honey!"

She let them in, an' stepped to the doorway to greet the little fellow's mother—but she wasn't there. Slowly Ann turned on Her'kiah.

"Where's his ma, Her'kiah?"

"Where's Laury is," said Her'kiah, softly, looking to look at her.

"Blessed land!" Martha Ann pulled the shawl hugged her an Her'kiah for the shock of re-membrance.

"Her pa'll be home Her'kiah!"

"Yup. He an' [illegible]" Her'kiah's voice was hoarse.

"Her'kiah!"

He stepped and placed his finger on his wounded lip.

Martha Ann looked at him in painful understanding.

"Poor little lonesome fellow! Motherless an' fatherless! Like as she a-stands on an old-fashioned with darkness out. She stepped the a low rocking-chair and pulled the child on to her lap, settling his little body against her own in the familiar way of such as are used to mothering little children. She dropped her head over against the top of his, from which the little red cap had fallen, and rocked back and forth. Hez'kiah, his hat on the back of his head, and a hand on each hip, stood watching them, a tranquil look on his care-worn face.

"Hungry, honey?" Marth' Ann whispered presently.

"A man give me thum pea-nuths, an' a all-day thucker," promptly responded the child, squirming to a sitting position, and smiling confidently up into her welcoming eyes.

Marth' Ann threw back her head and laughed like a girl, and Hez'kiah's suggestion of a smile became a broad grin.

"I'll be bound you've had more'n a plenty of knick-knacks," said Marth' Ann, giving him a squeeze, "but how'd you like to have some potatoes with gravy on them—an' some little boy's biscuits an' jelly, eh?"

"An' thum milk?" He wiggled off her lap and looked up anxiously at her.

"An' some milk," answered Marth' Ann, getting up and laying her hand tenderly on his head. "You take off his little coat, Hez'kiah, an' I'll have supper ready before you can say Jack Robinson."

A few minutes later Marth' Ann stood at her bread-board cutting out biscuits with the little cutter. From the tail of her eye she watched Hez'kiah, who had placed a basin of water on a chair and was washing the child's hands and face. She'd 'lowed to do that. Seemed more pitiful than his lonesomeness an' grief to see Hez'kiah take up with the little fellow that way.

While the biscuits were baking, and the ham was frying, and the tea-kettle was singing, Marth' Ann thoughtfully changed the jelly from the majolica dish to the little blue hen.

An' when supper was laid, so's to make the chair the right height for the boy, Hez'kiah brought from the other room the big Bible that he hadn't even touched since he'd wrote a line in it nearly three months ago. An' while Hez'kiah was sayin' grace the little fellow suddenly looked up shyly at her through his long lashes and then as suddenly looked down at his plate—for all the world like Larry used to do!

An' after train time it'd all seem just like a dream!

The little boy was very tired. Before he had finished his supper his big eyes grew heavy-looking and his little tousled head bobbed forward a time or two. Each time he would open his eyes wide and smile apologetically and then hold up his head very straight. But pretty soon over would bob his head again, and at last it fell softly forward on to the table.

They sat there, the sleeping child between them. From his side of the table Hez'kiah, with a satisfied smile on his face, tenderly regarded the little fellow. But Marth' Ann, with troubled eyes, was looking at Hez'kiah. She knew it wasn't right—but it'd a-been better in the long run if Hez'kiah had left the blessed lam' down at the depot with his folks.

Hez'kiah spoke first:

"Poor little codger! He's plumb tuckered out! Couldn't he take a little nap, Marth' Ann?"

He looked up at the white-faced kitchen-clock, the big black figures of which indicated that it was now 6.30. "Conductor said needn't have him back till half past ten or 'leven—just in time to put him on the train."

Marth' Ann, too, looked up at the clock. "I should say he can have a good nap. I'll take off his shoes so's his feet won't swell."

Suiting the action to the word she took the sleeping child on her lap. His limp body was warm against her, and for a minute his sweet flushed face and parted lips seemed to blot out many years and leave her at the happiest time of her life.

She noticed as she took off the little worn shoes that several buttons were missing. The coarse patched stockings were soiled. There'd be plenty of time to wash and dry them. So, together with the tight round garters, she pulled off the stockings, observing as she did so the ridges they had made on the slim white feet.

The two looked up at each other. A smile lighted Hez'kiah's worn face, and in Marth' Ann's eyes shone an eloquent tenderness.

"Sing to him, Marth' Ann!"

It did seem that Hez'kiah was bound an' determined to recollect everything that ever had happened!

She satisfied the hunger of her arms by holding the child close—and it seemed to ease the ache in her heart to hear her own voice sing again the familiar words:

Hush, my babe, lie still and slumber,
Holy angels guard thy bed.

After a little while, without ceasing to sing, she inclined her head in the direction of the lounge. In response to the old-time signal Hez'kiah tiptoed over to the lounge and turned back the old-fashioned log-cabin quilt.

Marth' Ann, still humming softly, carried the child over and tenderly laid him down, pulling his dress straight so's it wouldn't be lumpy under his little soft body. They stood there, Hez'kiah looking down at the child and Marth' Ann, wistful-eyed, looking at Hez'kiah.

They moved stealthily away, and Marth' Ann went over to the stove and put on some water so's she could wash out the little stockings.

Later, when Marth' Ann was seated in the low chair, her thimble on her finger and her work-basket and the child's shoes on the table beside her, she held up her needle to the light and threaded its big eye with a strand of coarse black thread. As she drew the thread through and knotted it, she looked over at Hez'kiah, who, tiptoe, was coming away from seeing if the boy was covered up good. He sat down close to her and picked up one of the little shoes.

"Who's he travelin' with, Hez'kiah?"

"With the conductor."

Marth' Ann's hands fell heavily into her lap. She looked up at her husband with a puzzled expression.

"The conductor! Where's his folks?"

"Ain't got any folks." Hez'kiah made answer slowly. "He's bein' took out to the coast to one of them orphan homes!"

"Oh, Hez'kiah!"

Hez'kiah cleared his throat and looked gravely at the shoe he held.

Quick tears rose to Marth' Ann's eyes. A new kind of ache sprang up in her heart. A wave of a queer kind of gratitude swept over her—

"Yes, poor little shaver!" Hez'kiah's voice was subdued.

He sighed and leaned back in his chair, shading his eyes with his big knotted hand. Marth' Ann picked up a little shoe lest and it down again while she wiped her eyes and her glasses. She peered up once more and thoughtfully ran her needle through the hole where the button had been sewed on.

Pretty soon Hez'kiah got up and once more went softly over to the lounge to look at the boy. When he came back and sat down Marth' Ann looked up at him and asked when the train was to pull out.

"Not any earlier'n 10.30," he told her.

"Guess we'd better take him up in a little while an' get him dressed." It was more like a question he asked her than a statement he was making.

Marth' Ann finished sewing on the last button and looked up. "Yes, against we get him up an' dressed it'll be time you was a-goin'. Even if the train does pass within a stone's throw of the house, you have to go as far as the depot anyhow."

While Hez'kiah built up the fire so's the room'd be good an' warm, Marth' Ann went over to the lounge. She pulled down the covers gently. La! Don't seem no more'n yesterday since Larry'd laid just that way—one little arm thrown over his head. Her heart was stirred to wistful recollection.

She'd wait till she carried him over to the rockin'-chair an' wake him then. She lifted him up tenderly, thrilling at the feel of his head against her breast. She approached her chair. Hez'kiah whistled softly. It kind of gave her a start. He hadn't whistled that two-note whistle since long before Larry died. She looked over at him.

Hez'kiah was a-grinnin' from one ear to the other, an' a-pointin' to the little stockings hung up to dry behind the stove side by side. His voice was whispery hoarse, so's he wouldn't wake the child.

"Marth' Ann, looks like you got out your sign for Santa Claus!"

Marth' Ann looked over the child at the stockings. Sure 'nough, it did look like fixin' for Santa Claus, an' Chris'mas gifts, an' gettin' up before day-break tomorrow mornin'! She could hear little feet come a-runnin' over the cold floor long before the roosters would think of crowin'! An' she could see a little tow-head bent eagerly over a bulged-out stocking.

Of a sudden her knees trembled under her. She sank into the low rocking-chair. She gazed down at the sweet flower-like face of the child, although for the first time she beheld him. A new look leaped into her face—a look that held more than love—more than protection.

Hez'kiah stood near the stove regarding her curiously.

"Hez'kiah!" Something throbbed in her voice and a glorious light shone suddenly in her eyes.

He came slowly toward her, a puzzled look on his gaunt face.

"Hez'kiah—it's just come to me. It was all intended. It's one way of settin' out a flower in the desert—it's one way of measurin' things back to you and me!"

Hez'kiah was never quick at understandin', so he just patted her on the shoulder and didn't say anything.

"An', Hez'kiah, I'm a-goin' to keep him—he's our Chris'mas gift, yours an' mine!"

And so Hez'kiah hurried away to get the doctor to draw up a paper for the conductor, stating the facts about Marth' Ann and Hez'kiah Moss. The sheriff and the postmaster would sign it for Doc. Marth' Ann made sure that would clear the conductor of any blame, for if it was a home the orphan asylum wanted for the boy they'd found it, hadn't they?

And an hour or so afterwards Marth' Ann was standing in the kitchen door waiting for Hez'kiah to come back. Just as he came up the steps the silence of the desert was broken by the shrill sound of a whistle and the loud exhaust of an engine. The belated train was pulling out for the Coast. With outstretched hands they met each other and the moonlight shone sweetly upon their eager old faces. Hez'kiah laid his arm around her waist and together they looked toward the jagged mountains solemn like and purple against the night sky.

Hez'kiah silently pointed over the highest peak of all to a big bright star.

WAITING

Midnight—after—widened eyes,
Tears that almost fall,
Boards that creak like ghosts that walk
In the silent hall.
What if Santa—poor old saint—
Doesn't come at all?

Stockings long and black and thin,
Hanging on the wall;
Three small children, mousy-still,
Waiting for a call.
What if Santa—dear old saint—
Doesn't come at all?

Nighties aren't very warm—
Three spines shake with fear;
Wind is crying at the door,
Sounding mighty near....
What if sleigh-bells shouldn't ring,
Full of joy and cheer?

Eager faces, sleepless, bright,
Six small folded hands,
Hearts that count the clock's faint tick,
Soldier-like it stands.
What if all the toys are lost,
In some foreign lands?

THE GREAT GIFT

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

YEARS ago, in the crowded, inn-filled quarter of a strange city, a mother sent near a manger-litter and kissed his little baby and kissed him the angel [illegible] and [illegible] high in the heavens, and a glorious star shone over the lowly.

It was the first Christmas day—but you all know the beautiful story. You know how the shepherds crept to the stable-side and how the sheep huddled together and watched the scene, and how [illegible] hurried from the East bringing gifts to lay at the feet of the infant Saviour. It is about those gifts that I want to talk.

One of the wise men brought gold with him, glittering yellow gold, and the other two brought frankincense and myrrh—the very costly products of the Orient. The gold, frankincense and myrrh were the most valued possessions of the three wise men, and yet they gave them at the silent bidding of a gleaming light that shone from heaven and led to a stable.

Since the first Christmas the giving of gifts has grown until it has become a mighty custom, a custom followed by nearly all of the inhabitants of Christian nations. And although some of the gifts are gifts inspired by a holy light, other gifts are very commonplace things, very, very far from God.

I know a girl who is going long before Christmas to make and buy a multitude of presents. For months she works and saves and worries (for she is not a rich girl), and the day after Christmas she crumples up, and smiles whitely and says:

"I'm glad, glad that it's over for another year!"

"If you feel that way," I said once, "why do you bother to give so many presents? Surely [illegible] don't all go to relatives and dear friends."

The girl laughed ruefully. "To tell you the absolute truth," she answered, "I hate [illegible] relatives than any of the gifts. As for friends—sometimes I think that there is no meaning to the word."

My eyes opened very wide.

"Then," I wondered out loud—"why do you give so many gifts?"

"Because"—she hesitated a moment before answering—"because they all give presents to me, and I'm glad to do something in return. It takes all of my money and most of my time, but it's got to be done."

The spirit of Christmas isn't in [illegible] kind of a gift, but the friends of mine, [illegible] never given a present from a sense of duty.

There is another type of gift that is just as unpleasant, just as foreign to the true Christmas spirit as the gift of heedless duty. It is the gift given by a person who worries about the many other [illegible] uncomfortable from the last birthday gifts to lay at the feet of the infant Saviour. It is about those gifts that I want to talk.

There is another type of gift that is just as unpleasant, just as foreign to the true Christmas spirit as the gift of heedless duty. It is the gift given by a person who worries about the many other [illegible] uncomfortable, [illegible] enough to buy to be truly but friendly. Christmas is a busy season to her—for Christmas is essentially a family day.

Some people would say it is a mirror and cry because they were alone, but this lady was [illegible] in the city long enough to know its secrets. She has seen tenement rooms that one hungry, sleepy, tired people live in, and her Christmas time is spent in trying to bring a little joy into their lives. The grandmother, a dear old Scotch woman, looked down tenderly into the glowing face, and when she spoke her voice was very soft, very reverent.

"Dearie," she said, "dearie, dinna ye forget that 'tis Jesus' own birthday? What is your gift—to him?"

Friends of mine, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son!" And the gift made so many years ago, the gift that began so gloriously in a manger and ended so heroically on a cross, has left a heritage of love for hundreds, for thousands of years. And yet on that Son's birthday we often forget a gift to him!

A gift to God sounds rather subtle, rather difficult to understand, doesn't it? But when you stop to think it isn't very hard to find a suitable birthday present; for a gift to God is usually a gift that, like your face in the mirror, reflects back to you. Perhaps a bright smile when your throat is choked up with sobs, a cheery word when you feel like saying something cross, would be an acceptable present. Perhaps a bit of love to one of the Father's unhappy children, or a helpful hand to one of his frightened ones, would be a thoughtful gift. Perhaps looking at the sunset when your heart is near to bursting with thunder clouds would make him understand. Oh! it seems to me that we should give God a Christmas gift—a present that would last through all the year—even as his gift to the world has lasted through all the ages.

I read a story one day about a little girl who wanted to give her mother a present on her birthday. The family were buying beautiful gifts, but the little girl owned one round copper penny—and no more.

At last the birthday came and the mother—a radiant mother who thanked God for her children—was given the gifts that the older ones had saved up their money to buy. When the last box had been opened, the little girl, with tear-filled eyes, handed her a small crumpled letter with a penny enclosed.

"Deer Muvver," it read, "this is the only munney I have, but I'm giving you all my luv with it." Oh, people everywhere, no matter how poor we are, we can still give our love—and that is the Great Gift.

"For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." And on the day of his giving the wise men followed a star of heavenly brightness that led to a dimly lighted stable. Near—oh, so near—in the sky of our souls there is a star glowing with a pure silver light leading us, and if we follow it we shall surely reach holy places here on earth. The wise men brought their most precious possessions, gold, frankincense and myrrh, to lay at the Christ child's feet. . . . What shall we give to him?

GOD'S PATIENCE WITH ISRAEL

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JANUARY 3. (Judges 2: 1-19)

Backsliding Israel

By Arthur H. Howland

A MESSENGER from the Lord came to the people of Israel before the death of Joshua to rebuke them for disobedience. God had given them the wonderful assurance: "I will never break my covenant with you." He had commanded them, in view of his protection, to make no league with the natives of Canaan, whose codes of worship and morals were terribly wrong. But the people of Israel had not obeyed. Leagues had been made with these enemies of Jehovah and his cause. Now the announcement is made that these enemies will be perpetual thorns in Israel's life.

Just so God insists that we make no compromise with evil. Every time we do we sharpen the thorns which will harass us through the years. It is a wonderful assurance God has made us: "I will never break my covenant with you." We must trust him to keep that covenant of protection and salvation, and must, on our part, make no compromises with sin.

The people repented and worshiped. They made a new beginning. So may we make a new beginning at the threshold of the New Year, determining that this year we shall, by the help of God and through the grace and power of his covenant, be altogether and all the time true to him.

But after Joshua's death the people forsook God again. Judges were raised up, somewhat, perhaps, as we elect our Presidents now. The statement that God "raised up" the judges probably means that he directed the people's choice. This was an early democracy. But even these judges, chosen under the direction of Jehovah, the Israelites would not obey. They had indeed a "bent to sinning," and not all the records of God's past power and bounty and his present pleadings could keep them from their idols and their sins. There were occasional victories but many dreary defeats.

This is a sad picture of many a spiritual life. But there is no necessity for continuing such a life. God's New Testament of blessing and power shows the better way. During these weeks of studying Israel's military and spiritual failures, study carefully the book of Hebrews, in which God's plan for a victorious life through the grace of Christ is clearly and beautifully described and offered.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely." Hos. 14: 4.

Of course there must be the frank admission of our declension. We must take with us words, and return unto the Lord and ask him to receive us graciously. This is what the prodigal did. But the father cut short his confession, and would not allow him even to ask to be placed among the servants. How different this is from man's treatment of man! He may forgive, but it is rare for forgiveness to obliterate the past. It is almost always possible to see the joint in the pieces of the broken vase. But with God the healing is so perfect that you cannot detect where the wound was. He not only forgives, but he restores to the old position in his heart and home. Not a word is ever said about the past! Not a look recalls it! Not the slightest difference is made, except an added tenderness! The free unmerited love of God did not originate in our goodness or beauty, and is not diminished by our backsliding. Only it cannot pour its full value into our experience, so long as the channel between him and us is silted up and blocked. He cannot get through the barrier that backsliding raises. It must be demolished from our side by confession and return. Then we know again the love of God.

God's "Seventy Times Seven"

By Amos R. Wells

THERE is an interesting story, "Living Up to Dan'l Webster." It seems that during the great orator's lifetime his personality made so tremendous an impression that whole communities imitated him—his voice, his bearing, his gestures, even his facial expression. It may well have been so in the case of Joshua; for the Israelites served the Lord all the days of the great general, we read, and all the days of the men that had seen Joshua and the wonders God wrought through him.

"There is one thing you cannot bury with a good man," said D. L. Moody: "his influence still lives. They have not buried Daniel yet; his influence is as great today as it ever was." Dr. Charles A. Vincent illustrates the truth with a sunset. When the sun sinks below the horizon we say it is gone; but we are mistaken, for the sun has embodied itself in the plants and animals and in the bodies and brains of men. Thus Joshua has not gone, but is living still.

Memory is a marvelous thing. Some one has said that the recording angel needs no other book than human memories. It is said that Paderewski needs to read or play a composition only twice and he has memorized it. He can play from memory more than five hundred elaborate pieces. With such an instrument it is indeed strange that men and whole nations should forget so easily; and yet we read that a generation arose that had forgotten Joshua and Jehovah and all that Jehovah had done for the people. It would be incredible, if it were not paralleled so often in our individual lives and in the history of our own country.

Gratitude had gone out of fashion in Israel. If ever a nation should have celebrated an annual Thanksgiving Day it was the Hebrew people. Think of the great deliverance from Egypt, and of their marvelous conquest of Canaan. A city clerk once took into a restaurant his father from the country. The food being placed before them, the old farmer bowed his head; whereupon the clerk, blushing fiercely, quickly nudged his father and said, "Father! It isn't customary to do that in restaurants." "It is customary with me to return thanks to God wherever I am," said the aged Christian, and he proceeded to ask a blessing. Those within hearing paused and reverently bowed their heads. They had received a lesson in the duty of thanksgiving such as all men and nations need to learn.

It seems incredible also that the Israelites, having known the pure worship of Jehovah, should debase themselves by the obscene and horrible worship of Baal and Ashtaroth; but the tendency to idolatry is universal. A missionary in the East gave some patients a cholera medicine, and was pleased not long afterward to hear them say, "We have been so much benefited by your medicine that we have decided to accept your god." Thereupon they took her to their temple, where she saw the empty medicine bottles on a shelf and the natives at once prostrated themselves before them in worship. It is very difficult for all of us to get behind material things, and outward forms and ceremonies, to the God who is a spirit and must be worshiped in spirit and in truth. With the spirit lacking, in New York or Chicago, all worship is no better than the reverencing of empty bottles.

The Hebrew judges were God's patience. One after the other God sent them, refusing to acquiesce in his people's ruin. How fortunate for the Israelites that God's perseverance matched their perversity! One of the most encouraging passages in the Bible is Christ's command to Peter that he forgive one who had wronged him "until seventy times seven." This is encouraging because it is the divine measure of forgiveness. Seven was the number of perfection, of completeness. Seventy times seven, then, was the acme of entire forgiveness, and Christ would require of us nothing that he is not willing to perform himself. How evil is the nation or the man that repeatedly offends a God so patient and so kind!

A MILLION NICKELS

A GROUP of men sat in the offices of the World's Sunday School Association in the Metropolitan Tower planning for the winning of the world to Jesus Christ through the Bible and the Sunday school. One of these men, Dr. George W. Bailey, said: "Brethren, we have been doing much for the bodies of those suffering from the effects of the war. I now suggest that we do something for their spiritual needs. Let us send a million Bibles to the soldiers in the field!"

For a few moments these men sat in silence. Then action was unanimously and enthusiastically taken, calling upon the Sunday schools of America for "a million nickels from a million scholars for a million Testaments for a million soldiers." And none in that group doubted the divine call for this new children's crusade—a crusade not to win back an empty tomb, but to put a living Christ through the Book into the lives of the brave youth on the fields of Europe, the fields once trodden by the feet of those children crusaders of the long ago.

Then the question arose, "What will help each scholar to get the full meaning of his personal share in this new crusade? A Bible bookmark was suggested, to be put into the hands of each scholar giving a nickel, having his name written on the bookmark by the superintendent or some other officer of the school as a reminder of his loving interest in those who are fighting in this great war. The bookmark will be a souvenir to be treasured long after these cruel days are past and when the boys and girls of today shall be the peacemakers of tomorrow. These bookmarks will be furnished free of charge by the World's Sunday School Association. Each superintendent will receive as many bookmarks to be inscribed and presented to the givers as there are nickels in the offering sent from his school.

Dr. Bailey and the general secretary of the World's Sunday School Association called at the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose deep interest in similar movements for years past has given it a position of peculiar leadership.

The officers and editorial staff of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at once entered into the plan and generously offered their columns for an appeal to the Sunday school constituency of the country in an effort to reach the individual schools.

How the Plan Is Taking

On the Sunday following the adoption of the plan the idea was incidentally mentioned to the Presbyterian Sunday school in Atlantic City which Mr. H. J. Heinz was attending that day. At once the school asked for the opportunity to be the first to contribute 230 nickels—one for each scholar—toward the million nickels for the million Testaments.

In a Brooklyn school the scholars eagerly asked for the chance to earn the nickel in the following week, so that the Testament would represent a part of themselves. An excellent ideal.

A Sunday school teacher who heard of the plan at once wrote to each one of her class of girls: "At the teachers' meeting Monday night our superintendent spoke about sending a million nickels for a million Testaments for a million soldiers. As your teacher, I ask your help. Let us be one of the first to come forward as Christians and workers for Christ. The nickels that we will give may be the means of bringing souls into God's kingdom. Our dear Saviour died to save our souls; can we not do this little thing for our dear Lord Jesus Christ, who has done so much for us? Your loving teacher."

A group of Sunday school superintendents in Philadelphia asked to be among the first to give their schools the chance to respond with a nickel for each soldier.

What a Nickel May Do

On the inside cover of each Testament is to be printed in the language of the soldier the following inscription: "Presented by an American Sunday school scholar and through the American Section of the World's Sunday School Association."

The New York Evening Mail publishes an extract from the letter of a soldier-correspondent in the trenches: "Thanksgiving Eve was spent around the fire in our dugouts. We sang first, and then Bill Thaw read a selection from a Bible presented to him by his mother. It had been snowing all day, and this made us think of Christmas."

In the waiting in the trenches, in the long days of slow recovery in the hospital, in the days of even harder waiting in prison camps, think of what a message from the Best Friend of these soldiers will mean! The fact that these Testaments come from America and from American Sunday school scholars whom they have never seen will carry its own message of "good will to men."

Mr. Superintendent or Sunday School Member, take up the matter next Sunday in your school, and forward the nickels contributed by postoffice money order or check drawn to the order of Mr. Arthur M. Harris, care of World's Sunday School Association, Metropolitan Tower, New York City, stating the number of bookmarks desired. These will be sent without cost.

Many schools have been wondering how they may at this Christmastide have some part in bringing Christ and the Christmas story to the European sufferers. Here is the opportunity: pile the nickels at the foot of the Christmas tree as part of the Christmas celebration.

Already schools and scholars, teachers and officers are enthusiastic and busy. Send in your contribution without delay.

THE YOUNG PEOPLES' MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Who Is on the Lord's Side?

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for January 3. Matt. 10: 34-39. (Consecration Meeting led by the pastor.)

IT IS more than likely that this lesson topic was assigned and the Scripture passage selected for this first Sunday of the New Year after the great European war had begun. Since that dreadful day at the end of July the Christians of America have been remembering and announcing the beautiful thoughts in the Bible, particularly in the New Testament, about peace and about Jesus as the Prince of Peace. But our Scripture passage is warlike. We hear the gentle Christ saying: "Think not that I am come to send peace on the earth. I came not to send peace but a sword." What did he mean?

He meant this. Not that his followers should attack anybody, but that they would say and do things which would make other people attack them. His followers are not to be sword-bearers. But they are to stand for principles which bring the sword against them.

No one can tell, upon entering the new year, what tests will be made during it upon his loyalty to Christ. We sing blithely:

> Tramping, tramping, tramping,
> Tramping and true!

But any year may hold a test of our loyalty and faith before which we should stagger if we knew that it lay ahead.

"He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. And he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me is not worthy of me." It is serious business, being a Christian. We must set our faces against wrong, against injustice, against oppression, against greed, against the God-forgetting tendencies of our times. Our foes may be "those of our own household." Our loyalty to Jesus may cut in between our closest and tenderest companionships, may cut off our fondest hopes and plans. Are we going to be faithful? Are we going to stand the tests? "Who is on the Lord's side?"

Yet there is such wonder and glory and strength in being on his side that what it may cost sinks into insignificance. To have God on our side! What could be more splendid than that? These are terrifically serious days. Civilization has some gigantic transformations before it. When the war ceases—and God grant that it may be in this year!—Christendom must begin again to organize itself on the plan of peace and brotherhood that Jesus taught. We are to declare war against war, and all the things that make for war. In a little way if you must, in a big way if you can, set yourself against all that is wrong and strive this year, like a hero, for all that is right.

Promises of a Redeemer

Epworth League Topic for January 3. Isa. 44: 1; Matt. 1: 21; I Tim. 1: 5, 9; Titus 2: 14; Luke 1: 68.

DID you ever realize what a tribute it is to the supremacy of Christ that instead of looking forward to the coming of the ideal man and infallable teacher, the eyes of men since his day have been looking back to him? What we have been trying to do in the last 2,000 years is not to get ready for the coming of the new Messiah but to understand and measure up to the wonderful message of the life and words of the Messiah who came twenty centuries ago.

Not only were the Jews looking forward to a national deliverer, one who would set their nation free from the bonds of Rome and reign again upon the throne of David, but some devout souls among them had understood from the foregleams of the coming Messiah that he was to deliver them not from the bondage of Rome but from the bondage of sin. And throughout the world there was this expectancy that the ideal man would come and would show the human race how to live.

John the Baptist, in the discouragement of his imprisonment, sent an anxious question to Jesus: "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" Jesus replied by calling John's attention to the work that he was doing, and those gracious works declared his Messiahship. So to every anxious soul who seeks him will he reveal himself as the satisfying Saviour—the Deliverer from sin, the Pattern for the new life and the Power to make possible the life we ought to live.

The whole of the Bible centers in the coming and the achievement of Jesus. The Old Testament shows how sin came into the world, shows its terrific power over human hearts, wrecking and alienating even the people who had been chosen as God's peculiar treasure, and contains promises that the Deliverer from the power of sin is to come. The New Testament tells in the Gospels the life of the Deliverer and, in the story of Calvary the cost of the deliverance. The book of Acts is full of the sunlight and victory of the lives of those who had accepted this deliverance. The Epistles offer the deliverance to all the world, explain the simple way of receiving and retaining it by faith, and show how to win others to accept it. The Revelation tells of the glorious consummation and of the bright future which awaits those who have accepted this great deliverance.

But all the promises of the Redeemer are valueless, so far as we are concerned, unless we seize upon them for ourselves and by faith in them bring the Redeemer with his matchless power into our own lives. May he come to each one of us as fresh as the New Year dawns and give us new blessing and new power for the tasks ahead.

AMONG THE WORKERS

Rev. [illegible] Hall, pastor of [illegible] Church, Wilmington, Del., has just closed a most successful meeting in Memphis. There were many conversions and the church was greatly revived as the result of the meetings. Dr. [illegible] preached the sermons and [illegible] led the singing. Mr. [illegible] is a singer of unusual power and consecration.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

FOR the return of a son B. R. wishes to acknowledge answer to prayer. Mrs. F. W. B. writes from Wenonah, N. J.: "The request for prayer for my son's health has been answered, and I do thank God with all my heart." M. E. S., of Charlotte, Mich., writes: "I wish to acknowledge one very specific answer to prayer, for I believe this event could not have taken place by any other means." G. T. writes: "I want to acknowledge answer to prayer for financial help." A. M. T. writes from Vermont: "The Lord has wonderfully blessed me in the past year, and I want to acknowledge it, and praise him for hearing prayers many times when I was in trouble." Mrs. O. E. of Roswell, N. M., writes: "I want to testify in the Prayer League to God's goodness in having always answered my prayers, not for any reason in the world save his mercy, love and promises. I want to acknowledge especially his goodness in answering prayer for my body on last Sunday evening, when friends were praying around my bedside."

Mrs. Sarah Wert Peoples, missionary at Nan, Siam, writes, acknowledging an answer to prayer in the complete restoration to health of Dr. Peoples, her husband, from serious sickness. He is now in excellent health and is working energetically in the mission field. She adds: "Please pray for our dear Laos people." A mother writes: "I sent a request that my son, who was a backslider, and who was also out of work, be redeemed and that he might find work to support his family. I wish to thank the praying people and the good Lord that he has a good position and is attending church and Sunday school now." Mrs. L. W. writes: "I cannot find words to express how thankful I am for prayer. I was in an awful state, when my mother-in-law requested prayers for my faith to be increased and to be healed of nervousness and for the conversion of my three sons. Now all my doubt has turned to faith and all nervousness gone, and I believe the boys will be saved."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. L. P., Columbia Cross Roads, Pa.; M. S. R., Portsmouth, Va.; J. L. H., New Brunswick, N. J.; Mrs. L. C. L., Durham, N. Y.; Mrs. F. J. G., Centerville, Pa.; W. T. R., Markesan, Wis.; Mrs. A. H. B., Youngstown, Ohio; Margaret Williamson, Red Key, Ind.; O. C. S., Pisgah, Iowa; Mrs. C. W. B., Gouverneur, N. Y.; I. S.; J. M. B., Roanoke, Va.; Miss F. T. C., Texas; Mrs. M. A. H., Candler, N. C.

Two friends write to acknowledge prayers partially answered and to ask continued prayers for the petitions still unanswered. M. E. C. writes from Circo, Ga.: "I wrote you asking prayers for my health and that we might have a good revival here. We had a good meeting, the best I ever saw. But I am still very ill. Last week the doctors thought I would not live. Please pray for me now that I may be healed." Mrs. N. K. S. writes: "Please pray that if it is God's will our daughter may be fully restored mentally. She is wonderfully improved in answer to many prayers in her behalf, for which we give hearty thanks to God." Mrs. D. A. writes: "I beg that you will help me pray for my son. He is in a dreadful condition; seems to grow worse. His mind is almost gone."

Special prayers are asked for the healing of the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Z. L. DeGood, of Detroit, Mich. D. N. S., of Walcott, N. Y., asks urgent prayer for restoration of wife's failing eyesight. Mrs. M. K. R. asks special prayer for healing from great suffering. A sad letter comes from Mrs. A. J. B., who is disconsolate at the loss of her husband after many years of happy married life. She asks prayer that she may be comforted and reconciled to her loss.

A mother, signing herself "Anxiety," N. Y., who says that there is great unhappiness in her household, asks special prayer that God's peace may enter her home and that her husband and four children may be saved. A Wife, whose husband has been wrongfully accused of crime, asks special prayer that he may be vindicated. A Widow asks special prayer for the conversion of her only son, who has just reached the age of twenty-one. A woman who is in great anxiety over certain obligations which must be met asks prayer that God will provide a way out of her difficulties, in which others are deeply involved. A Mother who is in very great distress writes to ask for special blessing in her home that strong temptation and evil influences which are about her children may not overcome them, and that they may all be protected and saved and blessed. She also asks for restoration of health and for relief from other difficulties. A friend who was recently converted asks prayer that she may be saved from all doubts and may receive a witness of the Spirit of her acceptance with God. She also asks that an unsaved friend, who is suffering from a disease which may prove fatal, be saved and healed.

Mrs. L. E. A. asks prayer for spiritual help and leadership at Fort Dade, Fla., a community of nearly three hundred people, including two companies of soldiers, where there is no pastor or chaplain. L. W. asks prayer for a spiritual awakening in a church at Millway, Pa.; A. E. J., for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon a church at Nelson, N. Y.; J. F. H., for blessing upon a church at Oreana, N. Y. An Anxious Mother, for the unity and devotion of the people of a church in Missouri and that souls be saved during the coming revival meetings. W. T. R., for blessing and reviving of a Sunday school at Mackford, Wis.; G. A. M., for a revival at the Union Presbyterian Church of Canova, S. D.; Mrs. H. C. C., for revivals at University Place and Lincoln, Neb.; Rev. and Mrs. F. H. B. ask prayer for their new work at Yale, Mich., and that many souls may be saved. A. E. J., that a pastor may be found for a church at Nelson, N. Y. Rev. J. W. W., that the Lord will send a call to work for which he is earnestly longing.

Eight friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of minds of relatives or friends, or for mental healing for themselves. Mrs. M. C. L., A. J. J., and A. F. W. ask prayer for the restoration of sight; D. S., that his wife's sight may be restored; G. K., that father's sight may be restored; Miss S. A. S., that a boy may regain his sight; Mrs. L. P., that her sight may be strengthened.

Twenty-three friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, forgiveness of sin, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal, spiritual blessing.

Four friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be cured of the appetite for strong drink; two friends that relatives may be delivered from the drug habit.

Nine parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including one mother who asks prayer that three sons and a son-in-law may be converted.

Seven wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Sixteen friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends, including one mother who asks that three daughters and a daughter-in-law may be saved.

Five readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Two husbands ask prayer for the healing of wives; two friends, for healing of their mothers; two daughters, for the healing of fathers; two parents, for the healing of sons; five parents, for the healing of daughters; two wives, for the healing of husbands; three friends ask prayer for the healing of sisters; twenty-six for healing for themselves, including one who asks prayer that she may be able to walk, and also to have the use of her hands, and two others who ask prayer that they may regain the use of their limbs. Eleven ask prayer for the healing of other relatives and friends. Four friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves and others.

Fifteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Twenty-nine friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

THE SPIRIT OF THE SEASON

BY CHARLES GRANT MILLER

MARVELOUS is the influence by which the Christmas spirit moves the hearts of men to joyful and generous impulses. It seems as if in this era of the year an unseen angel touches the invisible spring of an unused door in normal human natures and fills them with song and sunshine.

What a world of generous endeavor and what a summertime of happiness is awhirl around us!

Those whom Providence has prospered are busy with their loving devices to make home happy, to crown the waning year with goodness, to reward fidelity, patience and love, to reap the joys that flock into the Christmas season like homing doves from a far-circling flight.

None would deny them all the riches of such experience, but let us not forget the larger and holier significance of this season whose glory is the advent of Him who came to minister to the poor and the sick and the downcast, and not to be fêted and filled with costly gifts.

He came to serve and not to pamper himself.

He came to bless those to whom "blessing" was the strange name of an unknown experience.

His works that have caused him to hold the supreme admiration of mankind, the worship of millions, and to stir the emulation of philanthropists the world over, were his gifts to the poor, the lame, the sick, the blind and the outcast.

Here is the divine suggestion to every man and woman who would know really the full proportions and power of happiness.

Throw out the circle of your presence and generosity to take in some of those you know are without the cheer and content of the Christmas time.

Look out from your homes of ease and plenty by the back way to those hovels where you know is want and aching bodies and paralyzing helplessness.

Reach out that hand of thine, into which a Christian civilization has poured more than your sufficiency, and scatter the sunlight and healing offerings among those who shrink in the shadows.

Every man and woman who would experience the true Christmas spirit should distribute with grace and humanity to the poor and sick.

It is a tithe to Him whom you celebrate.

It is a duty that casts a searchlight on the way to heaven.

It is an exercise that stirs the inward spirit as none other can, and widens the soul to greater capacity for love and happiness.

Try it. Test it. Taste the joy of it.

A Tender Form of Bran

Pettijohn's is made by flaking a peculiar soft wheat with the bran. The bran is tender because the wheat is soft.

It forms a unique, luscious cereal. It stands among the few great breakfast dainties.

And the bran means right living. It means better days. It means less need for drugs. For bran is Nature's laxative, advised by every doctor.

You'll find no other food which serves it in as nice a way as this.

WHAT I SAW IN WARRING EUROPE

THE PERSONAL NARRATIVE OF THEODORE WATERS, SECRETARY OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, WHO HAS JUST VISITED FIVE OF THESE UNHAPPY COUNTRIES TO ARRANGE FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FUND FOR THE RELIEF OF WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF THE WAR

I HAVE been in Belgium and I have witnessed scenes which I hope never to see again. I have heard the sound of the guns, far in the distance to be sure, but in the cities, towns, and villages through which I passed I have seen the havoc which those same guns produced—public buildings destroyed, homes demolished, graves holding men, women and children who once were happy in these homes. Worse, I have witnessed the hopeless misery, the blank despair of the poor souls who are left behind to mourn the loss of their loved ones.

In Antwerp I saw over one thousand poorly-clad women, one in bedroom slippers, standing shivering in the snow and slush, waiting for food to be doled out to them, and this under the shadow of a big hotel where well-fed, well-clad soldiers drank and made merry. In Malines, under the shadow of the cathedral, its walls caved in, its old stained-glass windows now but ragged remnants of a beauty that can never be replaced, I saw men, women and children gazing disconsolately at the ruins of the houses that once were theirs; poor people who begged something to eat of us as we passed. On the road to Brussels we overtook thousands of refugees tramping dejectedly along, weary and forlorn, returning to villages and towns where there is not now food enough to sustain those who are already there.

In Brussels we saw women holding babies snuggled to their necks standing on cold street corners begging a centime for food. We visited the distributing stations, and saw the food sent over by kind-hearted Americans being handed out in all too meager rations. They came in droves, these people, from all directions, and the clatter of their sabots on the pavements was a sad accompaniment to their sadder thoughts, for none spoke except to murmur a thankful "Merci, monsieur!" as each portion was handed out.

In Holland I found thousands of men, women and children refugees from Belgium huddled in retaining camps and on barges, some refined, some coarse and brutalized, all sleeping together without partitions to insure the least privacy. The following sentences are from a report made on these conditions by Captain Gherardi of the United States navy, who personally investigated them:

"A barge near Rotterdam contained about 400 men, women and children. At Dordrecht a long low building contained 700 men, women and children. At Rozendaal a large factory building held over 700. At Bergen op Zoom a camp of tents held 3,000. There was no heat in some of these. The barges are long iron lighters. The people are stowed in the holds. There is no heat, the hatches leak, and the place is constantly damp from this leakage and from the sweating of the iron hull. There are neither windows nor skylights, and one kerosene lamp lights each hold, which is otherwise dark, day and night. Wooden bunks in two tiers are in each hold, and tables are roughly constructed. There was not sufficient straw to cover the boards of the bunks. The place was therefore in a state highly dangerous to health, and the people suffered intense misery with the thermometer as it was standing several degrees below freezing point. Little children were constantly damp and their feet wet. There was no fire to dry them."

Now it must be understood that there is no blame coming to Holland for this state of affairs, for, due to after her own population, and in addition she has had nearly half a million Belgian refugees thrust suddenly upon her. Also the condition of the refugees sketched above is being alleviated as fast as possible. But winter is here, the need is urgent, and only help from the outside, that is, from America, will prevent even worse suffering.

On the other hand, I had the satisfaction of acting directly for the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family by purchasing a cargo of flour, peas, rice, wheat, etc., taking it into Belgium, and seeing it fed, as it were, directly to the hungry people. Furthermore, those who have contributed to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the European War will have the satisfaction of knowing that it was part of the first American food to be given to the Belgians. This was made possible with the co-operation of the American Commission of which Ambassador Walter H. Page, Minister Henry Van Dyke and Minister Brand Whitlock are members. Previous to the existence of this commission, neither England, Germany, nor France would permit the importation of food into Belgium without seizure. When the need became so urgent, however, the various governments gave written consents that food coming from America would be permitted to go through, provided it were consigned directly to the American minister here.

So, with this proviso, the Dutch steamer Jan Blocks was chartered, the CHRISTIAN HERALD cargo placed aboard and sent across the North Sea to Rotterdam. There it was transshipped on barges and placed on trains and sent in varying quantities according to the need to various localities to be distributed to the people, some in Antwerp, some in Brussels, some in Louvain, some in Namur, some even in Liège, and so throughout Belgium.

I shall never forget the gratitude, the universal kindliness with which the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was received by officials everywhere. This does not necessarily mean civic officials, but men of standing in the professional and business world, who, their occupations gone, have banded themselves together into corps of almoners to do what they can to relieve the suffering of the people. The rich and the poor alike are on a common level. There are no distinctions, for money in any quantity is not spendable in Belgium. What the people need is food and clothes. There is no business. Stagnation lies like a blight upon the land—stagnation of energy, of hope, even of love. No, not of love after all. The little orphan babies, hugged close to their mothers' breasts away from the cold, the instances where women with broods of their own and little to eat cared for children whose parents have died, show that in spite of all suffering, love and charity still prevail. And to witness these things in city and village, to view the black despair on the faces of the peasants change to surprise, and then through unbelief to gratitude, when they learn that people scattered all over the United States are sending some of their little all to their relief, that is enough to convince one forever that to give is more blessed than to receive.

Our first impression of the war in Belgium was gained when the train on which we were traveling to Antwerp stopped on the Dutch frontier near Rozendaal and two soldiers with guns on their backs climbed aboard our carriage and immediately began sifting the wheat from the chaff as far as nationalities were concerned. They had came to the compartment in which we were sitting, and the first of them, a big black-bearded German, gave a start of surprise at the spectacle, as he thought, of two Englishmen sitting calmly in a car[illegible] that was carrying them into the land of their enemies. He said something to his companion, and they muttered together a moment. Then he turned to us, asking grimly, "Passierschein." Yes, we had obtained passes from the German minister in The Hague, and we showed them. Both soldiers read them, one over the other's shoulder, but they seemed to doubt their authenticity, for one looked at us questioningly and asked "Engländer?" We shook our heads emphatically in the negative, and replied "Nein! Nein! Amerikaner!" and exhibited our small American flags. Still they were not quite convinced. They talked awhile and then went off, first carefully locking the door of the compartment behind them.

While the train remained in the station more soldiers with guns came along the aisle of the train and stopped to peer at us questioningly through the glass of the door. We began presently to feel like a prize exhibit in a stock show and were wondering which of us would be killed and dressed first, when suddenly the train started and away we went into the land of war. We stopped at nearly every station en route. People got on and off the train, but always under the supervision of the soldiers. Finally at one station our guards unlocked our door, and we felt sure our turn had come, but instead they let in what remained of two Belgian refugee families, who occupied every remaining seat and even crowded the aisle. Thus was the compartment changed automatically from first-class to third, and democracy was established behind a locked door. We endeavored, as far as possible, to live up to the idea by taking two little children left standing in the aisle and seating them on our knees. However, nearly every other knee there was likewise so occupied.

The two families were returning to their homes in Antwerp. They were of distinctly different castes. One was bourgeois; the other laboring class. But trouble had evidently leveled such distinctions, and they chattered incessantly in Belgian-French. The woman of the laboring family did most of the talking. We gathered enough to know that her home was destroyed; that a cook-stove was the only thing that had not burned up. The other family was in a much more uncertain condition. They had fled from Antwerp on the day the bombardment began, and did not know whether they possessed a home or not. But, and here was the especial bit of woe that kept the mother of the family weeping silently in the corner, their little son, about ten years of age, had become separated from them and lost in the flight. A child lost on the one hand, a cook-stove saved on the other—was there ever such irony? The inexactitudes of interpretation through the medium of an English-French, French-English dictionary made it difficult for us to understand how a child could be so lost and the family still persist in its flight, but it seems there were thousands of children taken along in that mad rush; and besides, this one was not missed until after the train had started. In fact there are many things about this war that are difficult to understand.

After the cook-stove the laboring woman's chief anxiety was to learn from us whether her husband could get work in America if she brought him over. He sat beside her, a lumbering hulk of a man who stared spiritedly straight ahead and did not seem to care whether or not he got work in America or anywhere else. The little children on our knees looked at us [illegible] curiously. They had passed through much during the preceding weeks, and to them we were merely a latest phase in the wonder [illegible] that was being enacted before them day by day.

The train stopped at least over a mile from the center of Antwerp, and our jailers came and let us out of our stuffy compartment and down by a railway siding where the mud lay ankle deep. Both sides of the [illegible] were lined with soldiers a few feet apart, and all [illegible] tramped in common with the weary hundreds who were returning in so many cases [illegible]

It was a [illegible] procession. Men carrying children or old women [illegible] carrying both. Children carrying other children or bundles or else stringing wearily along behind the family party. On all the German soldiers by the wayside gazed stolidly, it seemed to me implacably, although I learned later that the latter was not so. We walked a long distance, [illegible] on the path, sometimes stepping [illegible] the [illegible] and at last came to a barrier presided over by German officers. Our jailors of the train were there before us and pointed us out particularly. But an officer spoke fluent English and we had no trouble in establishing our identity. Nevertheless, this included an examination of our papers and of everything in our gripsacks. Meantime we had lost track of our compartment refugees, and so we set out for the spires of the distant town, which looked now to be less than half a mile away, and finally we succeeded in securing an old hack, drawn by a decrepit horse, which probably had not been worth commandeering by the Germans, and so we drove into the captured city of Antwerp.

In the meantime it should be mentioned that while we were in The Hague to get our passports viséd and to obtain a military pass from the German minister we had been asked by Acting Minister Langhorne of the American legation to carry some governmental mail to Minister Brand Whitlock in Brussels. As this would per se make us U. S. Government messengers we were only too glad to do so, as it enhanced our chances of going through. One of the packages was a large sealed portfolio, containing letters; the other was a large mail sack. I do not know what was in it, but from the weight of it it must have, as my companion declared, contained gold bricks.

It was now one o'clock and we decided to go to a restaurant and have a bite to eat before pushing along. We found one on the main street, the Broadway of the town, and, dragging our mail sack and other baggage behind us we went in and took a seat at a table in a booth. In the next booth sat two German army officers and a man in civilian's clothes. We were too weary to pay much attention to them, but we changed our attitudes when, having finished their luncheon, they stepped up to our table and one of them said with an excellent accent:

"Gentlemen, I hear you speak English. May I trouble you to show your passes?"

No trouble at all. We would show him passes that would open his eyes—from the German embassy in Washington, D. C.; from the German legation in The Hague, letters from high German officials in the United States, a letter of identification from the United States State Department, a passport signed by William Jennings Bryan, and last but not least, a beautiful little silken American flag. Wouldn't he feel cheap when he saw all of these?

But he didn't. He merely looked them over carefully, laid them down evenly and said still more evenly:

"Gentlemen, these will not be sufficient to pass you to Brussels."

We were skeptical, but inclined to be tolerant. He was still quite a young officer.

"Do you mean to say that the passierschein of your own minister in The Hague will not carry us through to Brussels; that we must get additional passes here?"

"I ought to know. I am the man who issues the passes."

He smiled. His friend smiled. We smiled, and the Belgian waiter, who could not understand a word of what was said, also smiled. So we promised to go around to the war office in the Rue de Ricolai after lunch and invoke his aid.

But after luncheon we decided to call first on United States Consul Dederich, so that he might understand the affair in case—well, in case he might have to understand it.

Mr. Dederich was glad to see us. We were the first news he had had from the outside world for a week or more. He described the shelling of Antwerp. Told how eight houses were destroyed by German shells in the very street in which he lived. How he and his family hid in the cellar and listened to the peculiar unmusical sound of the shells as they passed overhead. How at last what he called a living fire bomb struck a nearby house from above and descending through every floor set it on fire from roof to basement. Mr. Dederich rushed to the rear of his own place to view the damage and when he returned to his wife and daughter he found the latter in convulsions. That was enough, and so braving everything he carried her out of the house and the whole family fled across the river, where they were safe.

He spoke also of a young newspaper man, who had visited him before Antwerp was taken and who had spent a night in one of the Belgian trenches. He went in with the regiment in the evening and when morning came the bodies of eight hundred young Belgians clogged the trench. The newspaper man crawled out over them and when he reached Antwerp, said Mr. Dederich, "he called upon me and he sat and stared silently at nothing at all. He appeared abstracted as though it were difficult for him to get his mind down to affairs of the moment."

At last we said we must hurry to the war office or it would be too late to get our passes.

"Don't be in a hurry," said Mr. Dederich. "The Germans are very thorough, you know. Since the invasion the clock has been put back from Belgian to German time, so that gives you three-quarters of an hour more."

It was so, a fact which the Belgians themselves very much resented.

"Oh, these Allemands!" snorted one with all the English accent he could command, "what will they do next? They shoot our people. They ruin our homes. They eat our food. They make us go to bed by nine of the clock whether we want it or not. And now they even attempt to delay the movement of the sun!"

He forgot apparently that in delaying the movement of the sun the Germans were graciously permitting him to stay up forty-five minutes longer than if they had reckoned by Belgian time. The arrangement, moreover, caused many complications. The Belgians, in making engagements, took it for granted, without mentioning it, that Belgian time was meant; the Germans, in the same way, went according to the clocks of Berlin. We Americans, being neutral, were somewhat at a loss, but adapted ourselves as best we could to conditions.

We got our passes during the afternoon, after an examination of all of our papers, official and private, and after all of these and even the United States mail packets had received the official stamp of the German commandanteur. And then we set out to procure an automobile to carry us through to Brussels, for we were told that the railway bridges between Antwerp and Brussels had been blown up by the Belgians during the retreat. We might as well have looked for a loaf of bread in Liège after the siege. There was none. The Germans had taken them all. Toward nightfall we succeeded in hiring a miserable turnout, two bony horses and a tumble-down hack with a frightened driver, who agreed to drive us to Brussels on the morrow for the modest wartime charge of seventy-five shillings and a pourboire of five shillings as an extra inducement.

Meantime we went to a hotel and hired what the inhabitants facetiously call a Zeppelin parlor (a room on the top floor of a hotel) preparatory to passing the night. On the way to the hotel we saw a great line, six deep, of women of all ages, standing in one of the main streets. It had been snowing and a few flakes were still in the air. Where the women stood the snow had been trampled into slush. Some of the poor creatures had shawls, some had not. Most of them shivered. My companion called my attention to one who wore bedroom slippers. Her feet must have been cold and wet. Her face had a dull despairing look. The whole line constituted one of the most miserable spectacles I have ever seen. It reminded me of the Bowery Mission Bread Line, only these were not down-and-out men, but women whose husbands or fathers had very recently been shot to death.

The head of the line turned into the doorway of a big theater where rations of food were being distributed. The tail of it curled around the corner of the Hotel Webber on the main street. At the door of this hotel, as at the doors of others, two German soldiers with guns stood on guard, thus

Your hunt for the right books to give or to own can end right here. These books will be permanently welcomed in any home. You will make no mistake in selecting one or more as gifts at any season or for your reading table.

FRIENDS 'O MINE is a book you will like in spots, and like better in other spots, and best of all in certain spots. In other words, the whole book will hold you no matter who you are, or how old or young. It is an unusual book of which this can be said, and Miss Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., is indeed an unusual writer. Just as did her famous grandmother before her, she is making a host of enthusiastic friends. The majority of the somewhat more than one hundred short stories, sketches and poems in Friends o' Mine have never before been published, and, of course, will not be, excepting in this form. So you want this book. We want you to have it. We have published it because it is unusually worth while.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD RED LETTER BIBLE OR TESTAMENT There is but one thing to say about these now famous Red Letter Bibles and Testaments, and that is a question: Do you possess one? If you answer "Yes," there remains this to ask: Have you a friend who does not possess one? If to either of these questions you answer "No," we have this to say:

We will send the MINION RED LETTER BIBLE postpaid with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one full year for $3.00. *For a better binding add $1.00 to the above price.
